David: So I said, well, is anyone interested in having a service? Yes, there was interest in doing that, so we held a service on the Hill of the Three Oaks. And then also raised the question: you really want to get this thing started again; is anybody willing to do a vigil? And sure enough, we had three volunteers.

Deborah: I think these were all people who lived in Farmhouse?

David: No; Bob Nieman lived in Farmhouse, I believe.

Deborah: In any case, we were at least partly tapping into some of the then still relatively new (by our lights) ecological and nature interests.

David: Bob invited us to have dinner at Farmhouse, which was wonderful. Good cooks over there at that time! We had a very pleasant evening with him. Let's see; it was Bob and Tom Lane and Meg Ross.

Deborah: Yes.

David: They all did vigil, and I tromped over there in early morning at dawn and performed the ceremony. This was all very spur of the moment, so I did not have ribbons to present them. They got their ribbons in the mail after I got home.

I believe that it didn't take very well. I didn't get much in the way of correspondence from them; didn't get too much in the way of responses to my letters. I did get a letter from Tom Lane a year or so later, saying, well, they hadn't really done too much.

Deborah: There was a small cache of Paraphernalia, which then ended up in the attic of Farmhouse to be rediscovered later.

David: I don't really have first-hand knowledge of what really happened there.

Deborah: One of the other things in terms of what it means to be a practicing Druid: aside from, I believe, the January '82 Alumni Board meeting, when with the wind-chill factor it was unbelievably cold here (the final Board meeting in Great Hall became exceedingly uncomfortable because we were sitting on metal folding chairs and it didn't matter how much we were wearing by the end of that hour and a half; the room was just unheatable) aside from that, I don't believe I have ever made a visit to campus without going out to the Hill of Three Oaks, whether there were any other Druids that I knew of or not. I suppose in some way that says for me that my Druidism is still anchored at Carleton.

Eric: What is it about Carleton that made it a hospitable environment for Druidism to go on? I know the historical reasons it started here, but is there something about the nature of Carleton itself that, in your view, makes Druidism particularly compatible here?

Deborah: Well, one thing that occurs to me when you ask that is my sense of the Carls I've known well having always a bit of tongue in cheek in thinking about ourselves. We can take ourselves very seriously, but we also have a sense of humor about ourselves. I think that is a quality that made this perhaps more hospitable to Druidism, in various times, than perhaps some other schools would have been. It may have been an accident that it started here, but then that made it more possible to perpetuate Druidism. The time was ripe in the sense that there was also the beginning of encouragement of intercultural studies, area studies. I think President Nason on the academic level was strongly encouraging; in other words, I think the intellectual climate was getting more hospitable towards the idea that we didn't all have to be white-bread middle-Americans. For those of us who were beginning to get very worried about the idea that when we left Carleton we might have to turn into white-bread middle-Americans, this was very satisfying.

Eric: What about the geography of the campus? Is a place like the Hill of Three Oaks a place of spiritual power because of its significance to the Carleton Druids, or is it a place that has something special about it regardless of Druidic associations?

Deborah: I think that's one of these chicken-and-egg questions. As far as we know, it had no name before the Druids called it the Hill of the Three Oaks. That was one of the things people used to give us grief about at first. When we'd announced that we had meetings on the Hill of the Three Oaks, they would insist that not only that we didn't exist, but that it didn't exist. We've been very gratified by the fact that that at least has become enshrined in the maps, that it's properly recorded.

David: I think the fact of the Arb is very important. It's just impossible for me to imagine something like this starting up, say, at a place like Macalester.

Deborah: Or if we had just the Bald Spot. That wouldn't have done it.

David: I don't think Druidism could flourish meeting in rooms with chairs. It needs to happen outdoors somewhere. I think in all the various other Groves that have been started, that that was a significant component, that they had to meet outdoors somewhere. There are wonderful places above the campus at Berkeley in the Oakland Hills, in the Berkeley Hills, to hold services like this, and I just don't think you can do it without that kind of setting. So the very existence of the Arb was, I think, crucial.

Deborah: Yes.

David: Because I think we all did believe, and do believe, that Nature and an awareness of the world around us, an awareness of Nature as an organic whole is important to us spiritually. You cannot get away from that and have a complete spiritual life. We weren't talking ecology yet at that time, but again, if you look at the history of what was going on in the world, this was at about the same time that awareness of ecology began to be running through the rest of society. Whether Carleton was the right place or not, the time was right.

Deborah: And the place was appropriate, in terms of the Arb and the spirit.

David: And I think also, as Deborah has said, that a very important element of Druidism for us, and I think part of what has kept the spark alive, or has allowed it to return over the years, is the sense of not taking ourselves too seriously. A meaningful spiritual life is one which has a significant component of humor, of having fun together, of enjoying each other's fun, and enjoying each other's company. That's something that I associate with being a Carl, what life at Carleton is like, at least for the people I associated with. We've often said that we never met a Carl we didn't like. There's perhaps one exception to that, but in general, when we have gotten together with other Carleton people where we've had no previous association, and the thing that we have in common is the Carleton Experience, though sometimes separated by decades, we still find that same spark of humor, of having a good time together, much of which is intellectually based: good banter, ability to kick ideas around and have fun with them.

Deborah: Sounds like Druidism to me.

David: Druidism is of a piece with Carleton in that sense. Not to say that there aren't other places that can have that same experience, but it is definitely something that has happened here, and is part of at least our sense of what Druidism is all about.

Michael: I'd like to ask a question. Would you consider the Carleton Druids to be a fraternity attempt at Carleton? With alcohol, big parties, secret rites . . .

David: No.

Deborah: No. David can speak in terms of the men who were involved in the early period, but one of the things that was characteristic of our Druid times here was that alcohol was used very sparingly in Druid rites. Alcohol, for all that we drank, was probably used less, and abused less, in that period in the early Sixties than it was maybe in the succeeding half-decade, when pot also arrived on campus in significant quantities in the late Sixties and early Seventies. Our partying, if you will, the big festivals for the Druids then, have to me a very innocent quality. The party was the fire, the fellowship, the seriousness and silliness of things like the fortune-telling, and about a shot of alcohol shared with everyone who was present. And that was all we drank together, as Druids. Some of us were also friends, and maybe parted elsewhere.

David: We also didn't put much emphasis on secrecy. I don't recall any attempt to keep anything secret from anyone else. The services were always open. There is this pretense of passing on the lore, what some of the words mean, if you go through the Third Order ordination service, but if somebody else wanted to get up at dawn and come up there on the Hill and attend the service, that was fine with us.

Deborah: Right.

David: We were not keeping anything secret from anyone, or "passing on the mysteries." It didn't have that quality at all. Perhaps if there had been fraternities and sororities and things here, there wouldn't have been the time or energy to make up the silly rituals; I don't know. Maybe our focus would have been drained off in that direction, so in that sense there may be a connection. But I don't think we were trying to create a fraternity substitute.

Deborah: Even implicitly. I don't think so. There were some contexts the 'Tonian', KARL, Players, where there were intimate sub-communities among Carleton students, because people worked together in intensive ways, and I think for some people who were not as deeply involved in any of those, that was certainly one of the attractions of Druidism. It was another place where you could get together with people and have some continuity without having to study together and stuff. But I don't think that was particularly conscious either. That also wasn't why you joined the 'Tonian' or Players.

David: I didn't mention, in terms of why I came to Carleton, one of the attractions (I don't know that it was the deciding factor) was the absence of fraternities. I didn't feel that fraternities were an appropriate thing to be doing with my college time. I don't know that I'd thought all this out before actually arriving on campus, but by the time I'd been here a while, I believe my sense was that these naturally forming interest groups were a much more appropriate way to form community and to have a sense of bonding than fraternities would have been (which always struck me as highly artificial). I was sort of intrigued by the notion of fraternities, secret rites, and all that sort of thing, but when it came right down to it, it wasn't what I wanted to do.

Deborah: In many cases, one of my criteria for considering colleges, I would not look at any place with sororities, and places which had fraternities, even though no sororities, were sort of downgraded on my list. That was very practical. In those days, as a Jew, there were too many sororities I would have been excluded from. I had no interest in buying into a society in which people would be excluding me. Druidism would not, even if it had developed that way, would not have had that problem, but I think probably most of us would not have felt very comfortable if it had begun to feel too much like a secret society. Those of us who were here in our time. Except maybe Norman. But he would have done it with great zest for the sheer fun of it.

David: I think most of us who were involved were having too much fun with the theater aspects of it to have gone in for any secrecy.

Deborah: Yes. I hadn't thought of it that way, but I think that's absolutely accurate.

Eric: Other than the people who refused to believe that you existed, and the Goodhue jocks who would destroy the altars (for whatever reason) . . .

Deborah: We believe. This is tradition, but we have no proof.

Eric: ...and administrative hostility, did you experience any hostility toward the Druids as a group from other students, people who were offended by your existence. Particularly the question might relate to existing religious groups on campus, the traditional Carleton religious groups. Did they feel threatened by the Druids, or were there misunderstandings about what the Druids were about?

Deborah: If so, it was damned low-key. I certainly don't remember anything in Canterbury Club. Inter-Varsity wasn't very active.

David: I don't remember any specifics of outright hostility. I had maybe a couple of conversations with people who were essentially fundamentalist Christians who believed that dabbling in any of this kind of thing was dangerous and sinful and dealing with the devil. The sort of people who are uncomfortable with Hallowe'en costumes.

Deborah: Took the spirits far more seriously than we did do.

David: Right. But there are always such people around, and they have their point of view. I didn't think that was particularly meaningful.

Deborah: It wasn't very common as a stance at Carleton when we were here. Certainly not the people we hung out with.

David: I suspect that there were more fundamentalist or nearly fundamentalist Christians than we were aware of. It was certainly less popular at that time to express that point of view openly, but somebody continued to go to Chapel on Sunday morning, even after it wasn't required.

Eric: Well, I'd like perhaps as a way to bring this to closure, to probe for some reflections on your part about what Druidism has meant in your own lives, how it has informed your subsequent philosophies and outlooks and altered things for you.

David: I think one thing that's definitely been true: what started out in some ways as a practical matter of being as incorporating as possible, of not wanting to do anything that would turn somebody off, of trying to be as welcoming as possible (part of that was we were trying to get people to join!) turned into a philosophical stance that I now believe very strongly: that a proper outlook on spiritual journey is to be as inclusive and accepting as possible. It doesn't mean you don't make judgments about things; it doesn't mean you don't sort out for yourself what you choose to believe and what you don't choose to believe. But to be open to ideas and to be as accepting of other people and their belief systems as possible is just a way of enriching your own life, your own spiritual experience; and I think it's the only way to go about it. That is something that has grown on me. It started out as sort of an official stance for me within Druidism, but has really been very much internalized.

Deborah: I would say something similar, and I think my experience of the last nine years has been even more informed by it. I was essentially becoming a Christian at the same time I was becoming a Druid. I'm not sure how much of that stuff I wanted to believe, but [was] very drawn to the people. One of the things, given my background, was that Carleton was the first place where I found people of faith whom I could respect intellectually, which broke with one of my parents' insinuations about the nature of the world.

There was a period after I left Carleton where I was spending more energy exploring the Christian faith that was newly mine, but during that period I also began to articulate my one religious and spiritual absolute, the one thing which is always a guiding factor for me, which I see as very Druid: never trust the theology of anyone who cannot laugh at themselves. This has been a wonderful touchstone for a wide variety of groups that I have run into, and was great for clearing away some of the underbrush about people who claim to have hold of the true faith when I was a young Christian. Because it did help me to tell who were the people who were on the wavelength that I was on.

In the last going on ten years, my Christian experience has been very informed by feminism, by lesbian and gay liberation movements, by the spiritual journeys of a number of women that I sort of travel with spiritually (which are not Christian; some of which are Neo-Pagan). There's been kind of a return to Druid roots in this time, and I'm not sure how much of the rather long process of coming to really abandon a patriarchal image of God was informed by Druidism, but I see a continuity there. There have been times when I found it very reassuring to remind myself that this was not the first time that I had called upon God as the Earth-Mother or as the Goddess; that lightning had not struck me then, and that I was probably on the right track now.

There's a real significant sense in which this is a piece of my spiritual journey that I am reclaiming. I lead women's spiritual circle gatherings in a couple of different contexts, and have been conditioned to adding recent feminist and lesbian theology. I've been thinking a lot as I've put together the most recent ones of how comfortable this is for me. I haven't actually gotten out any liturgies; it may be time to do that the next time I lead a circle. So it's both informed by apparently mainstream religious life, and been what I think of as a kind of underground spring for much of my spiritual journey since Carleton, since I became a Third Order Druid; a real source of energy and life.

David: I mentioned in my opening remarks having been raised in the Presbyterian Church. Subsequent to that I did seek Confirmation as an Episcopalian, although the service was performed by the old Catholic bishop of Germany, which I rather like, because things were just murky and open-ended and as eclectic as possible. One of the things that I continue to find congenial about the Episcopal Church is that, at least in its better moments, it does seem to allow for things to be pretty much open-ended. We believe that it's better to remain in dialogue, even when we disagree with each other; it's better to allow the possibility of different and multiple answers to fundamental questions than to try to nail down the truth or the single Truth. We've just experienced evidence of that this weekend; we're in Minnesota to attend the consecration of our former rector from San Francisco as Episcopal bishop of Minnesota. There was a protest on the floor of the hall during that ceremony over the fact that this man has announced that he will ordain practicing gay and lesbian people.

Deborah: Non-celibate.

David: That he will allow within the diocese the blessing of same-sex relationships. (He still won't call them marriages because there are legal ramifications having to do with the use of that word.) But these were very controversial positions. They seem in some people's opinions to be directly in conflict with resolutions in the House of Bishops. How can the House of Bishops say one thing and then turn around and allow a person who holds a differing view to be consecrated as a bishop? Well, I think that's delightful. Why not allow that to happen? Why not allow things to remain open-ended and murky; because I think that's the only way that we can continue to move toward anything that would be spiritually malleable for us.

Eric: All right. I thank you very much for the time you've spent with me, and for your memories and reflections and thoughtfulness. Unless you have anything else to say, I think I'll declare this interview closed.

Deborah: It's been a pleasure.

David: Thank you.

at Monument Hill.

April 20th, 1994 c.e.

Mike: I am Michael Scharding, class of 1994, and I am interviewing Robert Larson, who was an important Druid because he knew the ways of the original Carleton Druids and also the ways of the Berkeley Druids. Robert founded the Berkeley Druids and thereby with Isaac, he set the stage for the birth of the Neo-Pagan Druid movement in America in 1969. As Archdruid of Berkeley 1969–1977, his views will help us to understand the Berkeley Grove during the troubling times.

Robert: Hi, everybody!

Mike: You're probably the only Third Order Druid from Carleton who I've not phoned, talked to or written to yet.

Robert: Well, congratulations.

Mike: Except Fisher.

Robert: Well, yeah.

Mike: You're also the only Druid to have known most of the competitors in the New and Reformed Druid movements. So you'll be helpful to my paper. Let's start off with what you remember of the early Founding Days and how you came to find the Druids at Carleton.

Robert: Ah, well, that was my Sophomore year. 62–63. I was at, I think, the second service. I made it to most of the services thereafter. Have you talked to Fisher? Fisher won't talk?

Mike: Fisher won't talk.

Robert: That figures. With the ideotheos of young intellectual people, you come up with strange ways of passing the time. The early 60s they still had the religious requirement in force. That went out about 65. That's when you had to go to a certain number of services every term and they made it pretty easy though. It was all nicely hypocritical. At any rate, David Fisher's method of rebellion was forming secret societies, which never really took off.

Mike: Oh, I didn't know there were other secret societies.

Robert: Well, he had a couple others that he tried to get off the ground beforehand. Nothing ridiculous or outrageous, but they were illegal by the laws of the college at that time.

Mike: One of things that Bonewits mentioned is whether Fisher was a member of the United Ancient Order of Druids.

Robert: I have no idea. I don't believe he was. I have no idea of what was in his background.

Mike: Ah. But what you said there made me suspicious.

Robert: Well, no. It was just his method of rebelling against college regulations. We all had our own ways. Mostly sneaking girls into the guys' dorms and getting drunks. But there were other ways, as Fisher never had much of a head for alcohol and he was planning on becoming a minister, it was just his way of rebelling, I guess. I really didn't know Dave that well, and we didn't get along that well. At any rate, he came up with this Druid thing to resist the Chapel requirement, the idea being that when we put in our religious slips we'd write down the Druid thing, and if they accepted it it would prove that the religious requirement was absolutely ridiculous, and if they denied it we could claim religious discrimination. Funny thing was when the men put it in, it was denied, but when the women put it in, the women's dean said "fine."

Mike: What happened there, according to Deeborah Frangquist, is that the slips were checked by dorm mothers over at the women's places. And they didn't know anything and they said, "whatever. pass. whatever. pass."

Robert: Well, I know one guy, who was not a Druid, named Bob Miller who was getting by putting in things like the "Wesleyan Presbyterian and Fire Reform of Colorado" and they were getting accepted. But we had trouble with the Dean, but that was straightened out. Most of us covered our butts by going to the Sunday night lecture any way, which was a painless way of fulfilling the religious requirement. At any rate, there we were in 63 and we went away and came back the next year. For some reason, people found something in it, people on a religious search or philosophical search, kids trying to find their basis of being. "Roll your own religion" has always had an attraction to me, and I rolled my own. At first year, you had Fisher as ArchDruid & Howie Cherniack as Preceptor and we had various servers, but it eventually came down to Frangquist. He eventually became Preceptor and then Archdruid after Fisher had left, and I was his Preceptor for a while. Anything else you need to know of the early days?

Mike: What was your idea of what the RDNA meant to you at that time?

Robert: As I say, it's a nice excuse to get out in the woods on Saturday, but I've always looked at it as a way to search for philosophical/ethical/religious truth. Of course, the search is more important than the finding in those cases. The search led you in various directions. Nature is the focal point. My personal predilection even at that time, although in the introductory state, was in Celtic language, history and practices. I've always had a taste for the obscure.

Mike: I know what you mean.

Robert: Among Northern Europeans, the Celtic mythos was one of the more obscure and one of the more puzzling. I always had a tendency for the pagan religion, but most of my formative experiences were influenced by Nordic traditions. The Celt mythos & ethos & worldview is more conducive to my particular soul. There are many more good books now coming out, but at that time there was very little available and you just had to get your information where you could and I had always been interested in that culture since the age of 12, although for no reason that I could figure out. It's just one of those things, I mean, where do your interests come from? It didn't really become focused until I was in my 20's and since then I've tried to pick up everything I could find on it, which is fairly good. I did more than a bit of work on Muenster Gaelic and now I can..... (long discourse on languages)

Mike: So you graduated in 65?

Robert: No, I didn't graduate...

Mike: Oh, you didn't graduate, what happened?

Robert: Loss of interest mainly. The final term I was laid up with one sprained ankle on another. I was majoring in English, which was interesting, but not overwhelmingly interesting. I just couldn't see working that hard. The general academic atmosphere just got to me.

Mike: I know that the Third Order was pretty much fixed at this point.

Robert: You mean in the ritual and how you became a Third Order?

Mike: Yes, I think so.

Robert: Yeah, it was pretty much fixed. As far as I know, it was fixed when Fisher ordained his first one, Nelson or Frangquist, I can't remember which was first. The ritual has not changed that much since, in order to keep some ilk of apostolic succession going.

Mike: And did you have the traditional curse of having it rain on your vigil?

Robert: No. But on my vigil, it was colder than an Eskimo's outhouse and I couldn't get my fire going. I found some deadfall in one of the thickets, and I had a nice staff that I was trying to whittle on to pass the time. It was a cold one. Eventually the dawn came, after I was walking around for awhile slapping my arms to my side for two hours, saying "When the f*ck is Frangquist going to show up?" Just as dawn came, off to the west from the Hill of Three Oaks, where I stood my vigil, was a nice lightning bolt striking the ground in the shape of my staff.

Mike: Wow!

Robert: Wasn't that a lucky thing? Fortunately there was no thunder at the time of the ordination!

Mike: Yes, I know we had to do that with the ordination of one of my friends. There was a lightning storm going on and every time it thundered we had to start it all over again.

Robert: That's one way to do it.

Mike: By the end of it, I was speaking 6 times the ordinary rate.

Robert: The way we would have done it is, "Well we're going to have to do this again." Because, at that point, we were taking it halfway seriously. Still got snow on the ground out there?

Mike: I'd say no, but if I do then we'll get another foot in the morning.

Robert: Oh, I know. Minnesota weather sucks.

Mike: We've had six or seven springs so far.

Robert: Has the Cannon River flooded yet?

Mike: Oh, you should have seen it last July! You know it was my fault. I ordained two people that night in July. There was a backlog for ten years when no one was third order and so when Shelton came down and ordained me, absolutely everyone wanted to catch up before they left.

Robert: Oh that's good. A new crop.

Mike: So, two people wanted to be ordained, and I think that was too much, and we got the Flood.

Robert: I ordained two on one night once. The problem out here is that we separated them, otherwise the vision quest doesn't go down, but making two or three visits each night, they were about a mile apart. It was one of those nights. We had a crazy Christian up in the hills back then. Never again will I try two in one night. It wasn't convenient to go home and lie on my own bed while they vigiled, because then I would have to make a mile or two mile hike to check up on them. So I had to stay up all night too...even though I'm a night person...

Mike: I've so far ordained 8 people and I've never been able to sleep on those nights.

Robert: No, you're concerned for them.

Mike: Yeah, you're concerned for them. So you trot out and check up on them, even if they don't see you.

Robert: Well, yeah, it's always the nice thing to do to give them a scare around 12:00.

Mike: A scare? Oh no!

Robert: Oh, yes, it's part of the vision quest. If you're in fairly dense woods, it's almost impossible not to give them a scare tracking through the goddamned underbrush. It's about 1 o'clock at night when things are getting a bit hairy. It's a matter of getting their adrenaline going, which at that time they can probably use to keep awake.

Mike: Sometimes, I don't know about you guys.

Robert: We're a little crazy. If you're half-way intelligent, you're already crazy. If you aren't crazy by the time you're 20, the world will drive you crazy by the time you're 30. I never really intentionally scared anybody, because I'm the type if you snuck up behind me and startled me, I'd jump up about three feet in the air. Most people are that way, especially in the woods at night.

Mike: You left in what year then?

Robert: Spring of 66, after winter term.

Mike: That was when Frangquist was winding down?

Robert: Yes.

Mike: And most of the rules had been passed?

Robert: Yeah. The originals had gone on.

Mike: During that brief flurry of voting, do you think they expected a vote to happen again?

Robert: I'm sure Fisher didn't.

Mike: I heard he always got pulled into consensus.

Robert: That's an interesting tale there. You're familiar with the stalled patriarchate of the upper orders? It stalled with Zempel at 8th? When they were starting up with the Druids, we thought, "Let's make some more Orders so that we can put more initials after our names." and so it was Fisher, Nelson, Frangquist, Zempel, and Zempel wanted the eighth but he got the seventh.

Mike: I wanted the Eighth!

Robert: Everyone wanted the Eighth or the tenth, because there is all sorts of initiation possibilities. But the idea at that time, that I got from Dave Frangquist, was they wanted to edge Dave Fisher out because he was getting a bit too Christian and so they gave him the honor of being the first patriarch of the Fourth Order. He raised the others up to Fourth order, and they elected the fifth order, and then the sixth Order, and that's as far as they got until Zempel. Everyone would be appointed to the higher order, but the point would be that Fisher would be the lowest ranking Patriarch. Since he always wore black anyway, he was preparing himself to become an Episcopalian priest. He's always been embarrassed by the whole thing. We once had a science fiction novel with busty broads on the cover and we gave it to him to autograph, and he turned pale at the sight of it.

Mike: So you went off somewhere after Carleton?

Robert: I went home for a while and, let me assure you, living in Indiana is no treat for someone who wants to do something. Well, I went over to Berkeley and my main objective was keeping out of Vietnam, which I managed to do with one trick. Overweight.

Mike: But you didn't actually enroll at Berkeley?

Robert: No. I was a hanger-on. I was a typical 60s hippie, but I didn't do as much drugs as some other people. I did my share, but everyone did back then. But that was before you time, wasn't it.

Mike: Yeah. I wasn't around then. I was born in 1971.

Robert: You weren't even a sparkle then. Oh, young ones... (Conversation trails off into Scottish & Irish History)

Mike: So, there never really was a Berkeley College Grove?

Robert: No. Religious groups are not allowed in Berkeley at all. It's a state institution. So that can't have groups directly connected with the campus. At that time, Berkeley was a hotbed of radical politics and anti-Vietnam, which is where I was at the time.

Mike: Not even Catholic groups could meet?

Robert: Not for religious services. I'm not sure of the rules there. The first service that we held out there, we purposely flaunted this regulation and had it in the Eucalyptus Grove or somewhere along strawberry creek. After that we had all of our services in Strawberry Canyon out beyond the Stadium.

Mike: Did that inhibit your ability to recruit on campus?

Robert: I've never been into proselytization. I don't believe in proselytization for any religion or philosophy.

Mike: So how did members find you?

Robert: They found us. That's always been the way I've conducted things, you let people who look who find. If you're not looking, you won't find. But then we wouldn't want you if you were not looking for something. It really took off when Robert Anton Wilson was out here, he's the author of the Illuminati Trilogy, and we used to meet at his house before we went off to the hills, in order to arrange transportation. At that time I didn't drive and most people didn't have cars.

Mike: So did you notice a different type of people who came looking for Druidism?

Robert: oh. Well, it's hard to say, because Carleton is much more homogenous than anything in Berkeley, Carleton's a much smaller environment. The thing in Carleton was that lots of people were coming out for a good time. Just following their noses a little bit. Most of the people here were searching for something, but I've never been sure with any of them, though there was a definite pagan or anti-Christian bent... at that time, the anti-Christian bent did not bother me, although it does now to a certain extent. I've mellowed over the years. But, the pagan bent never bothered me, although they tended to go too far into the occult, magical aspect of paganism, rather than the cultural aspects, for my taste. But I find, I believe you'll find, if you continue on... that what will happen is that the type of people that you get in a grove (that you set up outside the College) will have a fairly similar outlook to you. If they don't like your services, they ain't going to come and the result is, (although you'll have all sorts of factions and people you don't like, some people you like and some people you don't give a damn) you'll find that the general milieu is fairly homogenous within the group. And that's the interesting thing about Druidism, that because of the lack of dogma and the lack of standardization, disorganized religion as we always called it, in a sense it's very Mao-istic with "Let a thousand heresies bloom!" And they do! And I think that's good, because it makes people think. And thought is the main part of the search, that and experience and feeling, which is why the search goes on until you finally kick the bucket, then you may find out something.... or you may not.

I always kept the magic to a minimum although I was always very good at calling the winds, and I always got very good results. But theologically, or rather philosophically, I got more conservative than the group, and my bat has always been paleo-paganism rather than neo-paganism. I could make excellent arguments for human sacrifice.... if I wanted to.

(laugh)

In the original group, I probably would have been on the side of the animal sacrifice. Let's sacrifice a cricket, rather than a purely vegetarian passport, ... but whatever works. And it worked, though the building of the altars and the fire was really a nice touch, after they got rid of the portable record stand, which was definitely not a good altar. But the anti-Druids of the old days, Jocks in other words, were drunks (but so were we, so what the hell!) It's a matter of what side you want to be on.

Mike: You mentioned that in Berkeley people came searching for things. I always thought the Carleton group, back in the early 60s, broke down their beliefs into the very basic questions of fate.

Robert: Some of them, probably. For others, no. For some of them, well, Carleton at that time was a fairly Christian place, but not offensively so. Not like Bob Jones. But barriers were falling everywhere in the early 60s. You have to remember that this was the time of the Civil Rights, the time of Vietnam. Of course, the early 60s were before Vietnam, but the Civil Rights were very big. There was a big thing about getting blacks on campus. There was a big thing about getting more sexual freedom, about getting more open houses. At that time, the dorms were strictly segregated by sex, and college kids being what they are, that was a real big issue at that time. It was the start of the general breakdown of society, which has continued to this day. As soon as we wreck the old form of oppression, we'll erect a new form of oppression. That's what's happening now. My bent has always been towards anarchy rather than socialism, or rather towards conservatism. I always believed you should let people go to hell in their own hand basket rather than your own hand basket. And definitely most people will. That's their choice.

Mike: Let's talk about how you met Isaac Bonewits.

Robert: That was in Berkeley, of course. Interestingly, at that time, he was involved in infiltrating the Church of Satan.

Mike: I heard about that.

Robert: And the cult of Tony Levay, as he called him. He used to come out on the Gate Entrance with a nice black wooden throne and would heckle the Christian bible thumpers. That was just off-campus, you see, where all the stuff was happening. Just off of what is called red square. And I was, at that time, in my hippiedom, to use an Irishism, and I was selling newspapers to skin a living at the Gate, which is one of the better places to sell, if you wanted a congenial atmosphere rather than money. I soon met up with Isaac. Isaac, at that time, was collecting ordinations, he'd join any group in order to be ordained, just to collect them. So, I said what the hell, let's do it real quick and we did it real quick. And at that time, I was in financial trouble, which is no stranger, and we took up rooming together. He had to get out of his place and I had to get out of my place, so we roomed together in an apartment. We got along fairly well for a while. There are a few things between us now, but I've mellowed out quite a bit since then. Monetary again. But that was how I met him. I always thought he went a little overboard on the magic/paganism bit. But that may be part of my essential laziness. I don't believe in enthusing myself over anything, whereas he gets enthused over anything, I control my enthusiasm better than his.

Mike: Okay. When did the actual grove get set up?

Robert: Actually to legally ordain someone, you have to have a grove. So we did that real quick, too. Was Zempel out here at that time?

Mike: Really?

Robert: Zempel was out here for a while.

Mike: Wow!

Robert: And he was studying in physics for graduate work. I don't know whether it was Zempel or another guy. I can't remember, it must have been one of our guys. It was ordain a server quick, ordain a second order quick, to get enough people for a grove, and then, "okay, It's time to ordain some one." But as for getting it going, as an ongoing thing, it was a few years thereafter. And I'm not sure what year it was, but Isaac and I were both members of the Society for Creative Anachronism, Isaac more than I. He set up things for them, and I started doing things for them, and it evolved from there. But my recollection of those days are grim. And it kept going for few years. How long...

Mike: I think you were Archdruid until 1977.

Robert: About then.

Mike: And then you went to join Clann na Brocheta?

Robert: Yeah, and that thing broke up fairly quickly. And since then I have only been to one service, and that was Stephan Abbot's (in 1993) 30th anniversary service at Beltane of last year. I always thought that I had run a loose service! And I didn't know what a loose service was. (Laughter.) Of course, Stephan has never been the most focused individual.

Mike: Yes, I've had many conversations with Stephan.

Robert: You poor boy. (Laugh) I've had met him face to face, trying to figure out between what he wants and what he needs, which are two separate things. But, he's a nice boy.

Mike: He's also a Celtic scholar.

Robert: He likes to think he is. He knows his tarot well. He knows a certain amount of Celtic things, but you can't get into Celtic things unless you learn the languages. And as far as I know he's never taken the trouble to learn one. As far as I'm concerned a language is the heart and soul of a culture.

Mike: It is.

Robert: What language you speak orders how your brain will think, as any linguistics person will tell you.

Mike: I get the impression from other people that although you were the Archdruid from 68 all the way up until 77, officially, it seemed that Isaac was doing all the work.

Robert: Work? What work? I don't know what you mean by work?

Mike: Organizing people to do things.

Robert: Oh. I always allowed people to organize themselves. I've always felt that if you as Archdruid try to organize things too much, you will defeat Druidism, which is to let people to discover in themselves. Rather, that you discover, you have let them discover what they think. If you organize things too much, you direct things too much, what you're teaching people is what you think, and that's not my way. I never believe in that. I always believed that the preceptor should do more of the scuttling work. My main responsibility was providing the service, and in making sure everything was there for the service, and trying to collect the money for the waters, which is impossible I've found. Finally I decide, if you want cheap shit, don't contribute, if you want good stuff, contribute. And people contributed a little after that.

Mike: What was your favorite brand?

Robert: At that time I was into Tattie's, but now I'm into Powers. I don't drink that much, but Irish whiskey is always very nice. I've never liked Scotch that much, except for single malts, but that is prohibitively expensive for waters. Besides, you're supposed to water them down for services, except for Beltane and (hmmph!) Second Order Ordinations. Speaking of drinks, Stephan had some of the worst waters I've ever tasted at that May thing. He doesn't do alcohol and some of his alternative drinks are positively atrocious. The mead, which was home-made, and not necessarily bad, was pretty rank. At any rate, we got through it. It was kind of fun seeing some people again. Just like when I resigned from my Archdruidship, and it turned out to be Joan, I believe that when you step down you ought to go away and let them develop their ways, although I've been curious. But I don't want to see what they're doing unless they need help. If anyone asks me for help, or asks me for an opinion, I'm perfectly willing to give it. But, I'm not going to impose upon them. Again, it's not my way. I very much "live and let live," even though I have strong opinions.

Mike: How much of what was written during the Isaac Wars was his part and how much of it was representing the Berkeley Grove?

Robert: As I've said, Isaac has his enthusiasms, which tend to be pro-pagan, anti-Christian. To a certain extent I understood them. In fact, to a certain extent, I shared them, but not to the same radical extent as Isaac, who had unfortunately spent some time in Catholic seminary, which will do it to you any time. Most of the anti-Catholic and anti-Christian people I have known have gone to Catholic schools.

Mike: In the period when you were Archdruid, did you group ever refuse to allow people to join who were Christian?

Robert: No. Not as far as I know. Some people may have tried to discourage them. But they may not have felt welcome, considering the pagan bent of most of the members, which even I was feeling at that time, but as far as I am concerned, everyone was welcome. If what we do doesn't suit you, you don't have to stay. If something we do offends you, go away. If you offend us with the way you act, we'll tell you. I don't recall any problems of that ilk. If so, it wasn't brought to my attention, as it should have been. If they didn't bring it to my attention, I'm rather pissed. I'm a libertarian in that.

Mike: Carleton College had a very, very heavy enthusiasm for Asian religions in the 60s.

Robert: Must have been after my time. Of course Zen Buddhism in the 50s... I got into Zen for awhile, to a lesser extent. There is the Japanese connection at that time, when students went over to Japan to spend some time.

Mike: Primarily in the 60s.

Robert: I wasn't aware of a heavy enthusiasm for eastern religions in my times. However, in the later 60s, everybody was interested in Asian religions. But Eastern religion and Buddhism are always interesting paths to look into and it's different way of approaching things. I know that Dave Frangquist was one who went over to Japan and that, for a while, he was heavily exploring Buddhist thought. Fisher I doubt.

Mike: Fisher was more into Hinduism, I've heard.

Robert: That makes sense. It's a bit more organized. Anyone who's searching religiously, is going to look into Buddhism and look into Hinduism, as being available to people. Definitely, the Druish meditative thing (although it was fairly short and people spent the time looking around at Nature like you're supposed to do) is sort of Buddhistic. I read some Zen when I was in high school, Alan Watts and such, and it interested me at that time. I'd already given up on my native religion, but what can you say about Christian Science? It was, what did Crowley say?, "an excellent grounding for magic, black magic, but magic nonetheless." On the other hand, Christian science, once you get out of the bullshit aspect, has an interesting viewpoint. But they try to control people's mind too much. It's another pseudo-Christian religion heavily by eastern thought. But Christianity is Judaism, itself influenced by eastern religion and pagan European thought. That's another kettle of fish altogether.

Mike: I always wondered if Druidism's Eastern influence kept the Druids from evolving into what Isaac thought was it's natural destiny. Becoming Celtic, like it's framework suggest.

Robert: Possibly. The main problem with getting Druids off the ground, as Isaac was always want to do, was it's predilection for disorganization rather than organization. When you get alot of independent thinking people (or at least they think they are independent thinking) into a group and you start developing their own views that do not coincide. So, to get any type of organization going is very difficult and once you have a grove structure and a totally decentralized hierarchy, organization becomes counter to what Reformed Druidism is. It just doesn't work. If you get organized, if you start a putsch going, you're going to get dogma. You going to get ritualistic formalism. There is a certain amount of fixed ritualism between apostolic successions, but when you try to get a consistent viewpoint, you won't get that with Druidism as it was structured in the beginning. Now if people want to put forth a dogma and list beliefs in that dogma and then build a church based on that dogma that's fine, but that's not Reformed Druidism. They can call it what they want.

Mike: I can tell that Isaac was headed this direction early on.

Robert: Oh yeah.

Mike: With the SDNA.

Robert: I'd like to see the movement grow. I would like to see it grow to a magnitude of force that Isaac wanted, but not as an organization. I'd rather see it as a method of thought and as a method of looking into things rather than as a method of organization and control. That should never happen to Reformed Druidism. When Smiley tried to organize and put down rules and regulations and traditions....

Mike: You mean Shelton?

Robert: Right. Smiley was another guy. Yeah. He [Shelton] got some nasty reactions from me and most of the others because it wasn't against what he was saying, but for putting it down as a tight little thing. At that time, it was time of do your own thing, and to a large extent, it should continue to be the bat of the druids.

Mike: One of things I've noticed is that the hierarchy of the Druids gives a great deal of autonomy to the individual groves.

Robert: yeah.

Mike: Any damn thing they want as long as they leave the third order alone.

Robert: Right.

Mike: What made Isaac want to bring everyone into his own system, rather than his own grove?

Robert: I think you can call it psychological error. That's a matter between Isaac and his conscience. I hope that he's matured from that viewpoint. I don't know, and I haven't talked to him in many a year. I have a feeling that it was his Catholic seminary upbringing, which gives you a very tight structure and a desire towards a structure. He's a neat freak, I'm a messy freak. I guess you call it anal-retentive in Freudian terms. He always had a tendency to over organize. It's the problem every politician of trying to make people fit in molds. People are very very resistant to fitting in molds. In a mass, you can predict what people will do, but individually it's off the scale. If he ever got the thing going as a big mass, then he probably could get things organized like he wanted to. But then, getting that mass going together as an organization, given the traditional Druid resistance to being plugged into holes, is very difficult. It is probably beyond anyone, but an organizational genius. Who wants a fuehrer? Especially in the late 60's/early 70s? They were everything from Protestant to Unitarians, from every radical movement of that time, and they've become more so since that time. I've always felt that Druidism would be an excellent umbrella organization if you could get it to a reasonably size organization, if you get enough groves going, to incorporate as a non-profit church organization. God knows, it's always been non-profit. To give an umbrella of legitimacy to other odd-ball sects and I think there's a certain amount of need for that in the paleo-pagan, neo-pagan, occult, magickal community, and even for some of the stranger Muslim, Christian and Buddhist sects. There are a lot of very strange sects out there, some of them are dangerous, and some of them are just strange. They have their own little viewpoint. I don't care what someone believes as long as they don't try to put it on someone else and make them believe it. As long as he acts upon his own beliefs in his own group, that's fine. I think there is a need for that time of Umbrella organization and there have been attempts to set up those sorts of umbrella organizations. Most of them failed through the same problem as the Druids; that when you don't have a tight little dogma, people go off on their own little spritzes and pretty soon everything is breaking apart.

Mike: I know there were alot of things during the early 70s which may have made Isaac write in a slightly ruder style. I mean there are three years when nobody wrote to anybody and it looked pretty dead.

Robert: That was the time he was in Minneapolis and he was trying to get things going with the Gnostica newspaper. When you get involved in the old form of the occult community you run into organizational stasis and I suppose that was very frustrating for him, even though there were new people coming in. The Llywellyn press were very much 1920s operations...You have to remember that Isaac has always had a bent for ceremonial magic and that requires a tremendous amount of organizational control both mentally and physically. You can see where you would carry this bent over into the Druidism and attempt to over organize. As I say, if that's the way you want to set up your grove, fine!, But don't try to make me set up my grove that way.

Mike: Did you like being Archdruid in the early 70s?

Robert: Yeah. It was a nice thing to do occasionally. I missed conducting services since I resigned, and I've always wanted to get together with people near Beltane and Samhain and to hold a service. Actually getting together, since I'm out of contact with many people, is very difficult. Maybe one of these day, it'd be nice.

Mike: Did you always have weekly rituals outside of Quarter Days and Cross Quarter Days?

Robert: No. That's the way we started out. Then I worked out the phases of the moon nearest to Sunday and Noon. I didn't have them on Saturday because I like to watch Football myself, I was a 49ers fan, before they became good. That was the way we continued most of the time.

Mike: I heard that you used to have a lot of pizza conversations at the pizza parlor.

Robert: Some. After Cody & I got together, after each service we'd make a run down to Silano's and have an ice-cream splurge. There's always late night conversations. One winter I tried to organize classes in Gaelic, they lasted a little. I suppose people learned something. At that time I was only middling in my Irish and I could only teach basics. Mainly there were a lot of bullshit session at Bob Wilson's house, before we got going up to the hills. It's at bullshit sessions that you meet people. But organized bullshit sessions, no.

Mike: There weren't any other Druid groups in the Bay Area then?

Robert: There was the Order of Druids. They were a beneficent organization. They still have a few buildings called "Druid's Hall" which are nice to see. But I don't know if they still meet. It's kind of like the Scottish Rite Hall in Oakland, which is mostly a venue for concerts and conventions. I don't think the masons are very active in that hall anymore. I was just printing some directories of cemeteries this week and there are a couple of Druid cemeteries in Sonoma county..... Just Masonic offshoots founded in 19th century.

Mike: But in the Neo-Pagan community?

Robert: No, I don't think so. None that I'm aware. Wait, there were some people basing themselves out of Welsh tradition. I never observed whether they had services.

Mike: So, pretty much the Reformed Druids were sitting out alone in the field?

Robert: Usually it's in a grove. Usually we were sitting around passing the pipe or passing the bottle. I believe in very informal, once you get past the winds. You had the sacrifice. You had the meditation and then the bullshit session for 15 minutes and then break it up. Don't want to have long sermons. I've never been into long sermons. I usually took my readings out of the Chronicles, or occasionally dip into poetry (Yeats, Manningly, Hopkins.) Everyone knew what was coming after I said the first word, but I thought they were important verses for people to think about.

Mike: What does the word "Neo-Pagan" mean to you?

Robert: To me, it's an attempt to reawaken the spiritual sides that we lost when the evangelical Christian movement took over Europe. Unfortunately, most of the Neo-Pagans have taken a lot of New Age philosophy, most of which is clap-trap, and attempted to plug it in, rather than attempting to study what the pagans really thought and felt. Read your Roman philosophers, read your Greek philosophers, read your Celtic & Norse myths and attempt to extrapolate off that and you're better off. I'm more for a paleo-pagan viewpoint. On the other hand, for many people, a good exploration of their roots and developing a belief system on the natural world rather than the revealed world. For me, the revealed world is never true. It is true to the person who reveals it only, it is not true necessarily to anyone else, but maybe true to some. This is especially true when it has gone through the garbling that happens with all the holy books of the world. The bible is a prime example, although the Koran does a fine job of garbling Mohammad's message too. The Buddhist texts are probably not the bad of an example because they were never that organized or even pretended to be organized nearly as much. The Vedas are also garbled mythologies, but good mythology when you get down to it. Man's religious views were originally developed out of his relationship with nature and in order to understand what man is, one must get in contact with that side. The churches, especially the revealed churches, obstruct that path. The Puritan church, in particular, defines Nature as the realm of the Devil. Well that may be true from the viewpoint of primitive man, because Nature is dangerous and not kind or evil or good, it merely is. You've got to understand where you stand in the phynotony of life forms. One of the problems I have with the radical environmentalists is that they understand where the animals and plants fit in, but they don't understand where man fits into that relationship; just as the heavy timber industry doesn't understand where the animals and plants fit in. You have to consider both. The only way... not the only way, there's no such thing as the only way....one way for me is through the Nature question. Not necessarily an intellectual quest but a soul and vision quest than anything else. SO you can feel where you are and who you are. Find your spot and make it sacred.

Mike: That seems to be the message that the RDNA is trying to use. The cautiousness of ever trying to instruct somebody.

Robert: Right. What is true for you. Even for something as simple as " $2 + 2 = 4$ " is not necessarily true if you are using a base three. (Laugh) If you agree with the Zuni, who don't count 1-2-3-4-5 on their fingers, but who count on the interstices of their fingers 1-2-3-4. You would end up with a base 8 as a result. The truth may be objective, but the perception is very individual. We all only glimpse one facet and if we move we might see more facets. The object of research is to move and see as many facets as possible.

Mike: I like that.

Robert: You never get to glimpse them all. It's just like science. In the 19th century they figured they reached the end of physics, they had all the answers. Then came atomic theory. Every time we think we are getting close to understanding the universe, it throws us a curve and I think the curves are going to keep coming as long as man continues or intelligent life survives, because the little universe we have in our brain case is changing its perception all the time.... I think that each of us desires stasis, unchanging universe, and unchanging within an area of life. So we don't get surprised all the time. So we don't feel threatened all the time. Unfortunately the world doesn't work that way. IF you don't learn to flow a little bit, yourself, you're going to get run over by the river. Druidism is a way to flow. That's not a good analogy.

Mike: Religion is a difficult thing to pigeonhole.

Robert: They try. Every little sect of an organized religion thinks they have a copyright on the truth, and that's one thing that pissed off Isaac considerably and one thing that attracted him to Druidism. We didn't claim to have a copyright on truth, or to be the only way of approaching it. Unfortunately, once he found his truth he tried to pigeon hole it himself and that's where he and I part our philosophical company.

Mike: Well, that's all the room we have on this tape. Thank you for this interview.

May 8, 1993

Eric: This is Eric Hilleman. It is Saturday afternoon, May 8, 1993. I am recording an interview in the Carleton College library for the Carleton Oral History Program. I'm talking with Richard M. Shelton, a graduate of Carleton in the class of 1971. Mr. Shelton, who is currently Principal Mathematician for Unisys, was a Carleton math major who subsequently went on to earn a Ph.D. in mathematics from the University of Michigan.

Dick: That I have to correct: I was in the Ph.D. program, but I left before finishing my thesis.

Eric: I stand corrected. At Carleton, Dick was heavily involved in a number of things, including folk dancing and the Carleton Druids, more formally known as the Reformed Druids of North America, Carleton Grove. I'm told there was actually a large overlap in his time between those two groups, including both himself and Ellen Conway, who is now Ellen Conway Shelton. Mr. Shelton became Arch-Druid of the Carleton Grove during his time here, and has involved himself with interest in the subsequent ups and downs of the Carleton Druids ever since. That will form the principal subject of what we're going to talk about today. Dick, I wanted to start with some general things about your own background, and what brought you to Carleton, and things like that. Why don't you tell me about that.

Dick: I grew up in Illinois, down-state Illinois, nowhere near Chicago. Of course, Illinois is two states: Chicago and the rest of the state. My father's family is deeply rooted in Illinois, and I was born in Jacksonville, Illinois. My father went to school at Illinois College [in Jacksonville] and subsequently did graduate work in chemistry at the University of Iowa in Iowa City. He worked for a brief time at Dupont in Clinton, Iowa, but discovered that he didn't really like the industrial life, and. I'm reconstructing now, he jumped at the first academic job he found, which was at Western Illinois University in Macomb. That's where I grew up. Macomb is a very odd town, because it's in the middle of Bible belt rural America, but it is a university town. As a result, I grew up very strange: a faculty brat in a culture that I was very much not a part of.

Almost the only person in Macomb that I still feel comfortable talking to is my high school librarian, who graduated from Grinnell College. She suggested that I look at Grinnell, or more generally at the Associated Colleges of the Midwest. When I discovered Carleton, I applied here for early admission, and was subsequently accepted. I came here because of my roots, I think. [I was] an ardent Republican, but events in Vietnam and on campus changed that fairly soon. I'm now considerably more liberal, and now find myself in America at large sort of isolated and in the milieu of a culture in which I no longer feel I belong. So in a very real sense, nothing has changed!

That's how I came to be here. When I applied for admission, I was interested very much in music and in astronomy. I was convinced I was going to be an astronomy major. But when I came here, I discovered I didn't get along very well with the orchestra conductor, and the astronomy department at that time was sort of a college disgrace. It very quickly became clear that I wasn't going to major in astronomy. So I ended up sort of by default in mathematics.

Eric: Were there particular professors at the time, who favorably impressed you, or pushed you in that direction, or moved you in that direction because they were good, or was it not something that had so much to do with the teachers you encountered?

Dick: Oh, that's difficult to say. I think like many people that age I didn't have a real strong notion of what I wanted to do with the rest of my life. I considered majoring in several departments. I had come with a fair amount of mathematics under my belt from high school. My high school was not a regular rural Illinois high school, but the Laboratory School of Western Illinois University. We had the opportunity to take college courses there, so I came here with a fair amount of mathematics. Toward the end of my sophomore year I finally decided that mathematics was clearly what I'd had most of, and seemed to be best at, so I might as well stick with it.

There were a few professors that impressed me very favorably. Roger Kirchner, in particular, I had several classes with. I think any math major has to put in a plug for John Dyer-Bennett, who, for math majors, was a very good instructor, and taught me a great deal about the way mathematics is done, rather than specific mathematical material.

Of all the professors I had here, though, I think the person who left the deepest mark on me was not a math professor at all, but David Porter in Classics, from whom I had beginning Greek and (I think more importantly) the course in mythology, which is where I learned that I have a soul. I don't think it's exaggerating too much to say that it changed my life. I had been interested in mythology before then, but as a very academic sort of thing. It wasn't until I had that course that I began to see the relationship between the dry and dusty mythology that you read about in Bullfinch and people's real emotions and religious needs. I believe it's that course, more than any other at Carleton, or indeed any other time in my life, that made me realize that there is another dimension to the human experience besides the academic one.

Eric: Is that a course that you encountered real early at Carleton?

Dick: Fall term of my sophomore year.

Eric: Since it's relevant, as we get into talking about the Druids, do you want to say something about your religious background? You said that was when you first learned you had a soul; did you have a religious background when you came to Carleton?

Dick: My emotional framework is very much a product of my father, who is a typical product of rural Illinois: dyed-in-the-wool Republican, very stiff upper lip. It's almost a cardinal sin to show emotion. I remember vividly one occasion: he had borrowed a tape recorder from the university for some reason, I forget what it was now, but we were having fun just trying it out. At one point he read some Shakespeare into the thing. I thought that was rather interesting; I mean, I had never thought of my father as being interested in literature at all. It turns out in fact that his main extra-curricular activity at Illinois College had been the literary society, but I didn't know that, which gives you some indication of how much he kept things bottled up inside. At one point he read out "In Flanders Fields," which commemorates the fallen in World War I, and about midway through he started choking up. After a while, he just gave up trying to finish the poem, and said, "What's the matter with me? I don't understand." There was a big block on the expression of emotion of any sort.

In addition to this, my father, rather atypically for rural Illinois, was a devout atheist. When I was growing up, I remember a couple of occasions, once in nursery school and once in kindergarten, I think once in first grade, some attempt was made to make me familiar with Christianity, but it was clear that it was not something my parents were part of, and it was not something that I was particularly interested in, really. It didn't really touch my life very much. Basically, it involved just being dropped off at Sunday school and picked up. One of the things, I believe, that Druidism is about is that American Sunday schools do very little in actually talking about religion or ethics or morals, or anything of that sort. They're essentially just daycare centers.

It wasn't until I was in, oh, junior high school, I'd say, that I had any significant brush with Christianity. A friend of mine was a Baptist, and he invited me to Sunday school. I went for a few times, and I went to Vacation Bible School class during the summer one year, and became fairly familiar with the Bible. I found it fascinating. I don't think I could ever say that I really believed anything that was in it, as far as the existence of God, much less Christ as the son of God. And to this day, I tend to think that that sort of "religion" is not important to me. It's not what I derive my ethical bearings from. The religious elements in there don't represent things that I regard as historical, although certainly there are a lot of historical things in the Bible. I think my primary interest in the Bible is the historical development of that culture and how the religious elements played off the historical elements.

But I think it's fair to say that by the time I graduated from high school, I had a much sounder grounding in Christian tradition than many people of comparable age in today's society. In fact, I find it very disturbing that many of the ideas and many of the references to religious things or Biblical things one has to explain today; you can't just take for granted that people will know and make the connection. I believe that impoverishes our culture.

But I cannot call myself religious, and it wasn't until Porter's mythology course that I began to understand what religion really is about, and why it is that religion exists as part of human culture. That was the beginning of a very profound change for me. I'm not sure that most people would call me religious now. On the other hand, in a very real sense

I am a very religious person, and I think the conjunction of the mythology course and my introduction to Druidism broadened my life dramatically. My spring term sophomore year academically was a disaster, but in a very real sense it was the beginning of my life.

Eric: Let's talk about your introduction to Druidism and your memories of your first encounters with this on campus, or how you got involved.

Dick: Early in sophomore year there was an article in the 'Tonian about Druids, and it mentioned that there were three on campus. There was a photo showing all three of them holding a service. I didn't really think very much of it at the time. It so happened, however, that one of the three, the Arch-Druid, was a good friend of mine by the name of Steven Savitzky, who was two years ahead of me. Steven was involved with a group of people on Third Burton, which was a hot-bed of campus radicalism at the time. The ring-leader, undoubtedly, was Joe Schuman. (Both Joe and Steve were class of '69.)

Joe Schuman looms large in my view of Carleton, and I think many people's. He was, I believe, in Israel my freshman year, so I didn't meet him until my sophomore year, when he came back as a senior. I was taking Econ 10 my first term, and he was in that class. That was an eye-opener; I was still nominally a Republican at that point, I think, although changing fast. '69 of course was the year that the Vietnam war took serious dramatic turns, especially since everybody expected that after the '68 election Nixon would wind the war down. It not only didn't happen that way, it went very dramatically in the opposite direction. It really galvanized the radical community at Carleton, of which I was not a part. But I became good friends with many people who were a part of that.

Steve was one of them, and I had known him in other contexts as well. He was a computer nerd; I didn't really consider myself a computer nerd, but I knew how to use the computer. I don't think I realized at that time how large computers would eventually loom in my life, and they didn't for a long while, not until after I left graduate school, in fact. Of course, at Unisys I live and breathe them. But I was very early attracted to them, and that was another context in which I was familiar with Steve.

One day, in April of '69, we were just sort of walking together, talking about something, at this point I can't remember what; it was probably related to computers, and at one point he just sort of turned and looked at me and said, "You'd make a good Arch-Druid." I was blown away! Over the next few weeks he gave me a few things to read about Druidism, and I glommed on to it. At this point in my spiritual development it was exactly the input I needed: a large window into several different religious traditions.

After the original purpose of Druidism was accomplished (the abolition of the religious attendance requirement) back in the early '60s, Druidism shifted to become the sort of thing that I found it to be: a spiritual anchor for people who, for some reason or another, needed something to hang on to. In Druidism there are largely two main groups. There are people like me, who are essentially religious naïfs, if you will; and then there are the "spiritually battered": people who grew up in very strict hellfire-and-damnation traditions, who simply find that it is more damaging than it is helpful. Steve and I were of the former camp. There was always a large contingent from KARL, the campus radio station at the time, who were also of that camp; technical nerds, with essentially no religious upbringing.

The Druid Chronicles I found very interesting. I think more important, however, was the tradition in Druidism of bringing readings and discussion of other religious traditions, particularly Taoism and Zen Buddhism, the two big threads in Druidism at that time. Both of them, I think, go back to David Frangquist, who was one of the founders. Taoism, to me, was the "universal truth," and I still believe it. The formal trappings of Taoism are something I never had much truck with, but the underlying philosophy speaks very deeply to my soul, and it's largely what I understand by the term "Druidic." It was very liberating for me, and it gave me a framework in which to explore my religious or spiritual feelings.

After Druid services were started again that spring at Beltaine, there were something like seventy-two people at Beltaine, which shows you what Steve had done with Druidism...

Eric: It shows you what an article in the Carletonian can do!

Dick: Well, I think, too, it was because Steve was involved in so many things, and a large number of those people were friends of Steve, and friends of Joe's. A large number of them were folk dancers, which both Steve and Joe were involved with, as was I. Toward the end of the year, [since] Steve was graduating, he appointed me Arch-Druid pro tem, and the next fall I was elected formally as Arch-Druid. I held the office for two years, until I graduated two years later.

Eric: You hadn't been Preceptor nor Server prior to that?

Dick: No.

Eric: Seventy-two people! That's a high point!

Dick: Druidism goes in cycles. It was quite popular when it was founded, probably for all the wrong reasons: it was an easy way to protest the religious requirement. After the religious requirement was abolished, it still stayed in strength for a while, I think largely on the strength of David Frangquist. I've never met him, but the trail I've seen in the Grove Archives and the College Archives and the correspondence I've had with him has been full of a very charismatic personality.

When Frangquist left — I believe he left campus in '66 — Druidism started to fade. Gary Zempel was his successor as Arch-Druid. Zempel himself is an interesting character, a radical who "caught Quakerism" and dropped out of society, all the time remaining a chief engineer for General Electric. He had a great deal of trouble reconciling General Electric with his spiritual beliefs.

His successor, Thomas Carlisle, left campus early I don't know the details. He was the last Druid priest left on campus, despite the fact that there were still a few people interested in Druidism, mostly at KARL. Marta Peck called Frangquist and was consecrated to the priesthood via long distance. She started the grove up again, and turned it over to Steve, and Steve took it and ran, we were on another cycle here. We caught the radicalism of the 60s, and that became the core of the next generation of Druidism.

After I left in '71, the Grove carried on for a couple of years, but starting dying down again in the early 70s, until the Isaac affair, at which [time] a good friend of ours on campus, Don Morrison, started the Grove up again. It went again for a few years, and it dropped back. And then I didn't hear a lot about Druidism for a long time, until in the early 80s, I had a letter from somebody on campus. I can't remember who it was now. I sent a copy of the Chronicles and I believe a copy of The Green Book, a collection of readings that Frangquist put together from, oh, all kinds of places: Zen Buddhism, Taoism, a few things from the Old and New Testaments. We stuck in something, "Sayings of the Psychologists," a reading from [Robert] Ornstein's book about how people repeat formulas over and over again, until what becomes important is the formula, rather than the underlying spirit.

And then again we didn't hear anything until the mid-80s. I got a letter from Heiko Koester, and I came down and celebrated Beltaine here with them on May 1. It must have been 1988, because it was the 25th anniversary: we set this thing up and were converting the date into the Reformed Druid Calendar, in which the year is dated from '63, the founding, and it came out 25! We sat there and looked at each other: my God, it's the 25th anniversary! It was impossible to believe!

By this time, the Grove had taken an interesting turn. I don't really know where this impetus came from, although I suspect Isaac had something to do with it. The people who were interested in Druidism were dealing not with the traditional religious cultures, like Zen Buddhism and even Christianity, but with alternative religions, things like paganism and Wicca (I think they pronounce it wik-ka, but the original pronunciation was wit-cha, a good old Anglo-Saxon word.) Heiko was interested in Native American religious tradition, and several of his friends were too. I think the chief focus of their activity was a sweat lodge that they'd set up, I don't know precisely where it was, somewhere around the Farm House.

That was fine with me; I didn't have any trouble with that. The first letter I had from Heiko was a little careful, because I think he was — afraid is not the right term — concerned that us older Druids might not see paganism or Native American spirituality as an acceptable form of Druidism. But, that's just nonsense. Druidism isn't about acceptable forms of religious spirituality; it's about religious needs. I myself find paganism, as it's practiced in modern America, a bit on the silly side in most cases, but Heiko and his friends had put something together that I found quite attractive, actually. The Beltaine service that they held was the first overt Druidism that I had done for years, and it was in a very real sense a homecoming, quite apart from the fact that it was here on campus.

So I wish these people luck. I am certainly willing to help preserve traditions, but it is not my place to set these traditions in concrete, to try to force them on anything, because not forcing things on people, in a religious sense, is what Druidism originally began for. It's the underlying principle that, I think, connects all of this stuff.

Eric: I'd appreciate it if you could talk a little bit about the forms of Druidism as they existed at Carleton when you were getting involved with it; what a typical gathering would have been like, the kind of rituals that were done, or whatever went on. What happens when Druids get together?

Dick: A lot less than meets the imagination of the unwashed! The original services had a very strong Christian flavor to them. They were modeled, I think, unabashedly on Congregational and Episcopalian rituals. A large amount of Celtic mythology was intermixed, to try to make it as outlandish as possible, because an important part of the original formulation of Druidism was to make it so outlandish that if, for some reason, religious credit were granted for these ridiculous services, then Druidism could be unmasked as just another way to get chapel credit, holding the whole religious attendance requirement up to ridicule.

But when they put the service together, they included a few remarkable things, including something that when I read it the very first time — actually, I didn't read it; I heard it at a service the very first time — it hit me right between the eyes:

O Lord, thou art without form

yet we worship thee in these forms;

O Lord, thou art everywhere

yet we worship thee here;

O Lord, thou hast no need of prayers and sacrifices yet we offer thee these prayers and sacrifices.

Over time — in fact, already that's not the original form; the original form talks about sins: "Overlook these three sins that are due to our human limitations" — already that had been changed to "errors," and since then I think the Lord has dropped out of it. (Druidism at Carleton today sort of sees itself as a Goddess religion, rather than a patriarchal religion; I have no real complaint with that.) I guess the point I'm trying to make here is that in putting this thing together, they actually touched, at least for me and I believe for many other people, or it wouldn't still be around, some very deep religious or spiritual currents.

After that invocation, the Arch-Druid and the Preceptor would draw a Druid symbol on the ground. (The Druid sign is a circle with two [parallel] lines through it.) The Arch-Druid would enter it and consecrate the Waters of Life, which were rumored to be one part scotch to seven parts water, but when I inherited the Paraphernalia, I sat down and actually measured the thing, and it turned out to be one part scotch to two parts water, so it was quite a bit stronger than people realized. And on Beltaine, the ratio was reversed. You have to realize that at this time this was one of the few places one could get liquor on campus, or even legally drink it!

Eric: The seventy-two people becomes clearer.

Dick: And then the Waters of Life would be passed in a chalice around the circle. People would partake of them. The chalice was carried from person to person by the Server (whence the name.) After that there was usually a period of silent meditation, and then the Arch-Druid would "do something." Depending on the Arch-Druid, it might be a reading. Fisher (the original founder of Druidism) used the occasion to give a sermon, and since that time has become an Episcopalian priest. He was into this in a big way. A lot of the original trappings were stolen directly from the Episcopalian way of doing things. After the sermon, people would petition the Earth Mother for things, like good weather for the weekend, or something like that.

This was all done in a very light-hearted way. I think that's the other thing that I learned from Druidism, that spirituality is not just serious. If it is only serious, it is missing a large part of the human experience. Certainly the original Druidism was very light-hearted. On one occasion, this is, I think, documented in the Archives now, Howard Cherniack, who is now I believe a lawyer and not religious at all, from everything I've heard of him, was the Preceptor. In the formula of consecrating the Waters of Life, at one point the Arch-Druid is supposed to ask the Preceptor, "Has the Earth Mother given forth of her bounties?" The proper response is, "She has!" One day, he just said, "Yup!" and they had hard a time keeping a straight face during the service for weeks thereafter!

This became known, by the way, as the "Cherniack Response." It's an official part — inasmuch as anything is official in Druidism — an official part of the liturgy. On occasion you will have a Cherniack Response. And it's very difficult to keep a straight face!

I wasn't very good at giving sermons, so I generally tended not to. I confined myself to readings, for the most part, originally chosen largely from The Green Book that Frangquist had put together — it's just a marvelous collection of things — and then from my own readings, particularly from Sufism, which I was interested in to some extent. Again, a large part of the trappings of Sufism I don't find particularly attractive, but the underlying philosophy and much of the poetry is just pure gold. One of the objections that I had to the original Green Book is that there was very little there from Islam. I never really understood that, because there are some marvelous things in Islam. But like many of the Judeo-Christian religions, a large part of it is hellfire and brimstone and doesn't really say much, personally, to me.

The weekly services were pretty much as I've just described. Each of the major feast days had its own ceremony. Again, although originally there were set ceremonies, by the time I joined Druidism, the liturgy had become fairly fluid, and a lot was left to the discretion of the presiding priest. The feasts were almost always celebrated in the evening, the evening before the official day. Samhain, for example, the beginning of the religious year, is an ancient festival from the Celtic tradition. The official day of Samhain is November 1st, but it actually begins at sundown the previous day. This period was considered a day between years. It was during that day that the forces of the underworld could come out, and that's the origin of Hallowe'en.

"Us Reformed Druids" were pretty tame: no burnt sacrifices, certainly not human sacrifices, although in the Celtic tradition there is very strong evidence for them. (Although, one always has to remember that virtually all of the historical information about the historical Druids came from their enemies; so a lot of the stuff you have to take with a grain of salt.) Our celebrations chiefly involved lighting a fire; the basic service was pretty much the same as the ordinary weekly service, but it had additional parts in it to commemorate the specific day.

Eric: Where did you hold your meetings? Was it on the Hill of Three Oaks?

Dick: We had three locations that were used with some regularity. I'd say the majority of services were held on the Hill of Three Oaks. I always preferred Monument Hill, although in passing I have to mention that at that time Monument Hill was kept quite mowed, and it was much more manicured than it is now. The grove near the monument, the circular grove, was a very wide and open place, and from it you could see a lot of the Upper Arb. To me, that's the heart of Druidism, and in fact, that's where Druidism started. That's where the first services were held.

Occasionally we would hold services on what we knew as Faculty Hill. If you take the drive that goes behind Goodhue, and go down across the creek and up on the other side where there's that Postage Stamp Prairie, there's a road leading off towards the east that goes by an open area that we knew as Faculty Hill. That's where the Classics Department Picnic was usually held. The Arch-Druid, if he happened to be a Classics student, usually presided over that ceremony as well. That's where the first Samhain service was held, and traditionally, in our day, that's where we usually held Samhain services. But typically those were the only services that were held there.

Nowadays there are several other spots that they use, and I know that they don't use Faculty Hill, because when I walked by there with Michael Scharding, he was surprised to discover that any services had ever been held there. And it's not called Faculty Hill anymore; I'm not sure what they call it. It's not really a hill anyway. But those were the three main locations.

Eric: It was you, wasn't it, who actually added something in Greek to one of the books of liturgy?

Dick: Yes. I was asked to do the officiating there [at the Classics Department Picnic], and a friend of mine helped me write a "traditional" Greek sacrifice, traditional in quotes; who knows what actually happened in ancient Greece! We knew that one was supposed to pour libations in the name of various gods, so we did that. And then in addition, I translated the opening part of the Druid service, that I just recited a ways back on the tape, into Greek, and that's there as well.

Eric: You mentioned earlier having received the Paraphernalia. What exactly was all that?

Dick: The most important part of the Paraphernalia were the mimeograph masters for The Druid Chronicles, which I believe have since vanished. We did a printing in '71, and I believe that was the last time they were actually used. There was another printing after that, but I haven't seen a copy of that, and I don't know whether [it] came from the same masters or not.

In addition there was a red glass chalice, about four inches in diameter, I'd say. That, I'm pretty sure, was not original. The original chalice, I believe, was green; the tradition is very fuzzy on that. There was a reversible chasuble that was made, I forget by whom, back in Fisher's day for Fisher himself. Fisher had a flair for the dramatic. Everybody else wore sheets, but he wore black! So he stood out, with this chasuble in addition to that. It was primarily green on one side and primarily red on the other. The tradition very early grew up that during the summer half of the year, from May until November 1st, one wore the green side out, and for the [other] half of the year, when actually very little ever happened, except on February 1st, which was one of the feast days, you wore the red side out. (During the winter half of the year, also, the Waters of Life were the Waters of Sleep: they didn't have any scotch in them.) That chasuble was still around in my day, and still around in Don Morrison's day; but I think it's since vanished.

There was originally a staff for the Arch-Druid, but that was lost before my time. A friend of mine gave me a staff, but it turned out not to be particularly useful, because in getting services ready and hauling stuff to wherever the service was to be held, you needed all the hands free you could get. The staff just got in the way, so I tended not to use it. I don't think that's part of the tradition anymore anyway.

Then there were three books. These were all named because of the color of the covers they were in: The Black Book, which contained all the liturgy; The Green Book, which was the book of readings that Frangquist had put together; and The Blue Book, which was all kinds of miscellaneous archives. To this day, when we say "the Carleton Archives," we have to be careful about whether we're referring to the Grove Archives, which was The Blue Book, or the Carleton College Archives, which, after a couple of these busts in the boom-or-bust cycle of Druidism, we began to appreciate as the Right Place to keep things!

The sort of things that were in The Blue Book were letters from various places, including a note from Lee Mauk, the chapel monitor who informed Fisher (I believe) that the Dean of Men did not look kindly on these chapel slips being submitted by Reformed Druids, and would not count toward the chapel requirement. There were copies of Tonian articles, and things of that sort, things of vague historical interest.

That was largely it.

Eric: These things were always passed on from one Arch-Druid to another?

Dick: Yes. In addition to the chalice, there was a clear glass cruet, which is what you used to mix the water and the scotch together. It had a line marked on it: so much water, so much scotch. That's what I was referring to earlier when I said that I sat down and measured what the actual proportions of things was. That, too, I think has vanished.

These things went astray several times. One of the Arch-Druids, three after me, by the name of Steve Corey, didn't appoint an Arch-Druid when he left campus. So he had all of the Paraphernalia in his apartment [in the cities], and when he left the cities, he turned them all over to a friend and said, "Here, take care of these while I'm gone." Well, he never came back, and at one point Don Morrison had enlisted my help trying to run these things down, because I had known Steve. We were looking all over the cities where we could think to find them. I say "we"; I was doing this by long distance, because I was in Ann Arbor at the time. One of my Carleton roommates was my leg man here in the cities, and he was quite amused that we had managed to lose the "Dead Sea Scrolls," as he called them.

But that's about all there was in the Paraphernalia. It wasn't an extensive collection. I think the interesting things were the historical documents. Although many of the originals have, I think, been lost, when I left I Xeroxed most of the stuff of interest there. My successor, Glenn McDavid, also made several copies, and I think left copies of a lot of this stuff in the College Archives, so most of that stuff has not vanished irretrievably. But the non-paper things that were in the [Paraphernalia] I think are all completely vanished now.

Eric: In your day was there a permanent, or semi-permanent altar? In the early Druid days they built an altar and the anti-Druids came and destroyed the altar, and they built it again. Was there one in use?

Dick: First of all, with two exceptions, we never really used an altar in my day, and there wasn't a "built" altar anywhere. One of the two exceptions was the big boulder that's still on the Hill of Three Oaks. Whenever we really needed an altar, that's what we impressed into service.

The other exception was the IBM 1620 in the computer lab, which is where we held the Oimele service on February 1st. As near as we can tell, historically, Oimele was a celebration of the birth of lambs, which occurs about this time in England. The Christian church took it over and made it Candlemass. The Christian church has this wonderful way with holidays: if anybody insists on celebrating something, the general attitude is, "Well, if you can't beat 'em, join 'em; we'll just co-opt this thing and make it a holiday, "which is why, by the way, Samhain is not the festival of any particular saint, but the festival of All saints: one saint wasn't enough to make that properly Christian, I guess!

But Oimele was always held in the computer lab, because it's damn cold on February 1st in Northfield!

Eric: The Druids always have a strong streak of the practical!

Dick: Yes, there's that to be said. The other reason it was held there was because one of the early Druids, the connection with computers goes back almost to the very beginning, was a man by the name of Richard Smiley, who later went on to graduate school in computer science. While he was at Carleton he wrote a program that set up various repetitive loops in the 1620 computer, and you could program this so that you could get the loops to resonate in various frequencies. Because there was a fair amount of electro-magnetic radiation from the computer, you could pick this up on a radio. So you took a transistor radio down there, and you programmed in the notes that you wanted to have the thing play, and you could program it to play any song you liked.

So he wrote this program up for the IBM Systems Journal. It was published as a separate program available to IBM users everywhere in the world, and part of the documentation includes several songs that came pre-programmed in the deck of cards that you'd get with this program. One of the songs was the "Chant to the Earth Mother," and that's what we had the computer play as part of the Oimeic service. For that occasion the 1620 became our altar!

Imagine, if you will, slaving away at a computer program in the dead of night, and having, all of a sudden, the door open, the wind whistling in from the outside, and in march three or four, maybe five or six people dressed in outlandish robes who come around and circle the computer, chanting, "Hallow this altar; hallow this altar, "and then set up a radio on the thing and push off a program that plays some weird tune, and then pass a chalice full of milk (this was, you remember, commemorating the birth of the lambs) and hold this off-the-wall ceremony, and then vanish! We saw an awful lot of startled faces.

Eric: About the garb for people: did all the communicants, or whatever the proper term is, appear garbed outlandishly, or was that mostly the people officiating?

Dick: That was primarily the officers. If there were several priests around, this happens on occasion, but not often; there were during my senior year, and there were in the year after the founding, but typically there are only a couple of priests. But if there are a lot of priests around, it's sort of a badge of honor to wear something to set you apart. Not to set you apart as a priest, but to draw attention to the fact that we are Druids.

It was fairly common for priests to have some kind of special garment. I went so far as to have a tunic and a chasuble made up for me, but most people contented themselves with a cape or something of that sort.

Eric: Tell me about becoming a priest, your passage through the orders, as it were.

Dick: One becomes a First Order Druid by partaking of the Waters of Life at a service and letting the Arch-Druid know that you want to be a Druid. That's about all it takes: a verbal commitment of interest. Well, that happened to me at the very first Druid service I ever attended. The next week, I was inducted into the Second Order, which involves polishing off any Waters of Life that are left after they're passed. Ordinarily, the remainder is consigned to the Earth Mother, poured out on the altar or onto the ground, to the formula:

This portion of thy bounty we return to thee, O our Mother, even as we must return to thee.

But if you're inducting somebody to the Second Order, you give him the rest of the Waters of Life.

And then the following, no: it was at the new moon. Part of becoming a Third Order priest is performing an over-night vigil, staying awake all night, and I insisted on doing it at the [new] moon, because some obscure passage in The Druid Chronicles recommended the new moon as the time to begin New Projects.

I really paid for taking this literally, because it was the worst weather we have had in spring for a very long time! It rained cats and dogs; it was just a disaster. I couldn't keep my fire going. But I resolutely refused to take that as a sign! About half-way through the night, the rain started going away. By dawn the weather had become much more decent.

It was long before this, even before I had become a First Order Druid, that I had what I believe I can legitimately call a "religious experience." It was after Steve and I had been talking about Druidism and religion in general and Zen Buddhism. We had sort of been talked out, I guess, and we just sort of sat there on the Hill of Three Oaks. I sat there looking up, at the Oaks, at the clouds in the sky, and a very odd experience came over me. It's very hard for me to put into words what, really, it felt like. But I had never felt like that ever before in my life: a feeling of being at one-ness with the world, of being part of something that is very much bigger than my own personal life, a sense of connectedness, if you will.

Between bouts of being soaked on my vigil. . . I firmly believe that the whole point of the vigil, as with many other (not necessarily religious) induction ordeals that may involve sacred drugs, or physical hazing of some sort, I really believe that underlying all of these things is an attempt to disconnect the cerebral cortex from rationality: to get it to perceive the world in a different way than it's used to. And it's this dimension that somebody as deeply involved in academics as I was in my first year at Carleton, and somebody who was taught from birth, practically, that one should keep one's emotions bottled up inside — it was this whole dimension that I had really never uncorked before. And it just came spilling out during my sophomore year. This particular instance on the Hill of Three Oaks with Steve, and later at my vigil, just feeling a part of everything in a way that had no rational sense to it — it was a very moving experience, one that I've felt many times since then, usually not in a religious context. Druid services never really touched me very deeply, with a few exceptions. Most often, during a reading that meant a lot to me. Or as I mentioned earlier, the very first time I heard the original incantation, it just spoke voluminously to me, that, yes, this is Right.

But the services themselves — of course, I never really experienced services as an on-looker. I was involved in putting them on from very early on. So a large part of my experience during these things [was] thinking of the stage management. A large part of my religious growth at this time was reading things to find appropriate things to bring to a service to read after the Meditation. I did an extraordinary amount of reading, particularly Zen Buddhism and Taoism, but in other traditions as well.

Eric: Have you had religious experiences beyond the feeling of connectedness? In my readings in The Druid Chronicles some people talk about visions that they've had in the Arb or on the Hill. Is that something that has any relevance to you, yourself?

Dick: Robert Graves speaks of a feeling of, or a perceiving of, the Numinous. I wouldn't go so far as to say that I have had visions, but there are definitely times that I've been overwhelmed by something. I believe that it's that kind of experience that underlies things like visions in people that are more visually suggestible than I am, perhaps. Is it God visiting us? I don't really know. The oriental religions have this wonderful phrase: "That is a question not tending to edification." I believe this is one of those questions; that worrying about what this thing actually is is not the right response to it. It's a rational response to it. The correct response to it is simply to let it happen, and to let the feeling one has when this happens inform and become a part of one's life in other situations as well.

I have never felt that the feeling I have in situations like this forms the rock upon which one can build an ethical system, much less a religious mythology, which is what I believe most of the Christian religion, and many other religions, to be, primarily. There is a core there of an appreciation of the Numinous that gets expressed in mythological terms, and then somewhere along the line, the truth of the mythology somehow becomes the important religious question. When that happens, you're no longer talking spirituality, you're talking something just entirely different, politics, in fact, is all it really boils down to; power politics.

The number of people that I've talked to that feel that they are religious, but feel that their particular church has nothing whatsoever to offer them spiritually, I find just astounding. I think it's just part of the natural course of religion, that the way people try to describe their religious feelings, the mythology they use to describe it, the ceremonies they use to try to evoke it, somehow take on their own life and become divorced from the actual underlying spiritual experience that started this whole process in the first place. At some point along the way, frequently one finds priesthoods being set up, priesthoods becoming entrenched political entities, and at this point you're so far away from meeting the spiritual needs of people that I think it's a mistake to call them a religion, if by religion one means something spiritual.

Eric: Is Druidism a religion? To you?

Dick: To me? No. I don't think I would call it a religion. Is my Druidism a religion? It is for me. I think that's a large part of what "Official" Druidism is about: helping people to find their own solution to the Spiritual Problem, or their own answers to their spiritual needs. I would not characterize what I feel, or what I believe, as Reformed Druidism; it's my own brand. I believe any true Druid has his or her own brand, which of necessity goes beyond the Basic Tenets as spelled out in The Druid Chronicles.

Is it reasonable to categorize it as religion? For example, does it make sense, as we tried to do on one occasion, to get a Druid priest classified as a priest for a IV-D deferment for the draft (which was an important issue back once upon a time)? Well, I think I'll dodge that issue and say that this is one of those questions that does not lead to edification. The proof is not in the definition, but in the living of the life.

Eric: I'd like to ask about reactions from others at Carleton, and since Reformed Druidism is one of those things that people aren't used to, when they encounter it I'm sure you've had quite a range of reactions. I'm curious about, especially at Carleton, how your peers who were not Druids saw the Druids at that time, and what their reactions were. I mentioned before that in the Early Chronicles, there is talk about the anti-Druids. Did you have experience with anti-Druids during your Arch-Druidship? I'm interested in the reactions of others.

Dick: Carleton in my day was a very tolerant place. When I was there, here, I don't think I ever encountered what I would characterize as anti-Druidism. There was some of this in the early years, although many of the founders thought that it was primarily because these people didn't like them as people, rather than that there was anything religious involved in it. We have always had a great deal of flak from St. Olaf. I think more has been written about Druidism in the St. Olaf newspaper than in the 'Tonian, and it is all very self-righteously negative.

After I left Carleton, one of the things that pained me greatly was the advent of a large group of fundamentalist Christians on campus. To this day, it is difficult for me to understand how fundamentalist Christians would choose Carleton as a place to come. But there were such people, and several Druids had rather heated discussions and on occasion even violent interchanges with fundamentalist Christians on campus. And that continues to this day, which is something, as I say, I have a great deal of difficulty understanding.

I do not believe that Druidism is fundamentally incompatible even with fundamentalist Christianity. Druidism, I believe, says more about the importance of somebody coming oneself to be convinced of the correctness of one's spiritual ideas, [and] the importance and value of examining other religious traditions. In that sense, I suppose, some fundamentalist Christians would object to it. I don't mean to lump all fundamentalism into the Christian camp. There are fundamentalists in other religions as well. But I think, as a historical fact, people who have come to Druidism came to Druidism because traditional Christianity does not meet their spiritual needs, and so as a simple historical fact, people who have been through Druidism by and large tend not to settle down into mainstream Christian traditions. I think a large number from my day have ended up in some kind of Christian church, although the boundaries here are a little wavy: a lot of people would not call Unitarianism Christian.

This is worth saying, too: Druidism as I know it is very much a Carleton phenomenon. Druidism transplanted away from Carleton, and there have been many attempts, has never done well. We tried to start a grove in Ann Arbor and failed miserably. This is very ironic, actually: I keep saying that an important part of Druidism for me was to help me get away from the rational straight-jacket that my life was being played out in, and yet Druidism for me is only possible among a community of very intelligent people. This is a paradox that I've never quite understood, and never plumbed to my satisfaction. But the fact remains that I do not enjoy Druidism in the company of people who are credulous, and that's usually what we got when we tried to hold services in Ann Arbor, despite the fact that that is another very enlightened place with lots of intelligent people around. There's something about the liberal arts tradition that made Druidism click, and Druidism away from Carleton just does not work.

What I believe is the biggest threat to Druidism did not come from Christianity at all, but rather from paganism: l'affaire Isaac, the whole affair of Isaac. I've never met Isaac, and to this day I cannot be sure what his motives were. We were not particularly charitable in assigning him motives at the time. It seemed to us that what he wanted to do was to turn Druidism into his own private bailiwick, and set himself up somehow as a Druid pope, a Big Man In Paganism, if you will, latching on to an organization that was older than any of the other pagan organizations that were common at the time that paganism took off.

His original letter [in 1974] proposed that we stop shilly-shallying around about what Druidism really is, and say, "This is what Druidism is," and then put out a paragraph that was the most nonsensical thing that I have ever read in a very long time. It was just anathema to what many of us thought, ah, yes, here it is. This is the paragraph that Isaac proposed:

The Reformed Druids of North America is an Eclectic Reconstructionist Neo-Pagan Priestcraft, based primarily upon Gaulish & Celtic sources, but open to ideas, deities and rituals from many other Neo-Pagan belief systems. We worship the Earth-Mother as the feminine personification of Manifestation, Be'al as the masculine personification of Essence, and numerous Gods and Goddesses as personifications of various aspects of our experience.

Well, that doesn't say anything to me. I'm not sure I worship anything; I'm not even sure I know what worship is. But this, at any rate, was not what Druidism was about for me, or for any of the Druids, certainly before my time, and for most of them after my time, until Druidism at Carleton began to take on a paganist flavor. And even when it did take on a paganist flavor, it was a responsible paganism.

Chiefly what we objected to with Isaac's approach is the incredible amount of formalism that he wanted to graft onto Druidism. Rule books, and ceremonies that had to be performed just so, and all kinds of various orders of priesthood, just all the kinds of religious paraphernalia that we were trying to escape from in Reformed Druidism. It was just antithetical to the way we saw spiritual things.

For me this was a very agonized period. The letter came out in '74, and the affair really ended in '76 when he published his huge compendium of paganist writings. When he finally published it, we had made it clear to him that it was fine with us if he published it, but that it was not a Druid publication, it was his publication. We said, "We're not about to stand in your way, we're not even going to say that this is not a Good Thing, because for you it clearly is something that means something greatly to you. But it's a mistake to portray this as Reformed Druidism, because that's not what the Reform is all about." And several people suggested, rather pointedly, that he might want to go off and schis. So he had a schism, and called himself the Schismatic Druids of North America. After the publication of his volume, Schismatic Druidism faded rather quickly.

But during this period, from '74 to '76, there was a lot of correspondence with Isaac and with other more traditional Druids, trying to figure out how we should deal with Isaac. During this period I first faced the question of what, really, do I believe. What does religion mean to me? And it was only after I saw myself getting very upset, almost homicidally upset, that I began to appreciate the difficulties that can accrue to a religious dispute. I had always wondered before this time what the fuss and uproar was in Northern Ireland: how can two religious, two Christian sects get so far from the teachings of Christ that they would kill one another over things? In my own small way I began to appreciate that, and it really drained me.

It also changed my willingness to hold services in Ann Arbor at the time. We were having trouble with the grove there anyway, because as I mentioned it was not religiously satisfying to hold services there. But after the Isaac affair, I was no longer even willing to try to explain to people, "No, that's not what I'm doing; this is what I'm doing, and this is why I'm doing this." My Druidism became a very much more private affair from that point on.

I'm still very happy that there is something like Druidism going on. I'm still willing to come out of retirement to help when things get sticky. And I don't object to leading a service in the company of right-minded people, doesn't that sound awful? But I am not an evangelist. For a while I would have characterized myself as an evangelist, I think. But I no longer am.

In fact, I've come to believe that in its own quiet way, Druidism is about non-evangelism; that it is one of the cardinal errors of mankind to propagate what one believes by any means other than by example. If one feels strongly enough about something, the right way to make people understand that is to live it, not to preach it. It wasn't until Isaac that I really understood that.

Eric: Did you meet him?

Dick: No. I came this close. He was in the cities for a while during '75-'76, I think, and actually came down and participated in some services here at Carleton. At the reunion in the summer of '76, several of us old-style Druids came, and I had written to Isaac, saying, "I would like very much to meet you; I think you should meet us." Arguments on paper have a way of living their own kind of life and cut more deeply than they are meant to. I felt that it was important for us to meet face to face. But he made excuses and left for the west coast before then. So I never did have a chance to. I understand now he's severely disabled, from some disease or another, which is not anything I would wish on my worst enemy, even Isaac. I haven't heard from him in, literally, decades.

Eric: I wanted to ask also something about the organizational phenomenon of the RDNA. As part of becoming Arch-Druid at Carleton you became ex officio Chair of the Council of Dalon ap Landu. I wonder if you wanted to say some things about that, and the phenomenon of people, after having graduated from Carleton, going out, still being part of the organizational structure; and maybe something about the strengths or weaknesses of the Council.

Dick: Originally Druidism was simply a Carleton phenomenon. Several of the early Druids, however, when they left Carleton didn't want to drop Druidism, and started groves in other places. Very shortly it became evident that there needed to be some broader organization than just the campus organization. The priests of the time, there must have been three or four maybe, decided (out of the air really) to say that the supreme authority, such as there is any in Druidism, is the Council of Third Order Priests. The Third Order is the Order of Dalon ap Landu, so this is the Council of Dalon ap Landu.

There are several higher orders, but they function more or less like honorary degrees. There's no real activity in the higher orders. Originally, I think, they were simply part of the initial cult of outrageousness. They've not proved useful and have largely died out. It's the first three orders that are important.

The basic structure of a grove is to have a priest to lead the service, and a Second Order Druid to assist, and a First Order Druid to serve as the Server. These three people are our minyan. You have to have three to start a local organization. If you don't have at least three, there's no real point in having a formal organization.

Fairly soon after the original founding, Robert Larson, who was a Carleton student, left for Berkeley and founded a grove at Berkeley. I have no idea whether this is still going on, but for a very long time it was the only other grove that survived with any permanence at all. There were several early groves. One Fisher founded in New York City, that was doomed to extinction. Frangquist founded one at the summer camp that he worked at during the summer. Of course it died when he left. Norman Nelson founded one at his graduate school in Vermillion, South Dakota, and one at his home city of Rapid City in South Dakota. And they all died. There was one founded by Savitzky at Stanford that went along for a while, but again, I have no idea if this is still a going concern. And we founded one in Ann Arbor that lasted for a couple of years and died when we left. Died before we left, really; we stopped holding services long before we left.

But officially, anything that embraces the Reform as a whole, the organ for deciding things like that is the Council of Third Order Priests. In '76 there were something like 30 of us, maybe a bit more than 30. I have no idea how many there are now.

Fairly shortly after this mechanism was put into place, a series of resolutions were passed: formalizing the normal local grove structure; stating explicitly that there is no official liturgy, with the single exception of the induction into the Third Order. There were some other things as well. Practically from the beginning these were all passed by mail, because never once since the first couple years of Druidism have all the priests been together in one place, or even a quorum of them. All of this business was done by mail.

The last thing that passed was in '71: I insisted that we formalize the equality of men and women. There was a lot of male-chauvinist-pigism in the early years of the Reform, and it's not entirely due to the fact that women had less freedom at Carleton at that time (due to the women's hours.) It is directly traceable to the Christian tradition of Fisher and some of his friends. Chief players against that were Frangquist and his wife, and myself. We pushed hard to get this thing; even went to the extent of looking up Druids that we had hadn't heard from in a long time to try to get their votes on this thing.

And in the end it passed by consensus. There were no votes dissenting from the part that was officially adopted. We cultivated that as an ideal. Nowhere will you find it written what a quorum is in the Council of Dalon ap Landu. As an historical fact, everything that was adopted by the Council was adopted by consensus.

When Isaac came along and started consecrating all of his pagan friends to the Third Order, we rapidly saw that if he really wanted to take this and run with it, it would be possible for him to swamp the Council with pagans, and then he could do whatever he pleased. And so very, very strongly we pushed the notion that anything the Council adopts has got to be by consensus, because we knew that when it comes to Neo-Pagan sorts of things, things could not be adopted by consensus. There was no consensus on that sort of thing. But since '71, nothing has happened.

Eric: Do you consider that the Council still exists, in any sense?

Dick: Oh, sure. Sure it exists, just by the fact that there are people in the Third Order. It's never done business for a long number of years, and, I'm convinced, never will. I used to have this recurring notion that we had to be careful with this, because it is exactly this kind of organization that pulls a religion away from the spiritual into the formal and political. If one wants Druidism to survive as an organization, which on the face of it is nonsense; Druidism isn't about organizations, but if one wants Druidism to stick around, you have to have some formalism.

Perhaps the best way of perpetuating this formalism is as, in fact, has happened: by word of mouth, from one retired priest to a struggling undergraduate here at Carleton, trying to understand all this stuff, what the founders had in mind when they wrote this kind of thing. I feel strongly enough about Druidism that I'm willing to go out of my way to be part of that. But I think setting up a formal structure to try to keep this thing going is a mistake; it's the trap that religion falls into.

I didn't always believe that. In fact, when I first started as Arch-Druid, I set about codifying all the tradition I could find. It was in the summer after I was appointed Arch-Druid pro tem; I put together a "Codex of Form" (as I called it) that had all of the tradition that I could glean from The Blue Book and everything I could put together about what old-style Druidism was about. It was full of "thou shalt" and "thou shalt not" and so forth. It was such an anti-Druidic sort of thing; I have done penance for this many, many times over! But I was put right in no uncertain terms by several people. It was the beginning of a long correspondence with many people whom I've never met but value as friends. And this, too, is a part of my religious education, in understanding just exactly what true religion is all about.

And it was exactly this sort of thing that we objected to in Isaac: just form run rampant. Yet "Thou art without form."

Eric: If your goal is to continue as an organization, he had at least the point that the Council was not a very effective method of having an organization.

Dick: By design, I would say.

Eric: One of the points he would bring up would be the unreliability, from time to time, of the Carleton Grove Arch-Druid taking their responsibility seriously in reporting to Druids at large happenings and changes.

Dick: And I can understand that kind of frustration, even if he weren't into a power play trying to be Big Fish himself. There was a real divide in Druidism at this time, between Carleton Druids and non-Carleton Druids. The non-Carleton Druids, I'm sure justifiably, felt themselves on the outside, and I'm not saying we're entirely innocent of fostering that. But it remains true that the Druids I'm comfortable with, that I commune with, that I can understand, are the Carleton Druids. I'm firmly convinced that the Reformed Druidism that I know is a Carleton phenomenon, and so it's not particularly important to me that there be an organization for the rest of Druidism.

At the same time, I don't want to give the idea that I don't think people outside Carleton aren't important, or that spiritual development outside Carleton isn't important. But I am convinced that the kind of organization that Druidism adopted survives well only at Carleton. Spiritual enlightenment for other people is important, but probably ought not to be done that way.

Eric: I was reading yesterday, preparing for this, through a lot of the correspondence that I have, a great deal of which comes out the '74-'76 Isaac wars. This correspondence pretty much stops as soon as Isaac's Druid Chronicles (Evolved) is published. At that time there had been talk about a Provisional Council of Arch-Druids to do some of the, well, people had different ideas as to just what it would do. There were indications that you would not necessarily be opposed to being part of it if it was going to exist. Did anything ever come of that, or did that just fritter away, or what? What's the end of that story?

Dick: I don't really know the end, to tell you the truth. The Provisional Council of Arch-Druids was suggested by Robert Larson of Berkeley as a way of trying to keep the official face of Druidism somewhat more consistent than the Arch-Druid of Carleton was capable of doing. You have to realize that most Arch-Druids of Carleton had very little in the way of resources, and little time, to spend on this kind of thing. The argument is just, that if Druidism was going to be a nation-wide phenomenon, there needed to be something beyond the Arch-Druid of Carleton to give it some kind of permanence.

At the time [though], most of us from Carleton deeply mistrusted Isaac's motives. We were not at all clear just what the Provisional Council was designed to accomplish. What made us even more suspicious was the fact that this thing was organized, as we saw it, behind our backs, because no Carleton Druids were involved except Robert himself. But again, that's not necessarily attributable to them; they didn't know of the Ann Arbor grove. Although we had announced it to the Arch-Druid of Carleton, she had left campus and not issued anything like a formal report, as she is required to do by the Council.

A large part of the animosity at that time is attributable certainly to deep differences in spiritual matters, but also to a bad lack of communication. It's exactly that sort of thing that the Provisional Council was to try to correct. But the Provisional Council really didn't meet the needs of anybody, so it died fairly soon. It didn't meet Isaac's needs, because Isaac wanted to be leader himself, and this was yet another obstacle in his way. It didn't meet our needs, because Arch-Druids and groves in general, beyond Carleton, have not been particularly important to Carleton Druids.

If Druidism was to be a national organization, the need for something like that was clear, but it's never been clear that Druidism needs to be a national organization. Some of us at the time thought, wouldn't it be just terrible if Druidism became a religion in this sense! One of my recurring nightmares would be to wake up and discover that Druidism had been declared the state religion! Something to rob Druidism of its essential nature; and that would do it very rapidly. So the Council didn't really answer anybody's needs, and it didn't survive very long.

Eric: I wanted to back up just briefly to a minor point. You [spoke] about the higher orders as being the equivalent to honorary degrees: did you get such an honorary degree?

Dick: Yes . . .

Eric: What orders were you?

Dick: I am a Druid of the Fifth Order, which is the order headed by Norman Nelson, whom I regard as probably the quintessential Druid. He was one of the original founders. The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Orders were all created in a single day, by who were then the three priests of the time: Fisher, Frangquist, and Nelson. They each became Patriarch of one the higher orders. I've had a lot of correspondence with Norman, and at one point he sent me a letter that said, "Find somebody to consecrate you to the Fifth Order!" So I did. It was in fact Steve [Savitzky], and I asked Norman's permission to have Steve consecrated to the Fifth Order, and he granted it, so I consecrated Steve to the Fifth Order.

Eric: As I understand it, you never were consecrated to the Fourth Order?

Dick: No, that's right. Beyond the Third Order it's just catch as catch can. I'm honored that Norman thought enough of me to grant me this honor. It's not an honor I wear on my sleeve. It's not the sort of thing that I will admit to unless I'm asked it point blank, because I do not believe that it is fundamentally an essential part of my religious experience, or fundamentally a part of Druidism.

Eric: Continuing with the trivial historical footnote, then: as far as I could tell from my readings, it wasn't clear that anybody had ever gone beyond the Seventh Order, which was the Order that Gary Zempel was made Patriarch of.

Dick: Right. Gary Zempel was the Arch-Druid after Frangquist. The first three Arch-Druids were Fisher, Nelson, and Frangquist, and they became Patriarchs of their high orders in that single day back in '64. As sort of a matter of course, the Sixth Order elected Zempel, the next Arch-Druid, to be the next Patriarch. But Zempel never selected any other priests to his order, and not too long after he left Carleton, he sort of dropped out. At one point, he felt that he should do something about the fact that the line of higher orders had stopped there, and mentioned to me that he wanted to be considered as retired, and somebody else should be appointed as Seventh Order [Patriarch]. So I wrote to Frangquist, the Patriarch of the next order down, which is responsible for electing the Seventh Order Patriarch, and said, "Well, Gary doesn't think that he's Patriarch anymore, or doesn't want to be considered Patriarch anymore. This is your bailiwick; if you want to do anything about it, fine." And nothing happened. I didn't expect anything to happen. As far as I'm concerned, he's still Seventh Order Patriarch, and there are no other Seventh Order priests, and it's ending there. It's not a big deal for me. It was for Isaac.

Eric: There have from time to time been other orders created, besides the numerical things, some of them not within the RDNA structure, but others "possibly" within. The Archives includes something from a person who was a Carleton Arch-Druid, at least during the summer of 1978. (It's not too clear what the chronology is in some of those years!) She's announcing the creation of a new order, and she considers herself RDNA. Do you have any comments on that kind of thing, or are these higher orders or not? Where is that for you?

Dick: I've never understood this penchant for creating orders. It's largely a Neo-Pagan phenomenon, the orders created beyond the first [set of] higher orders. The first higher orders, I think, were created simply because Frangquist and Nelson wanted a bigger piece of the action. The higher orders have never been important to me as part of my religious experience. Do I recognize these as orders of Reformed Druidism? Well, I think probably Orders Four through Ten I will acknowledge as part of Reformed Druidism because they're in the Chronicles. Are they an important part of Reformed Druidism? Not at all. Are the other high orders important to Reformed Druidism? Well, they're not to my Reformed Druidism. To their members they may be important; far be it from me to gainsay that. I'm perfectly willing to live and let live. Am I going to refuse to have anything to do with somebody that comes to a service wearing the insignia of such an order? No, not at all. I don't feel the need to wear my insignia; it doesn't bother me one way or the other if they want to. It's just not part of my view of Druidism. I know they're there; certainly to me they're not important.

Eric: OK, I want to do a radical shift of where we've been, and return you to college and talk a little bit about some of the other things that were going on at Carleton while you were there, possibly as they relate to you as Arch-Druid, and possibly not. For instance, in May of 1970 the college has its Strike for several days following the invasion of Cambodia. As when I'm doing an interview with anybody who was here at that time, I'm interested in knowing your perspective on that and how it affected you, what part you may have played. This is turning into a long question, but I noticed, I guess it must have been in the Black Book, you had a poem or a chant "In Time of War," with the notation that it was written following the invasion of Cambodia. Obviously international politics was on your mind at the time.

Dick: The Exorcism.

Eric: An Exorcism, that's right. There; it's a long question; run with it!

Dick: In the mid sixties several things happened at Carleton. In the earlier sixties, about the time that Druidism was founded, various requirements were being abolished, like the religious attendance requirement. In my freshman year convocation requirement, the requirement that you attend the convocations, was abrogated. In the early sixties a lot of these in loco parentis things were falling, and there was a great deal of animosity between the student body and particularly the Dean of Men's Office, to some extent to President Nason as well, because, and, I feel, rightly, the students resented these things as not being an appropriate part of an adult educational experience.

I was not really part of that. A large part of this bitterness was over and done with by the time I got here in '67. In '67 the burning issue was race relations. The yearbook for that year ['67'68] was virtually taken over by essays about the relationship between races. Oddly enough, that seems to have been restricted pretty much to that one year, I think largely because while I was at Carleton we never did have much in the way of a minority student population. I think that's changed somewhat now, but we had a few token blacks, and that was it.

But increasingly as the years went on, certainly by the time I was a sophomore, when Joe came back from Israel, the burning issue, bar none, was Vietnam. It consumed every aspect of our lives, from watching the body counts on TV to the Damoclean sword of the draft hanging over every male one of us. The death of somebody whose name I've forgotten, and whom I never knew, who was the only Carleton grad I know of that was killed in Vietnam, these were all impinging on us all the time.

The election of 1968 really galvanized the campus, and large numbers of students went on buses to Wisconsin to help in the primaries for Gene McCarthy. Many of my close friends, in fact, went on that. I did not, because, I think, at that time I was still a Republican. I had come to campus in '67 supporting the war. It did not take long to change my mind. (This was quite apart from worrying about the draft, although my mother certainly did! It hadn't yet really crossed my mind that I myself could possibly be drafted. This changed later on!)

When it became evident that Nixon was not going to wind down the war in Vietnam, there was a dramatic change of attitude on campus, I believe, and people became radicalized in a way that heretofore had not been.

My junior year was the year of the Strike. I was involved as a member of the CSA government: I was a CSA senator for a while, and then I was secretary of CSA, because I got so fed up with the incredibly poor performance of the previous secretary. One of my duties as secretary was to issue minutes for the meetings. This involved typing them up on mimeograph masters and then taking them upstairs to Fourth Willis. (Willis at that time was the Union.) Fourth Willis was where the government offices were and where the mimeograph machine was.

In the process of doing that, I came to know another person who was up there frequently. She had an office up there, but also she used the mimeograph machine. She had been a graduate student at the University of Michigan. Even before the Strike we had had conversations about what had happened at the University of Michigan. I don't know if you're aware of this history, but Michigan, outside of Berkeley and Columbia, was probably the most radicalized campus, and it was that campus that was overrun by the sheriff's office. Really brutal police tactics were used against students there. In fact, a couple of years later I myself went to Michigan as a graduate student, and I remember thinking once, walking past a building on campus, realizing, something suddenly clicked, that's the building where all this happened! It was like a thunderbolt from a distant time.

But this woman I talked to quite a bit, and she was a large part of my radicalization. During the Strike we were up on Fourth Willis every day, churning this mimeograph machine, trying to gather and put out all the rumors from all across the country that we knew about. After Kent State and the calling out of the National Guard, there was a very real sense that the powers that be in this country were starting to turn, maybe "Nazistic" is a little too strong a term, but repressive and Fascist. The March on Washington happened, I forget precisely when it was, but I'm sure it was that spring, and Joe was part of that. (I didn't go on that, having essentially no resources and no way of getting there, and refusing to hitch-hike.)

But basically the whole educational structure of the campus came to a halt. There may have been some classes, but virtually everybody stopped going to most of the classes. I can still remember standing by the teletype (KARL had a teletype; that was on Third Willis, I think) and watching as these things came through, and literally ripping them off the teletype and taking them upstairs and typing them onto mimeograph masters. There was a very strong feeling that you couldn't trust the national press. You couldn't trust anybody over 30; that was the phrase, right?

It was a very paranoid time. The threat of the draft really burned that into us: if we got out of line, we would be drafted. Our draft boards would be told, and our deferments would be canceled, and we would be called up. I don't really believe that happened a lot. I know it did happen on a couple of occasions. But that was one of the threats that was held over us.

I can still remember the first draft lottery. I think it was when I was a sophomore; it must have been the spring of '69. The numbers came off the teletype, and they were ripping them off the teletype and posting them on the glass window in the KARL studio. I remember coming into the room — it was packed — and starting at the beginning, looking for February 28. I was aware by the time I had gotten to the second of these sheets (there must have been maybe ten of them all together) that my heart was beating so hard I was sure everybody could hear it. As I got farther and farther along down the sheets and I still hadn't found February 28, I started to relax, until I got all the way to the end of the sheets and I still hadn't found February 28, and I realized I'd missed it and it might very well be the second date for all I knew!

It turned out it was number 299, which, even I knew at that time, meant effectively that I wouldn't be called for the draft. And there was a real moral crossroads for me: once the threat of the draft had been removed, was I really as radical as I said I was? This was something I had to think long and hard about. I knew that I was against the war in Vietnam. Would I actually march in demonstrations against it? Well, I didn't, until the invasion of Cambodia, and at that point I was finally pushed over the line; I realized this was something you had to stand up and be counted about, and it was then that I wrote the Exorcism. We held that Exorcism complete with blazing torches that we smothered to put the flames of war out.

Earth Day also happened about the same time. I forget just what year that started.

Eric: Same year.

Dick: Druids were part of the first Earth Day. We gave an invocation. The summer that Ellen and I graduated, we were married that August. The wedding present that I remember best, and that we still have, was The Last Whole Earth Catalog that was sent us by Steve.

Eric: How appropriate!

Dick: But it was all part of the times. The radicalism of those couple of years is just impossible to forget, and it really shaped an entire generation. It's been said so many times that it sounds almost trite now. But those were the formative experiences of my generation.

Eric: Do you want to say anything to wrap up, you've touched on this many times, of course, summing up the meaning of the Carleton Druids in your life. That sounds much too vast! Anything that would be an appropriate way to close, stepping back and putting it in its place for you.

Dick: Well, for me personally Druidism was another one of those formative events, experiences, not really an event. Druidism determined the way that I look at life, the way that I deal with not just my spirituality but with almost every aspect of my life, the way I approach writing a computer program, even. A very strong belief that (thinking of it in terms of a computer program now) the user must be respected. As the designer of a program, you can't foist your way of looking at things on the user; you have to adapt your program to what the user wants to do, what is valuable for him. And that's just another bit of Druidism, really. The whole idea of making life user-friendly, if you will.

In a very real sense I live and think and breathe Druidism every day, every hour of my life. As a formal religion I scarcely ever think about it any more, except when I get calls of distress from Carleton! I am occasionally asked to speak about it by other enlightened groups, like the Unitarians. It is not important, no, that's not true: I was going to say it's not important to me that Druidism continue as a "religion." I am very pleased that it has, and not because it validates in any sense something that I was a part of or something that I helped to continue, but because I believe very strongly in its principles and its approach to life.

As religious fundamentalism rises in this country, and in the world, I feel very strongly that it's important that we stand up for an alternative view; that we make clear that no matter how firmly someone may feel that fundamentalist Christianity is the only way to salvation, it is important in a pluralistic society (I would say important anywhere in the world, but certainly in America) not to let that destroy the fabric of society, no matter how sinful you may view that society. In the long run, that is the road to, I won't say damnation, but certainly to destruction. It's important to me that this contrarian view be promoted.

It's not important to me that that view take on a particularly Celtic view or form, or a Reformed Druidistic form, although I would say that this entire contrarian view is a druidic, small outlook. So the particular forms that it takes are not really important to me, but the principle itself I think is one that is one of the most basic in our society.

It's not an anti-Christian view; it's an anti-totalitarian view. I have nothing against the beliefs of Christianity; there are many beliefs of Christianity that I believe in. The moral teachings of Christianity I feel quite in tune with. But the modus operandi of fundamentalist Christian sects is to me just another version of totalitarianism, and it needs to be called that, and it needs to be countered.

Then again, one can apply the same principles in other situations that are not spiritual at all. The traditional top-down management that I encounter every day of my life at Unisys is totalitarianism, and it is counter-productive, and it's why the Japanese are beating us. And this is another way in which I am Druidic, trying to sabotage this top-down management.

Western civilization has from the very earliest times been pushed by and propagated by control freaks. At root, that is what I think Druidism is: a statement against control; that the best things in life come by letting them happen, not by controlling them to make them not happen. All valuable change, well, this is awfully dogmatic, but all valuable change (yes! I firmly believe this!) has come about in situations where the status quo simply can no longer hold, and the people who are trying to keep it from changing are willing to stoop to totalitarian tactics. It is at junctures like these where the Druidic approach is necessary.

Eric: Thank you.

1. Although at the time of the interview I had not met either the Frangquists or Isaac, I have since met both: the Frangquists in October 1993 and Isaac in April 1994.

2. My numbering of the floors of Willis may leave some puzzled. The government offices were on what is generally known as Third Willis, the fourth floor if you count the Ground Willis as the first floor. My account is probably influenced by the memory of the three long flights of stairs from the ground floor where I got my supplies to the top floor where I ran off the minutes.

Note: See many other interviews with Isaac Bonewits in Green Book 10 of Part Six of ARDA 2.

MS: OK, this is Michael Scharding interviewing Isaac Bonewits, oh, you mind if this is recorded?

IB: No, that's no problem.

MS: OK, on the first of April, April Fool's Day.

IB: Ah hah

IB: An auspicious to announce the founding of the Order of Thoth.

MS: That's right. Well, this one is mostly going to be back on the RDNA days again. As we were just talking about the writing of the family tree of Druidism, one of the rules in the bi-laws is only an Arch-Druid can elect a third order priest. Was this a common practice, or did any third order person do this?

IB: As I recall, <pause> As I recall you had to be a third order priest to be an Arch-Druid, and you could then ordain other third orders, but I also recall though that the point may have gotten stretched a few times that any third order can ordain another third order. I believe that all of the times that I did ordinations, I was the Arch-Druid of a given grove. Although, oddly enough, I might have been a traveling Arch-Druid, I believe I did several of those ordinations for what eventually became the Arch-grove of the Hasidic Druids of North America down in St. Louis. I was traveling down in St. Louis, at the time I was the Arch-Druid of the Twin Cities grove, in Minneapolis, and I may have at that point done some of the ordinations down in the St. Louis area. That would have been Lou Schreiber and Vicki and Carolyn Clark.

MS: One of the things that some people have brought up, and there's so much dirt that gets thrown on you...

IB: <laughing>

MS: There is, a seemingly great desire on your part to become Arch-Druid of something, and I've noticed that you've been Arch-Druid of a grove often when there's another grove in the same city, mainly because of your SDNA branch. I was just wondering if this might have been because you wanted to increase the size of the third order, that you felt that you needed to be an active Arch-Druid.

IB: <pause> I don't think so. I'm trying to remember what time period you'd be talking about here.

MS: I know you were Arch-Druid of Stockton Grove from '72 to '74, Twin Cities roughly from '74 to '76 it seemed, and then you came back to Berkeley and then you were either Arch-Druid of Berkeley or the Mother Grove in Berkeley.

IB: <pause> I can't remember a lot of those details. I was staying with Bob Pinell <pause> and Roy Keister I think it was in Stockton. I may have made them second or third order, I don't remember. And we did have a grove there that, while I was living in Stockton. Generally, I tended for a long time to simply have a grove where I was living, because if people didn't already about Reform Druidism, I would tell them pretty soon, and then people would say "Oh great, let's start a grove." So we would. But I think it was more on the fact of people wanting there to be a grove then for me being particularly enamored of the role. Most of the time when I was starting a grove, I was the only one who was experienced with the liturgy and such. About the only time there was ever an election that was really contested with multiple candidates, was when I was in the Bay Area where there were a lot of third order Druids floating around. But Stockton was quite a distance from the Bay Area.

MS: And I also noticed that it almost looked like the grove was an extension of the SCA.

IB: Well we had an overlap for a while, a definite overlap. Bob Larson's Clann na Brocheta Grove was, in one sense, an extension of the Renaissance Pleasure Fair, because Clann na Brocheta was a group of Gaelic players and musicians who worked at the Renaissance Fair. And he did there ceremonies for them in [Munster] Irish, um but it, there has been an extensive overlap between the SCA and pagendom and science fiction fandom and computer fandom for many, many years. Because all of these are subcultures that encourage people who are intelligent and creative, so they are going to have overlapping populations.

MS: OK, yeah because I've noticed that a lot of Arch-Druids, a lot of groves have been [SCA] members and come to Carleton.

IB: Oh yeah, and a lot of them have been computer techies.

MS: Yes, <pause> one of the things that is very curious is <pause> more so than a few others, I think we can admit that you are a little more, it almost looks like you're proselytizing.

IB: <gasp>

MS: Yes

IB: You're saying dirty words

MS: Big dirty word, oh, most of the other groves that I've noticed that were setup by founders, except for the one in Berkeley which, of course, led to you, very very few people get ordained by the Carleton graduate. In fact, most of them never ever escape the college environment.

IB: Right.

MS: Berkeley somehow, probably because of the, the rather convenient Bay Area neo-Pagan scene, managed to dump the college environment and go for something permanent. And, I'm kind of curious...

IB: Well there wasn't much of a neo-Pagan scene in the Bay Area in 1969, there were twenty or thirty people in the area who were Wiccan, although most of them were being very definitely undercover in that process, because even then it wasn't safe to come out in public. But there were a number of people in the SCA who were Pagan. And I discovered the SCA at roughly the same time I discovered Reform Druidism, so they seemed to make a good match. And we started doing Druid ceremonies at some of the weekend tournaments. To deal specifically with the topic of proselytizing, I never thought there was anything wrong with telling people you had something good. Shoving it down their throats, or threatening them with hell-fire is totally different, but sharing something that you have that you think is a wonderful thing is, if not an obligation, at least an understandable urge on the part of people that who've discovered something good.

MS: Yeah, one of the requirements in the third order is to minister to the people's needs, but I think that the Carleton group had the understanding that they're supposed to find you, or maybe that's just laziness on their part.

IB: There's a couple, several different orientations from that. I really believe that Dave Fisher was coming out of one of the United Ancient Order of Druid groups, that from the style of his liturgy and his description of what he thought Druidism was, it seems very clear that he was coming out of that group. And that group is a fraternal order patterned after the Masons, and like the Masons, pretty much insisted that people knock on the door and ask for admission. They did not actively go out and recruit, so I think that David Fisher had a reluctance to recruit in the first place, and I also think that for most of the old time, the first generation Reform Druids, the RDNA was a wonderful memory from their college years, and they wanted to keep it a quaint little alumni club, they didn't want to let in just anybody. So I suspect that a large part of the, you know, misunderstanding and hostility was generated by the fact, here was somebody that came out of the blue, who never even went to Carleton, who was treating their alumni club as if it were a real religion.

MS: Yeah, and that's what I've been able to pick up.

IB: Yeah.

MS: In fact, you're one of the very few non-Carleton students to actually ordain anybody.

IB: <laughing>

MS: The only other I can think of is Stephan and Tezra at the present, and maybe Larry Press. I don't know if any of the other groves, like the Twin Cities grove or the Arch grove...

IB: Uh, no, Larry Press and Emmon Bodfish in the Orinda grove, they ordained a few people.

IB: And who was I talking to? Yeah, and Stephan and Tezra have done ordinations. So, really, as far as I can tell, the real hotbed of Reform Druid activity was on the west coast, primarily in the Bay region with my grove and the groves that branched off from it. And also up in Seattle, with Cindy Schuller...

IB: Yeah, she has a pretty large group there.

MS: Now, <pause> what happened to all these little groves, like the Arch grove and the acorn grove and these...

IB: Well, the same thing that happens in nature, a bunch of seeds get planted and some of them sprout, and some of them don't, and of the one's that do sprout some of them get cropped off by the deer real fast.

MS: <laughing>

IB: And the ones that manage to survive to become saplings, either prosper or not depending on the rain and the fertility of the soil, and a hundred other things. So if you plant twenty or thirty groves, you're lucky if two or three of them are still running five years later. I didn't realize that at first. The Arch grove lasted for two or three years in St. Louis and then collapsed because the couple who were running it divorced, a situation that is very common the craft but hasn't been so common in the RDNA because we haven't had that many situations where couples were starting a grove. The Twin Cities grove, I believe it kept going for a short period of time after I moved out of the Twin Cities, I believe Avery Grant was running it. And, what ever, its not in existence now, I have no idea at one point it collapsed, my brother might be able to tell us that because I think he stayed in contact with Avery for a while.

MS: It seems to me almost, I don't know, there seems to been in the early '70s, something around 1972 or so, there seems to been large number of groups that seems to like have almost chucked a lot of the old occult astrology and a whole bunch of other kinds of things that, what Bradley calls were from a Christian matrix attitude and just started fresh, and started digging their hands into the stuff themselves and looking into other cultures. And this is what I've been able to figure out what Neo-Paganism is, kind of a hands-on, fresh start.

IB: Yeah, I'd say that that's true in many ways. There was an explosion of interest in the occult and simultaneously in witchcraft, Paganism, and folk magic, all intertwined together during the late '60s and early '70s and really the spread of Neo-Paganism is directly traceable to that particular time period, which is when almost all the people who are now big-nosed Pagans first got involved with it.

MS: Now you've always defined Neo-Paganism as a reconstructive religion based on primarily pre-Christian sources, what were the other kinds of groups that were doing reconstruction in a Neo-Pagan format? I know there's the Source of Eternal Life for the Egyptians.

IB: Church for the Eternal Source, that's what you mean, the Egyptian folks. They were one of the big groups. Fere-Faeria was another one, Fred Adams was trying to reconstruct his vision of Greek religion. The most influential of course was the Church of All Worlds.

MS: But that's not really a pre-Christian religion.

IB: Well, no, they were perfectly willing to admit that they were starting a brand new religion, but they believed that they were inspired by the models of the pre-Christian religions, and expanding them in a modern sense. Tim Zell (now Otter Zell) was important, one of the first people to come up with what became known as the Gaia hypothesis. He actually published material on it before Lovelock did and Zell is the one that actually made the term Neo-Paganism widespread, it was in the American occult community. The Wiccan movement started out being what I consider Meso-Pagan, and only became Neo-Pagan under the influence of the counter-culture in the United States, when they realized they could drop a lot of the window dressing that had been added to keep the Christians happy.

MS: <laughing> And so the Druids were essentially the Celtic element, but the Wicca was of course using a lot of the Celtic...

IB: But the folks in Wicca claimed that they were Celtic but in point of fact what they were doing was far more Greco-Roman then it was Celtic, and for people in.... Oh, and there was also groups like the Asatru Free Assembly and other folks that were interested in Norse Paganism, they were starting up at about this same time. Unfortunately, they got infiltrated and subverted by Neo-Nazis rather quickly so that most of the, even today, you'll still find that the vast majority of Norse groups are Meso-Pagans, hung up on Aryan, pure-race, bullshit. But yeah, to a certain extent the Druids was the movement in Neo-Paganism for people who were interested in the Celts.

MS: And the RDNA was the only contender in the field at that time.

IB: That's right.

MS: See, that's what I'm very curious about. When I read your early letters, there seems to be a very rushed attitude. I know you were extremely busy in a lot of movements and

IB: <laughing>

MS: ...might have been a little bit upset about what you saw as a set of emergency breaks in the RDNA, on something you couldn't really deal to much time with, but um what was the sense of urgency coming from?

IB: That was a time period that I was fairly firmly convinced that the ecology was in a mess and that this insane macho posturing between the United States and the Soviet Union was libel to blow it all up, and I felt that there was really a strong need to spread the ideas of Neo-Paganism and to spread the techniques of magic to people with Neo-Pagan ethics, as widely as possible as quickly as possible, just for the sheer sake of survival of the planet. And I still feel that today but I don't have quite the sense of urgency I used to, because it is beginning to look like maybe enough magic was done to put the breaks on at least the nuclear threat. And because the ecology movement has begun to be successful, and is beginning to change peoples attitudes. I still feel a sense of urgency but I'm not in my twenties anymore.

MS: Yeah, it's actually quite remarkable what you were doing in your twenties...

IB: <laughing>

MS: I must say.

IB: Yeah, I wish I had that much energy today.

MS: Oh, don't you know it. And so let's, I'm just trying to figure out...

IB: Well, you know I've been doing a lot of research over the last twenty-five years in the history of Wicca. And the more I read about Gerald Gardner and about the atmosphere in the occult community in England during the '40s and '50s and '60s, the more sympathy I'm developing for him. And, Gardner ordained zillions of people, he ordained anybody who'd walk into his living room practically, and the reason he seems to have done so was because he figured that if he ordained several hundred people, at least a couple dozen of them would be good and would keep his religion going. And I think to a great extent that I was working on much the same principle, the idea that if I ordained a lot of third order priests, that a significant proportion of them would keep it up and go out and start new groves, where they would ordain new people who would go and start new groves. And I thought that this would be a good thing for the planet and for the people involved.

MS: Yes, Bradley was talking about that, he's a very interesting person if you get to talk with him. And he said that there's a certain size for a parish to remain stable, he thinks it's around two hundred people, cause by that point you have at least five or six people who can cover slack in case something goes wrong, versus just one. And one of the things that I think a lot of people were a little bit eerie about, but then I'll talk about the other side, seems to be your role as a nexus point. Stephan also had this complaint raised against him. For instance, most of the Carleton RDNA were unable, for some reason, to contact many of the other, non-Carleton RDNA. And they almost kind of felt like they had to go through you to get there, while it's nice that you actually were there to see actually make it to other people, I don't know, it almost seems like they're...they're kicking the system.

IB: I sent the name, and mailing address and phone number of every person I ordained to the attention of Arch Druid of Carleton.

MS: Right, and there is documents for that.

IB: And, if the people at Carleton didn't bother to contact any of those folks, and never bothered to keep up-to-date mailing lists, you know that wasn't anything I could really take responsibility for. I seem to recall that once every two or three years, I would send as much of an update as I had of current addresses, but there was nothing to stop people at Carleton from contacting any of these people directly, they just never bothered. The groves at Carleton were primarily concerned with Carleton.

MS: Yes, I picked that up...

IB: Which you can understand, running, even if it's a very small grove, you're still running a student organization, and the average college student really doesn't think on a grand scale in terms of "Oh, I'm at the head of a nationwide network and I have to keep the communication lines clear."

MS: <laughing>

IB: No, the average Arch Druid at Carleton, didn't think about that.

MS: Yeah, and you know, I don't know, maybe they're just jealous or they just, I don't know, there is definitely really small minded thinking going on and actually you know that it is one of the good things that you did publish so much stuff, because, as Bradley says "Isaac Bonewits he might have his faults here and there but at least he publishes, gets stuff out on the table."

IB: <laughing>

MS: "You know, you can like him or hate him, but you still at least have something to work with."

IB: Michael Bradley, who is Michael Bradley, why does that name ring a bell?

MS: Arch-Druid of Chicago.

IB: What?

MS: Chicago

IB: Oh right.

MS: He was inducted by McDavid.

IB: He hardly ever answered his mail as I recall.

MS: Yeah, but he was a pretty mellow dude and he and McDavid had a very nice connection with each other and they had a nice little grove for a number of years. And he's in Seattle now.

IB: Is it still functioning?

MS: Oh no, it stopped in '78 and Bradley's now in Seattle and he's going to join Cindy's group sometime in the future. He actually was going to start the humanistic DNA

IB: The HDNA?

MS: Uh huh, and that might have worked really well.

IB: Well at that point there wasn't any Hassidic Druids left so the initial was ok

MS: That would lead to confusion.

IB: Yes, it sure would. But we had a lot of confusion in those days.

MS: <pause> Lineage, how many groups in the '70s were stuck up on lineage?

IB: What, in the Reform Druid community?

MS: And also elsewhere.

IB: Well a sizeable number in the Wiccan community really felt that lineage was important, because that was how they maintained their quality control. Because they were doing everything in secrecy, that being half the fun of being a witch, they didn't have any published standards of qualification for the clergy. And they had no central, because they were decentralized, there was no one address you could write to, to verify if whether or not a person was capable of doing what they said they were. So, the way they maintained any kind of quality of control was to say "well I was ordained by lady so-and-so, how was ordained by lady so-and-so, who was ordained by lady such-and-such." And if you knew any of the people along that line of succession, then you could make a reasonable guess as to whether or not this person had been properly trained and initiated. But of course, that only worked within particular denominations, and there were so many people within the Wiccan community who were making up brand new denominations out of thin air, and telling outrageous lies about their ancestry and their families and their childhood training and a lot of other B.S., when they were obviously using stuff they'd ripped off from Gerald Gardner, that it made it impossible to ever verify anything. Now, but the folks that think of themselves as the British Traditionalist, the Conservatives, still to this day think that lineage is still very important, this is their own apostolic succession. On the other hand there were a lot of people who were saying "well no, we're going to make this all up ourselves, and we're going to use published material, and we're going to use material we research ourselves, and we'll put it all together, and we don't care if it's old or new, we like it cause it works." And those folks didn't care about lineage at all. Certainly the folks at Fer-faeria and Church of Eternal Source and The Church of All Worlds weren't worried about lineage, because they knew that they were making brand new religion.

MS: That's why I'm kind of curious about, there has been rumors about Isaac, that one reason you stayed in the RDNA was because it preceded all the other guys. And I think that this is rather a shallow comment.

IB: <laughing> Preceded all the other guys?

MS: Yeah, because the others incorporated '67 and stuff and...

IB: Oh, well incorporations and stuff didn't matter very much. Nobody much was impressed by being incorporated except when it was a chance to gain legal protection for Paganism, then people got impressed by incorporation.

MS: Well, not so much incorporation as foundation.

IB: Yeah, most, Gerald Gardner started his trip, I personally don't think that there was anything preceding him that he was continuing, but even if there was, what he did was a brand new thing, and he essentially started that in the last '40s and early '50s. And the Druid orders, if you want to look at it, if we say that David Fisher came out of the Ancient Order of Druids or one of those offshoots, well that at least goes back to the mid 1700s. But, I never really thought that the apostolic succession was that critical. I have a whole long discussion on varieties of initiation and transmission of the Gnosis or apostolic succession is only one of the three major types of initiation, and it isn't always the most important, the other two being recognition of status already gained and ordeal of transformation. But the point is, no, I didn't stick with the RDNA because I thought the RDNA was older than any of the other Neo-Pagan groups. It was because the archetype, the Druid, really resonated with me, the same way that the archetype of the witch resonates with a lot of other people. It's what I was pulled too, and even when I tried to drop out and stay away from it, I kept getting dragged by the scruff of the neck back into it, kicking and screaming.

MS: It almost seems to me that the SDNA was kind of like the testing groups for ADF in some ways.

IB: Oh, to a great extent. When I sit down and I look through this old material I can see a lot of the ideas that ADF has manifested there in sort of an embryonic stage. And, when I really began to realize that the founders of the RDNA really didn't want it to be a religion, and yet I thought that it seemed obvious to me that it was a religion, I first started experimenting, and I think that the SDNA was my first experiment with that.

MS: Yeah, because I mean there had been lots of RDNA Druids before you who had declared it their own personal religion, it just seems like there was this subtle shift that you're not supposed to, even if you do consider it your own religion, not to advertise the group as a religion. And you want to, well see the thing is, any group after 1967 or so, that grove that founded, whether it was one of yours or one of the Carleton graduates doing it, the majority of the members that they got were of course from SCA, sci-fi, and most of them were Neo-Pagans. I mean, irregardless of the wish, you know, to have lots of smart people get together and just discuss how religions work, the majority of those people are going to be coming from Neo-Pagan tradition. So it's understandable that you'd want to advertise this, so Neo-Pagans wouldn't be confused by the double-talk saying "well we're not a religion, but we're a way to look at religion." And stuff like this, and anyone who's interested in Celticness would say wow, here you go, and they're in. So it's quite understandable from that point of view, and most of the Carleton graduates I've been able to find haven't actually been able to find that kind of attitude of Carleton students to, almost just break down religion and just sit there and look at the basics. That doesn't seem to happen very often with many places, and the only people who really want to use the structure are the people who would actually worship.

IB: Well yeah, if you're going to emphasize the philosophical side of Druidism, then you're going to spend most of your time having intellectual debates, which is lots of fun. We used to do that in the HDNA for a while, we had a hair-pull session, we would get together for the grove meeting, we'd do the ritual and then afterwards we'd come back to my house for a potluck dinner and then after dinner we would read a couple lines from the Mish-Mash and the commentaries on it, and then we would have theological argument for an hour. It was a lot of fun, but we were still doing in within the context of we're Neo-Pagans and we're discussion Neo-Pagan theology. We weren't doing it in the let's keep all this messy religion stuff at an arms length distance, which is what most of the, apparently most of the founders of the RDNA prefer to do.

MS: There also seems like there are a lot of, as you mentioned, Marxists and atheists in the early group, and one of the things that they particularly valued was that... I've always seen it as if you have a bunch of people from all types of religions and un-religions, and you describe the story of a bird making a nest, all religions, because they're faced with the material world all around them, have drawn upon nature for a source for relating to the divine. And philosophies have done so for the same reason, and so one of the things that I've seen at Carleton is that even if you're atheistic or if you're very religious, you can be Christian or anything, they can all get together and draw something out of the simple bird's story that doesn't claim to be part of, or allied to just one group, and so it seems almost, sometimes they describe it as they didn't want Druidism to fall into being a religion, that might just be a little snotty point on their part, that they were above religion, but there seems to have been a fear that it would become narrow, somehow, although you, Robert Larson and yourself were interested primarily in Celtic Indo-European stuff, where as the Carleton grove had a very strong Asian element in it, because the Asian religions were very strongly taught at Carleton. And they pretty much had dropped the Celticness early on, because it had done its purpose. And, I don't know...

IB: Or because that wasn't the interest of the new generations of students coming in.

MS: Right, because of the Asian interest and Vietnam of course made Asian studies much more interesting.

IB: Oh yeah.

MS: And that's why I was always interested...

IB: Well this is one of the reasons why I found the term Meso-Pagan to be so useful, I did not invent that term by the way, a friend of mine in Berkeley who is a Wiccan invented that term, and the Masonic, Rosicrucian, fraternal style groups of Druids in England were Meso-Pagan, what they had was a mixture of Paganism and Christianity and ideas that are rooted philosophically in Christianity, all mish-mashed together and presented as authentic Druidism. In the same way at Carleton you had, the references to nature and the references to the gods and goddesses, but you also had lots of material that was Christian philosophy, liberal Christian philosophy, or Marxist or atheist. Marxism and atheism are also outgrowths of Christianity, Marxism specifically is an outgrowth of the Christian gospel movement of the 1800s, even though Karl Marx would hate to have that said that about it, and atheism is the flip-flop of the dualistic black and white thinking of Christianity, either the Christian god and everything in the bible is true, or there is no god. And you know, as long as somebody calls himself an atheist, they're still playing the game by the Christians rules. In any event, the point is Reform Druidism, as first invented, was definitely a Meso-Pagan system, whether they called it a religion or philosophy or whatever, it was still Meso-Pagan. And, I thought the world needed Neo-Paganism, and saw this as a good starting point. But as you pointed out, within the first ten years I had tried to start alternative groups, using some of the ideas but also working in some of the ideas from the rest of the Neo-Pagan community. And, screening out the material from Monotheism and monothesisism.

MS: It's a very messy little thing.

IB: Well its amusing that the same people who were telling me that Druidism is a philosophy compatible, with every religion on the earth, were telling me "oh no, it doesn't include Neo-Paganism."

MS: Ah, see, I haven't picked that up.

IB: <laughing>

MS: I've looked for it closely, a lot of the letters between them are saying, you know, I remember Shelton once said that "Neo-Paganism was compatible with Reform Druidism, but doesn't encompass it." It's almost like...

IB: Well we didn't have the term Meso-Pagan in those days.

MS: Well yeah.

IB: Might have made a difference if we had, because then what you see is you see, you can have overlapping sets, make Venn-diagrams of it all. But, I had some of these folks verbally tell me it was totally inappropriate for Neo-Paganism and Reform Druidism to overlap and be the same thing.

MS: Well...

IB: Because they thought <coughing> Hang on... I think that they thought as soon as you brought any kind of "ism" into it at all, it was no longer Reform Druidism. I've often wondered why they didn't use the word Druidry but it may be that the fraternal groups in England hadn't started using that word at that point, I'm not sure about the precise dating of that term.

MS: Well see, the thing is, a lot of them in those years were often young too...

IB: Uh huh, we were all young way back then.

MS: Shelton who was one of the primary ring leaders then, has been very active again in keeping tabs about the Carleton grove since '86, when it was primarily Wiccan and Native American back then. And he has not really had too much trouble with us on that issue, and in-fact he's done a couple sweat-lodges and that kind of stuff.

IB: Cool

MS: And, there were a couple points where he was a little bit concerned, well first of all, you were coming from a different cultural background then he was, and most of the other Carleton Druids. I mean, you are first of all, an intellectual, and they hadn't had very much contact [inaudible], they kind of saw traps in definitions. And, they were in the process of destroying set ideas, they didn't want certainties, and...

IB: Right, well they were still in that early adolescent rebellion stage of being more interested in tearing down then they were in building up. And I can understand that, that's a necessary phase for an adolescent to go through. You have to deconstruct the culture around you before you can reconstruct it, to reflect something that makes sense to you.

MS: Right, and since most Carleton students are between the age of 19 and 20 around, I don't think, I think they were a little bit worried, well see it would be very hard of course to impose the NRDNA system on Carleton because it's so far away, but I don't think they felt that Carleton students, who didn't have a Neo-Pagan background to being with, were quite ready to reconstruct. And, I don't know, maybe they were just a little protective of the grove, they were...

IB: Well that's perfectly understandable, it was their turf. I mean just on a gut level, animal biological basis, this was their home territory, and if they perceived a threat to it, then they would be defensive.

MS: I think they also were a little bit afraid of their own people getting out of hand too.

IB: How so?

MS: Well, do you remember when Larson, I mean Shelton, tried to pass the Codex Reform?

IB: Very vaguely, yeah

MS: Well he got quite a few letters immediately, letters saying you know, red tape, red tape, you know, and Shelton backed down. Shelton by the way was the first Arch-Druid not to have known the founder. And so they were very careful to make sure that future groups wouldn't lose the original style, and that's probably one reason why they hung around so much. If you hadn't been around, they probably would have been content that no outside influences would've come into Carleton, but...

IB: Right, the fact that I wrote New Apocrypha, sent copies of it to all the members of the order of Dalon Ap Landu, that I could get a hold of, sort of rocked the boat, all of a sudden there was an outside influence.

MS: And an outside authority.

IB: Yeah.

MS: From a completely new tradition.

IB: Yeah.

MS: And so, I think that's one of the main reasons that, in-fact, you have led to a closer bond between the alumni and the present students, which we're quite grateful for.

IB: Well that's a good thing.

MS: In fact, no Carleton group has ever had this much interaction between alumni and students, and we're the oldest, unofficial, student organization at Carleton.

IB: Is the RDNA still unofficial?

MS: Still unofficial.

IB: Oh, that's funny.

MS: We have a...

IB: Wait a minute, they were official at one time, they had a faculty advisor, Messenger

MS: Uh, yes, but we never got our constitutions approved.

IB: You're kidding?

MS: Nope, they uh, they kind of like put them into the "later" file, and then, sigh

IB: Just because Carleton is still legally a church school?

MS: No, that was stopped in '22, it was just the fact that we had a bunch of pig-headed, conservative administrators, especially in the Dean of Men, and they just said "Too wild" and put it aside. But, we also had a Dean of, an advisor with Bardwell Smith, who was an Asian history and religion professor, which of course made it more Asian then ever. But yeah, John Messenger was only around for one year.

IB: Yeah right, and then he went elsewhere.

MS: Perhaps if he would have stayed longer we would have seen different.

IB: That's true, could very well have been different.

MS: Now, I want to talk about the Druid Chronicles (Evolved), you know the more I read that book, the more fascinating it gets, and that's a compliment.

<break in the conversation for call waiting, tape flips>

IB: RDNA, so that tells me in the year 17 y.r., that's what I was doing. We have the constitutions here, records of the Council of Dalon Ap Landu, Arch-Druids of Carleton through Don Morrison, spring '76 to question mark, that's as far as my list goes.

MS: Oh, yeah, did I send you an updated list of the Arch-Druids?

IB: I don't know if you did or not.

MS: Well, he stopped at '78 and that was followed by Sue Olin for a year or so, and then somebody named Heidi Schultz and I don't know, and then Katya Luomala who was incorrectly ordained, because of a drunkard Arch-Druid.

IB: Oops.

MS: Oops, she like showed up like the day and she like, Katya had vigiled and she thought Sue knew about this and...and Sue didn't show up in the morning. And, so Katya found her like halfway through the day and was like, "where were you?" "Oh, I already thought you were a third order.....well here you go, here's the order. And it's like...

IB: Oh...great.

MS: Yeah, I was like, oh boy. Well you can imagine what that did to her ego. <laughing>

IB: <laughing> Let's see, I have my copy here of the names of the Druids, which you probably have a copy of as well, that says who was ordained in which grove, anyway. It says Hal Moe was ordained in the Berkeley grove in 1973, which... could it mean it was either me or Bob, depending on who was running the grove in that year, I don't remember right now. Then we have Cindy and Tom Schuler both ordained by the mother grove in '78, which probably, lets see down here it says...mg equals mother grove SDNA. Ok

MS: One of the things we do generally is we uh, I've seen at Carleton, is that we would do like, for instance for you it'd be BK69:Larson, so we can keep track of these things easier.

IB: Well that would probably make a lot of sense, and it would be nice to try and reconstruct all of this.

MS: yeah, and...

IB: So we actually do have a family tree, but of course, we don't...I have been constantly told over the years about RDNA groves that existed and then disappeared. Like, uh, there was a grove in Palo Alto, California for a while, and there was a grove at uh... oh god, it's an eastern college, starts with a p....

MS: Purdue.

IB: Purdue, there was a grove at Purdue.

MS: Yeah, that was Dick Smiley.

IB: Dick Smiley... see so you know a lot of groves that I don't know.

MS: Well usually I make the family tree by apostolic succession versus worry about groves, because those just move all over the place. In fact, trying to work out the Berkeley thing, which is so darn confusing I gave up, but I uh...

IB: Well you know Joan Carruth could give you a lot that history. I mean obviously filtered through her eyes, but that's going to be true of anybody you ask.

MS: That's true.

IB: Do you have her current address?

MS: uh huh, yep.

IB: ok.

MS: I did an interview with her.

IB: Bob Larson... has vanished.

MS: Yes, he is vanished... showed up in spring, but disappeared again.

IB: Very strange

MS: Very strange, I heard he's over with Asatru now.

IB: Oh, that could make a certain amount of sense, he liked the Norse stuff too.

MS: Yeah.

IB: In which case, I might be able to track him down through the, through...make connections in the Norse community, maybe through...depending upon which group he's in.

MS: But yes, he's disappeared.

IB: ok, let's see here, now I have in addition to all that, I have the...Druid Missal-Any, which was...the one that Emmon Bodfish organized for a while MS: Which we don't have.

IB: Oh, ok, well I can make copies of those. What did we have here, oh and...a letter from Chris Sherbak that appeared in the Druid Missal-Any. "Dear third order Druid, the Council of Dalon Ap Landu has not had a vote in many years, one of the main problems has been the lack of contact between the head of the Council and the members, many reasons have been given, but the fact remains. I'm sending this letter to all known members of the Council in hopes of resolving this and getting on with business. There can only be two states of participation in my opinion, active and inactive. Our rules do not allow inactive participation yet, I propose we do now. I ask that you please respond to the questionnaire/proxy below. If you wish to remain in active status, please indicate as such, you'll be kept in the Council's mailing list. If you wish to become inactive, please mark and sign the proxy. This is very important, whether or not you are now interested in a Reform, you are still considered to have a vote. This was his effort to get around the impossibility of ever having a quorum...but that didn't work either.

MS: Well a lot of them just felt there wasn't anything more to vote on.

IB: There was nothing more to vote on?

MS: uh huh.

IB: I see <laughing> ok

MS: <laughing> They thought once they got everyone equal status, that was fine.

IB: 1983, so let's see, so these issues are from 1982 and '83. And...then we had the Druid Chronicler, which...

MS: We've got a lot of 'em

IB: You've got a lot of them, ok

MS: But not quite all of them, I'll have to send you...

IB: 1981 seems to be here, December '81...

MS: That's the last one we have.

IB: Yeah, that one was nicely typeset. This was, this is funny, this is really funny, I think this is the one and only issue that was ever done this way, typeset with nice borders around the edges. And this was <pause> this is the last time before I did ADF, when I tried to make major changes inside, Reform Druidism. Oh jeez, it's been years, literally years since I read this. "Isaac Bonewits left the mother grove in '79 because he was moving to Santa Cruz, when he went he appointed Joan Carruth and Stephen Abbot to be co Arch-Druids. Shortly after he left on his sabbatical, Joan and Stephen changed the name to the Berkeley grove." Okay, so it was the Berkeley grove for a long time, then it became the mother grove, then it became the Berkeley grove again. Let's see, "the next year saw Stephen drop out..." See I haven't read this in five or ten years here. "The next year saw Stephen drop out of the Berkeley grove, that was the end of co Arch-Druidship as an experiment in that incarnation. Joan ran for reelection uncontested and spent the last of 18 y.r. and all of 19 y.r. as Arch-Druid of the grove. In the two years since Isaac, the ritual and structure of the grove went relatively unmolested. But then Isaac showed back up and all the rules changed. He ran for the office of Arch-Druid, warning everybody in advance that he planned to make some broad changes in the grove. Even if it can't be said that the gods spoke, there was an omen of sorts, Isaac won. In doing so though, he alienated a large portion of the existing Berkeley grove... they thought the changes were taking Druidism far away from what its founders at Carleton College had intended it to be. That idea made them uncomfortable, so after much thought and discussion they decided to form a new grove. They asked Joan to be their Arch-Druid and she accepted. Thus there are now two groves in Berkeley: the live oak grove which still uses the traditional forms, and the mother grove, which is developing a new philosophy of Druidism for the 1980s." Right, now you have to understand, that part of all of this complexity that was going on is that Joan and I were on-again off-again lovers for many years. So, some of what was happening here was personal politics between the two of us, although fortunately at this point I can't remember any of the details.

MS: <laughing> yeah

IB: Just that Joan is basically a very wonderful person.

MS: Uh huh, oh I should tell you that...

IB: So you have this issue.

MS: Uh huh.

IB: Ok, that's good, because that is really, in terms of... history of the shift from Reform Druidism to ADF, this is really critical.

MS: Yes

IB: In any event...right Sally <pause> Sally was the Arch-Druidess at the same time as I was the Arch-Druid. Let's see, she was a server in 18yr <pause>

MS: Could we reconstruct these things a little bit later...

IB: Oh, I'm sorry, go ahead, continue with your, your list of questions you had for the interview.

MS: Ok, one of the interesting things that the Druid Chronicles is, I don't think you know this side of the story, is about the same time I believe in '74, '75 when you started Druid Chronicles going, we lost ours. We lost all the Archives, and they were a little bit afraid to tell you this... and apparently Steve Corey taking 'em all up to the Twin Cities without appointing another person at Carleton to take his place. And so all of the records were seemingly lost for two or three years. And everyone had to rely on their own personal copies of everything, and they were really afraid that your version of the Druid Chronicles would eventually become the only source of information.... And they again found them about two years later, and then I almost can tell the animosity suddenly dropped in the letters.

IB: Well, I find that fascinating, because, you know, I didn't change anything in the Chronicles of the Foundation. I was meticulous in making sure that it was the same word-for-word, the only difference being that...I stuck in footnotes.

MS: Uh huh, no big deal.

IB: Yeah... then I added a bunch of other stuff, but you know, I always thought it's really critical in the history of any religion that you have accurate history. So I always thought it was important that we document what we were doing, while we were doing it.

MS: Yeah, and there's a lot of really good little turkeys, as you call them, in there.

IB: <laughing>

MS: And, I think in there, well even though you do say in the Apocrypha that you intended people to stick in their own stuff later on, some of them are a little bit bitter that... it almost looks like a one-sided argument. Because...

IB: Hey! I didn't stop them from sending Apocrypha around.

MS: I know, they're just a little bitter. <laughing> But otherwise it...

IB: "The editor has been informed that there are other Apocrypha currently being printed for distribution. Assuming that each has a date of writing attached, it should be easy to insert them into there proper order vis-à-vis those included in this edition." One of the things that the people who were hostile about this production never seemed to mention or think about was the fact that we deliberately designed it so that it could be punched and put in a three-hole notebook.

IB: Thus implying that there would be alternate version. Oh well...

MS: Uh huh, they, I don't know, they were a little bit anarchistic, you know, any kind of... putting it all together in one book, just kind of, I don't know, grated on their nerves a little bit. But actually, its proved to be an extremely durable and reliable source for a lot of the groves which still use it. In fact, Carleton, in 1986, used it as their sole blueprint to rebuild, because we had lost the Archives again, and couldn't find them, so we used the Druid Chronicles (Evolved), as a blueprint, which of course gave our group a very Neo-Pagan flavor.

IB: Yeah, I would think so <laughing> it would have that effect.

MS: And in that sense, I think maybe the guys at Carleton were a little bit... correct in their view that, you know, once... this book gets out...

IB: No, it's not a matter of once the book being out, it's a matter of distribution. I specifically made it a point to send copies to the library at Carleton.

MS: We actually had a copy for a while.

IB: Yeah, I also specifically designed this so it could be xeroxed, that was the primary reason we typeset it, actually I typeset the whole bloody thing with my own little fingers. And if I had realized then how badly things that were printed on dark colored paper would Xeroxed, we would have never used the dark colored paper for...

MS: Yeah, that's proved troublesome.

IB: Yes

MS: We had to type it up again, and print them up separately.

IB: I'm not surprised.

MS: But yes... and luckily you never made any kind of attempt on here to call it The Druid Bible.

IB: Nah

MS: You remember what caused that trouble with The Witches Bible?

IB: Yes, right, right

MS: And the whole big thing was that they used the simple word "the" versus "a"

<pause>

IB: Right, and point in fact, that wasn't their decision, that was the publishers decision... but that's another tale..

MS: It's amazing how nitpicky some Druids can get.

IB: Special order of worship Santa Cruz gathering, wow I have a whole bunch of stuff in here, I'll have to bring this with me. <laughing>

MS: Oh yeah, please do.

IB: What I'm planning on doing at this point, if we get this trip together for April...

MS: And it looks like it is very possible, I'm already getting the funding process going.

IB: Ok, I'm going to try very hard the week before I come out there, to gather as much of this historical material as I possible can, and I will bring it with me. In fact, I will carry the more important items on the plane with me as carry-on baggage, so that I will have my hands on them the entire time. And then once I have arrived...anything that I haven't Xeroxed, we can Xerox for you. Anything that you don't have yet.

MS: Yeah, and the school's going to pay for all that Xeroxing, isn't that wonderful?

IB: I think that's terrific.

MS: <laughing> So why don't we, let's see here, I have one more question here, do I? <pause> Okay, what would you say, let's just get this last question, what would say the special, what is special about the RDNA among Neo-Pagan groups? <pause> What would make it worth studying, if you were a Neo-Pagan scholar? Besides the fact that you were in it.

IB: <pause> Probably I would simply say it was worth studying because it was the ancestral group that a bunch of other Druid groups grew out of. A lot of that being my fault, but some of it possibly not being my fault. The fact that it was the... you know, it was a different strand of development of what was to become the Neo-Pagan community.... I think that it is a good example of the fact that certain ideas were in the air in that particular time in history. Of course, you can also get, you know the great arguments they have between the great man theory, the inevitable historical movement theories. Unfortunately you can argue both ways from this situation.

MS: How so?

IB: That from the, from the point of view that this was a time of great, you know, of certain ideas being in the air, you can say that the RDNA showed that people were looking for a religious expression that, had a reverence for nature and yet also had a reverence for human individuality and freedom, which puts it in a similar boat with all the other Neo-Pagan movements. And from the, history is made by individual's point of view, you can point to either David Fisher or myself, or even Bob Larson for that matter, as having been critical in making, changing this from being a tiny little club at a small Midwestern college, to actually being a tiny, but noisy, and influential movement inside of the Neo-Pagan community as a whole. So you could argue it both ways. I don't think of myself as a great man you understand, but I was the person, in that place, at that time, and... I discovered the RDNA at about the same time that I was discovering the Neo-Pagan community, and to me they both seemed to be an obvious match.

MS: Well, ok... I think were going to stop the official interview there and just do some details here now.

Second Interview with Isaac Bonewits

NOTE: See Green Book 10 from Part 6 of ARDA 2 for more interviews with Isaac Bonewits.

MS: Ok, it's February 23rd, 1994, and this is Michael Scharding interviewing Isaac Bonewits, a prominent Druid member and best RDNA mover. Hello.

IB: < laughs >

MS: Ok, the goal of my paper is to try to... well it's going to be pretty big... essentially, fill a gap in the present academic study of Druidism, as a part of Neo-Paganism.

IB: I didn't know that there was any academic study of Druidism.

MS: That's what I figured. I mean, outside of your Druid Chronicles (Evolved), I do not believe there has ever been a really good synopsis of American Druidism. And you had to look, really hunt through encyclopedias to get anything more out of ... than that. In the major, you know, non-Druid publications. As far as I could tell...

IB: Well, it's, you know, it's a very tiny movement. I mean MS: Dear to my heart.

IB: Maybe, dear to our hearts, but if you include all the people who have ever considered themselves members of an RDNA Group or offshoot thereof, maybe, if you're being real generous, you'd have a couple thousand people.

MS: Yeah, So I guessed.

IB: Now that's not much in a nation of two hundred and fifty million.

MS: No it isn't... But yes, that is true. It's really tiny. And some of them...

IB: But special

MS: Yes. Ok, I have read a few little biographies about you, but for the benefit of the listeners, could you like, maybe briefly, go over your life in four minutes? <laughs>

IB: Ooooo. That's extremely difficult to do, actually.

MS: Oh, I'm sorry, Ok.

IB: Let's see, I was born in Royal Oaks, Michigan. An appropriate birth place for a future Arch-Druid I suppose. When I was eleven, my family moved to southern California, and I went with them, not having anything better to do at the time. At sixteen, I went to the University of California in Berkley as a sophomore, I graduated in spring of nineteen seventy, with a bachelor of arts degree in "Magic and Thaumaturgy." And then I wrote my first book, Real Magic, which was published in 1971, and it has been in and out of print ever since.

MS: Which I would like a copy of. I've read it, but I don't have a copy.

IB: Go to your nearest B.Daltons, or Waldenbooks, it's in all the big chain stores.

MS: Oh, it is being re-published again?

IB: Oh yeah, it's been in print for several years now. Weiser Publications has it out.

MS: Is that your actual Bachelor's Thesis?

IB: No, at that point they didn't have a requirement for a senior thesis, although in point of fact I did turn a couple of term papers, that I had written for different classes in my program, into the skeleton that I grew a couple of chapters around. Which you can sort of tell, if you read looking for that. Let's see, in 1973, I went to Minneapolis for the first of what was to become the Pagan festival movement. The first Pagan festival that I am aware of, anyway. Which was the Gnosticon Festival, that Carl Wesky of Lewellyn Publications started. This was like an indoor convention. It was not an outdoor camping festival, like we're used to know. But, at that time, he had invited me to move to Minneapolis, and take over editing his in-house magazine

MS: Gnostica

IB: Gnostica. Well it was then called Gnostica News, I turned it into Gnostica, edited it for about a year and a half, and then quit over various issues involving... different visions of what the magazine was supposed to be, let's just put it that way. He brought me in to raise the quality of the magazine. I did, and he started losing readers, He should not have been surprised. In any event... Let's jump back just a little bit, it was in the late sixties that I met Robert Larson, who was a Graduate of Carleton, and who had been an early, but not a founding member of the grove there. He initiated me into the RDNA in, I think, 1968. I made third order, around the full moon of October of '69. So, let's see, I just celebrated my 25th anniversary as an RDNA priest, I think.

MS: Congratulations!

IB: I survived to tell the tale. In any event, at that time, I felt pretty much that RDNA was Pagan, whether it was that obvious to the members then or not. I moved to Minneapolis, I lived in Minneapolis for two years, I started up a grove there, and then, helped a couple of other people start other groves in other places.

MS: That would be...

IB: Traveled around, initiated a whole bunch of people.

MS: And we're still trying to piece together it.

IB: I know, I'm going to try to go through my... I actually have pretty good records... they just are all buried in files that I can't reach because of the other piles of paper in front of them. I will try to get them to you in time to be of some value for your thesis. In any event, let's see, I think I started out with something called the Schismatic Druids of North America, the SDNA, MS: Which was the group underneath the Provisional Council of Arch-Druids.

IB: Right. I discovered this since, the Council of Dalon Ap Landu, wrote it's by law so that changes could only be made by a quorum of the entire Council, not a quorum of those that could be found. That it had essentially paralyzed itself, and made it impossible to accomplish anything. So that was when I then attempted to start up a Provisional Council.

MS: Yes, did that ever accomplish anything?

IB: I'm not sure it did actually. Other than, a bunch of us exchanging letters back and forth.

MS: Well, that's what normally ends up happening.

IB: In any event, I cannot recall the precise sequence between starting up the SDNA, and the HDNA, the Hasidic Druids of North America in St. Louis. That was roughly the same time, in '74, '75, and early '76. Then, when I went back to California, I believe I started referring to, I was reelected the Arch-Druid of the Berkeley grove there, around 1976. I'm not really certain on a lot of these dates, I'm afraid. In any event, I went back to California... I know I went back to California in '76... Cause, I was there in time for the bicentennial fireworks. I became Arch-Druid of the Berkeley group, we started referring to it as the NRDNA, since people found that a little less silly sounding than, SDNA or HDNA. And then some of the other people who I had ordained started up groups, and they were referring to there groups as NRDNA, too. Although it was never really... None of these groups was ever particularly structured. Obviously it was in 1976 that I produced the "Druid Chronicles (Evolved)." At least I believe that's the date it has on the front cover. Now, what I'm confused about, is exactly how the printing got done. I can't remember whether I did the typesetting in Minneapolis, or in Berkeley. But Bob Larson and I printed the one and only printing of it that was ever done. And we did that at his print shop, that he was working in, in Berkeley, in Lughnasadh of 1976. So, I can't really, at this point remember the sequence, I'll have to go back through files and see if I can find some letters that talk about more precise dating for that. In any event, in the middle 1970s I was back in Berkeley. We had a grove there for a while. As I recall, there was.. I was trying to make the group disciplined, and there wasn't a whole lot of interest in that. And, I was trying to get people to start taking it as a serious religion, and there wasn't a whole lot of enthusiasm for that either.

MS: Did they consider themselves a religion at that point?

IB: Most of them did, yes. The things that specifically characterized all the offshoots I was responsible for was that we said in our own definition that we were a religion. That it wasn't just a philosophy, that it was in fact a religion. Probably, the thing that specifically characterized them was that they were Pagan religions, identifying themselves as part of the Neo-Pagan community. Whereas the old RDNA never did that. <pause> Now, somewhere along in here, I think in the early seventies, Bob Larson got involved with a group of celtophiles, who ran something called Clan na Brocheta, which was primarily a Renaissance Fair group, who performed music and theater at the Renn. Faïres. And, he became their resident Arch-Druid, and he started referring to it as the Orthodox Druids of North America, because they were doing things in Irish. There was only the one group of them, as far as I know, that ever existed, but.. and it was only a tongue and cheek reference, I don't think he ever filed any papers with..., but I think they did occasionally refer to themselves in print as the Clan Na Brocheta Grove of the ODNA. <pause> So, let's see, I suffered burn out, spun out and crashed at some point in the late seventies, I believe. There was a major explosion in the Druid group in Berkeley, and I just got sick of the politics, and quit. Now, I believe, off and during these times, I was publishing various things called the Druid Chronicler, and the Pentalpha Journal and Druid Chronicler. We can get some more dates out of those. So it must have been 1980 or '81 that I burned out on Druidism for a while. In fact I burned out on the whole Magical community for a while. I sold a large part of my occult library, and invested the money in computer books.

MS: Your, excuse me, your what? Your what all?

IB: Occult Library, the books I had on Magic and Religion.

MS: Oh, OK.

IB: I got rid of quite a few of them at that point, and used the money to buy books on computers. And taught myself some marketable job skills, and started earning a living for the first time in my life. Or at least for the first time in several years. Then I moved back and forth across the country a few times. Doing computerized typesetting and layout work, small business consulting, technical writing, a little of this, a little of that. And eventually, in 1984, I mentioned to Shenain Bell, who I had met in an Irish class in New York City, some of the things that Jim Duran had told me about Druid survivals in the Baltic Territories. Druid in the loose generic sense of Indo-European Clergy. And Jim had said that, if you took the material that was available in the Soviet archives on Pagan survivals in Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia, and combined it with the [Carmina Gadelica], dating materials, and the surviving Celtic sagas, you could pretty much reconstruct eighty or ninety percent of what old time Druidism had really been about. And, I mentioned that to Shenain, and he got very excited and he started discussing it with other friends, and the next thing I know, people were saying, let's start up another Druid group, and I said, oh no, not again. It's very hard to explain this rationally, but over and over again in my life, I've felt someone picking me up by the scruff of my neck and dragging me back into Druidism. So, whether it was the Earth Mother, or Be'al, or someone else, with a capital "S." I was given to know that this was something that had to be done. So that's when I started up ADF, and I deliberately choose the name of Ar nDraiocht Fein to make it very clear that no, I was not hijacking Reform Druidism as I had been accused of in the past, that we were starting something brand new, that we would proudly date ourselves to that year.

MS: That was 1984?

IB: I believe that was 1984. Might have been '83, but I think it was '84.

<to someone else> Yeah when where we meeting?

<someone else>: our meeting in the village was '83 so the ... no it was '82. Shenain says founded in '83, but I think it '84. you dated wrong I think it was earlier than that.

IB: I dated from Samhain of '84.

IB: Ok, April of '86, my wife says, is when we.. '87.. was when we signed the articles of association, and made ADF a legal entity, on a water bed yes. The first board of trustees meeting was held on a water bed, we thought that suitably Pagan. It was also the only quite room in the house. We were at a party with some friends. And then in <off> 1989 we incorporated?

<Someone else>: Here, in this house.

IB: I'm consulting my off-line memory here.

<Someone else>: No, I was already off the board, and I didn't leave the board until...

IB: So it was '91. I'll have to look it up for you. It was '90 or '91 that we incorporated,

<Someone else>: I think it was '91

IB: and we got tax status last year, I believe, so we're now a 501c3. OK, That's a very brief and disjointed look at my history with Reform Druidism in terms of organizational, such as it is, structure.

MS: Ok, one of the things I have to do in my paper is... First of all, I have to prove that, I call it American Druidism, which is not the best term I could use, but it's the one I used, as including the RDNA, NRDNA, and everything else there, ADF and Keltria. Now, you just mentioned that you chose the name Ar nDraiocht Fein, as being, to avoid seeming that you were hijacking Reform Druidism, now does that mean that there was no connection with Reform Druidism?

IB: No, it means that, I really got worn down, with year after year after year after year of the older members of the RDNA feeling that I had done something terrible to their creation. And so, I decided that if we called it something else, it would not be something that people would automatically associate with all the other Reform Druids. Now, I borrowed some bits and pieces of the RDNA liturgy, because I'd been using it for twenty years.

MS: I believe mostly the blessing of the waters,

IB: The blessing of the waters, we used the catechism of the waters, and we used the consecration, we used the sacrifice prayer, but, the thing that's interesting is, it's been a matter of evolution that we started out with that material, and as I did more research into Celtic studies and Indo-European studies, we started modifying it. So, although the standard liturgical design is recognizable, that's mostly because the standard liturgical design in Indo-European cultures is pretty much the same, whether you're talking Pagan or Christian.

MS: And what is that basic structure?

IB: Ooooo.

MS: Without getting too complicated.

IB: That's a whole long lecture. Five basic phases, two liturgies. Now I might want to go so far as to say it's a global, but I'm not going to stick my neck out on that. I will say that I'm very familiar with it in terms of Indo-European religious ceremony.

MS: I think I've read these somewhere before, but could you...

IB: You probably have. There in one of... There's a whole long discussion of it in DP 2 I believe, or 4. The five basic phases to liturgy, that is to say worship ritual, the first phase is establishing sacred space and time. The second phase is reconstructing the cosmos and opening the gates between the worlds. The third main phase is generating energy, offering praise to that which is worshiped. The fourth main phase is a return flow of energy from the entity, or entities worshiped. And, the fifth main phase is unwinding the energy patterns that were created prior to that. Now that's very loose.

MS: That's very loose.

IB: And if you're going to quote me, I'd rather you quoted from the written material. <laughs>

MS: Yes, I understand. All right, and you say this is more the reason why the liturgies are similar between ADF and NRDNA?

IB: Well, the RDNA liturgy is in many ways, is clearly based on a Christian pattern. And the liturgy as ADF does it is based in part on that, but more in part of what I could reconstruct from dating ritual. And the few references that we have to Druidic ceremony. The ones that appear authentic. <Pause> Now in terms of the terminology that I use today, I consider the RDNA to have been a Meso-Pagan Organization. Now, Paleo-Pagan, and Meso-Pagan, and Neo-Pagan, are not clear-cut divisions. There's no sharp dividing line between those categories. They're points on a spectrum that blends imperceptibly. I believe, and this is what I want to find out from you, if you've managed to discover it: I believe that David Fisher came from a family of people involved in the United Ancient Order of Druids, or one of the other related fraternal offshoots.

MS: David Fisher, as far as I know, refuses to answer anything. So I can't... or maybe it's just bad addresses, but it just doesn't seem to work. I've talked with Norman Nelson who was a Mason, and he says there ain't nothing that looks Masonic, but as I am not a Mason I cannot possibly figure it out.

IB: Ah, OK.

MS: And Gordon Melton has not replied.

IB: In the past, I was in the habit of referring to the various Meso-Pagan Druid groups in England as being Masonic/Fraternal Druids. That was probably much too loose of language on my part. The cross over is easy to make in England, where for centuries it's been common for somebody whose interested in metaphysics and the occult to belong to more than one group simultaneously. There are obvious similarities to Masonic ritual in the surviving United Ancient Order of Druids ceremonies that I have seen scripts of. That is to say, the style of language is very similar, the style of ceremony is very similar, the images are different. So a modern day Mason, looking at those would not see the similarities. But, certainly I don't think the United Ancient Order of Druids has considered itself a Masonic organization in 200 years.

MS: Yes, mostly charitable, I think.

IB: What?

MS: Charitable organization.

IB: yeah, well a charitable, a fraternal organization. So, I believe that I can see from the earliest Ur text rituals, that David Fisher was probably working from one of the liturgy books of the AOD. And, that combined with his insistence that Druidism was a philosophy applicable to any religion, which is almost a direct quote from the AOD, makes it fairly clear that he was starting out with that, what I call Meso-Pagan approach. The mixing of Celtic Paganism with extremely liberal Christianity. Actually Unitarianism, it turns out.

MS: I always thought of it as Deism.

IB: A lot of Deism, too. I don't know, did you get the magazine that the British Council of Druid Orders put out?

MS: Druid's Voice.

IB: They published an article, in one of the issues that they sent me, on the Iolo Morganwg activity with the Unitarians. It turns out that he was one of the early Unitarian agitators.

MS: Ok, that makes sense.

IB: And he thought of Unitarianism, and Druidism as being essentially the same thing. So, that kind of an approach of mixing whatever they might have had, or fantasized they had that was Pagan, with liberal Christianity, is really characteristic of what I call a Meso-Pagan approach.

MS: Yeah, I agree with you.

IB: It's roughly the equivalent to what was done with Voudoun, and Macumba and Santeria where you mixed Paganism and Christianity, in their case for survival. I think it was partly done for survival, in terms of public relations, in England, but it was also done because the guy who invented most of it was an agitator in the ultra-liberal wing of Christianity. And he saw the Druids as being exemplars he could point to, that English men would be... now this is sexist, of course... that English men would be proud of, and willing to follow the example of. So, in any event, RDNA started out Meso-Pagan. And it was, I will have to admit, it was probably due to my agitating, that it began to move in the direction of being Neo-Pagan. Because I was the one who first, to my knowledge anyway, wrote to any of the older members and said, hey this looks like a Pagan religion here, why don't we admit that it's a religion, and learn what we can learn from the other people in the Neo-Pagan community.

MS: Well, the Neo-Pagan community was not extremely well known at that time, or was it?

IB: Well, that's true. No, it was not particularly well known at that time, and I did not understand, as most people don't when they're young and involved in some kind of a cultural movement, just how tiny the pond was that I was swimming around in.

MS: Well, most of them seem to have pretty much grown out of this thing, I still remember being warned in 1989, stay away from Isaac. But, I think most of the people have pretty much forgotten the incident by this point.

IB: Wait a minute? What incident?

MS: Oh, the letter incident. The 1974 letter. There are just like dozens of letters in the Archives here about that. The initial reactions were pretty strong.

IB: Oh, when I published my letters and Reform Druidism was a Pagan religion and should admit it.

MS: Yeah.

IB: Yeah. I had no idea that that was going to provoke that kind of a reaction. I didn't even get most of the reaction, most of it seems to have gone completely past me, people talking to each other, and not bothering to send me a copy.

MS: I wasn't sure about that.

IB: I saw, maybe a dozen letters, all told, during that whole controversy. You probably have a much better picture of it than I did at the time.

MS: What is your impression of what happened to the NRDNA during the beginning of the eighties? It seems to have disappeared, or gone into what they call the boring years.

IB: The Boring Years, yeah. The San Francisco Bay regions in many ways is similar to England, a terrible thing for a Celtophile to say, but true, in that there were a certain number of people who were interested in the occult and unusual religions, and many of them belonged to each other's groups, and a lot of the activity that took place, took place at the instigation of actually a rather small circle of people. I think, what basically happened was: after the Berkeley grove blew up, that the Orinda Grove continued to survive off and on, but that was like five or six people, I think. Larry Press is the one to ask questions about the Orinda Grove. And, I believe they existed, off and on, to this day. Stephan always had a grove operating out of his back yard. Where ever Stephan Abbot was, he would say there was a grove. But, in point of fact, the grove actually existed only on those occasions when Stephan was in the mood to throw a ritual. And, it was essentially, you know, a charismatic following of whoever was hanging out with Stephan at the time.

MS: When was this starting? When did this Steven come in?

IB: Stephan Abbot? Oh god, he goes way, way, way, way back. Way back. He may go back to the very beginnings of the Berkeley Grove, I mean late sixties/early seventies at least. I lived next door to him for a while. We were roommates in a house for a while. We had a lot of interaction together. There was a time period when the Hazelnut Grove, and the Berkeley Grove were functioning simultaneously. And then, when the Berkeley Grove blew up, Stephan insisted that he would keep ceremonies going, and I think he did for a while. Then, Stephan, who has never had a very good grasp of real world economics, and therefore has been homeless on many occasions, or has had to move rapidly from one home to another home, as he moved around, his supposed grove moved with him. But, I was shocked to discover that he actually got around to buying a post office box in San Jose for his current grove, but his phone was recently disconnected, so I have no idea where he is. This is something that happens fairly commonly.

MS: We're back again.

IB: Stephan and Tezra, both know my feelings about them, but I don't necessarily want that shared with whoever might happen to hear the tape.

MS: So, I hate to bring this up, but what is the explosion of the Berkeley Grove?

IB: I can't remember.

MS: I think it has something to do with two people wanting to be Arch-Druid, or something, at the same time? But that's the only [person] I had.

IB: It was a... I'm going to have to look it up for you, there was a bitterly contested election for Arch-Druid, I had been out of town for a long time, I came back, a lot of the people in the grove wanted me to take over as Arch-Druid again, others wanted the person who had been Arch-Druid for the preceding couple of years to be reelected [Joan]. They held an election, and I think I won by one vote. That's the sort of thing that blows up small groups. And there were also some major personality conflicts going on between some of the organizers, I was trying to accomplish, on a smaller scale, many of the things that I have since done with ADF, and although there were three or four people folks in the group who were enthusiastic about that, the rest of them just didn't see it as being what they wanted to do with Druidism. So, all that got tied into the elections. Then there was a ritual that was going to be done on the beach, that wound up evolving a very long walk, and I think it's now called the Death March. That was Stephan's usual poetic exaggeration. To get to the spot where... I think it was Joan, I don't think it was Nina... It was Joan's decision that there was a specific spot on the beach that was absolutely perfect, and we saw no reason why a bunch of healthy people couldn't walk a mile. Well, one of them wasn't so healthy, but she wasn't the one who complained. That was a young lady who had Polio, and was used to walking along after other people and keeping up. In any event, that was just one more excuse for people who thought I was turning into a rigid religious fanatic, and they wanted nothing to do with it. <pause> What? Make a sacrifice for your religion? How un-American?

MS: Let me just get Henge of the Keltria out of the way here. I heard something about the twelve messages tacked onto your van or something, at PSG. What was your reaction to the Keltria? It was not quite a defection, but...

IB: It was a schism. Actually, though I was slightly annoyed at the time, I fairly rapidly came to see it as a very healthy thing. I figure any religion that has new religions spinning off from it is obviously doing something right. I mean that's a healthy sign for any organization, that it produces offspring. You know, mutations. The people who started Keltria seemed to be more interested in focusing on Celtic rather than Pan-Indo-European approaches to the material. At the time, I think they were quite a bit looser in their attitudes about what kinds of scholarship to accept. And they wanted to do rituals that were more reminiscent of Wicca than what I thought reconstructed Druidism should be. They also had some major disagreements with us over the organizational function and structure of ADF. Now, in the years since they split off, they have come to be more and more similar to ADF, in that... they discovered that some of the organizational rules that I had instituted, I had instituted for very good reasons. That it's the nature of social organizations, whether religious or non-religious to behave in certain ways, and if you plan for it ahead of time you can prevent quite a few headaches. And, I believe, possibly stung by one or two rude comments of mine on the topic, they've taken more and more of the Wiccan/Cabbalistic, non-ancient stuff out of their ceremonies, and tried to put more authentic material into their ritual. I can't say that for sure because I haven't been to a Keltrian ritual, but from the discussions I've had on the phone with Tony, I've gathered that Keltrian ritual, now, does not resemble Wiccan ceremony near as much as it used to.

MS: It doesn't, no. It doesn't seem to be very closely related at all.

<break>

IB: No, the first schism from ADF was Shadow Path Grove in Connecticut, which spun off independently because they didn't really want to run an open grove, which is how ADF Groves are structured. They wanted a closed coven style group, and they didn't want to go public and invite total strangers to show up and participate.

<break>

IB: Schisms from ADF. So the first schism was Shadow Path Grove, that was, I can't remember the year. Then was Keltria. Then the next one was Druidactios.

MS: That's a split off?

IB: Yes.

MS: Oooh! Interesting.

IB: Much to the... It's difficult to get the guy who started it, Tom Cross to admit it, but he was in point of fact a member of ADF [and the NRDNA.]

MS: Oh, does that mean I have to include him in the Definition of American Druidism?

IB: Yes and No. His group doesn't exist anymore.

MS: I heard actually that it does.

IB: Oh yeah? Well, the last I had heard from him, he had announced that he was converting back to Catholicism, and that all real Celts would be Irish Catholics, if they were real Celts. And his second in command, whom he had begged to take over the group had left it in disgust, and started his own Roman Paganism group. That's Ernie Didwell, who now lives in Arizona. An old time Neo-Pagan founding father of the community, in fact. In any event, Tom Cross... You should have the copy of DP that had, what did I call it, a forest full of groves, a discussion of other Druid organizations.

MS: I don't actually have all the issues, I don't believe.

IB: Oh, well tell me which ones you don't have and I'll try to get them to you. I though I sent you a full set.

MS: I'll have to get back to you on that one.

IB: In any event, Tom Cross, like many another person, has erroneously assumed that I am Jewish. Because he's anti-Semitic, he thought it was horrifying that somebody who was Jewish could be running a Druid organization. In point of fact, I'm not Jewish, but it has stirred up that same controversy on many occasions in my life.

MS: How is Druidactios a split off? Besides the fact that he was an ADF member?

IB: He was an ADF member. He started out using a lot of our materials, and then gradually replaced it with his own materials. He decided he wanted to do Gaulish Druidism. And since there's almost nothing known about it, it gives him plenty of room for him to improvise. What he essentially did was, he started up a Celtic version of the Norse Meso-Pagan groups.

MS: That's what I figured.

IB: It was the same, the racism and the emphasis on blood and family and the sexism. You've read his book? The Sacred Cauldron?

MS: I have read The Truth About Druids, and I have glanced through The Sacred Cauldron at a friend's house.

IB: One of the things that's really funny is that one of his major objections to ADF was that we used comparative Indo-European Studies as one of our sources of inspiration, and he thinks that that's a terrible thing to do, that we should only use Celtic materials, and then proceeds to put rituals in his book that are essentially thinly Celticized versions of Nordic fire rituals. In any event, I committed a major crime with him in that I was not... a) he thought I was Jewish, b) I wasn't anywhere as impressed by him as he thought I should be. In any event, so he started up Druidactios. I saw their mailing list at one point, they never had more than about forty people on the mailing list, and two dozen of those where exchange subscriptions with other Pagan publications. He only put out like two or three issues of his journal.

MS: Do you have copies of those?

IB: I believe I might.

MS: Because I would like copies of those.

IB: I have at least a copy of one. He seemed to spend an enormous amount of time writing poison pen letters, about me and other people in the Pagan community, who didn't immediately acknowledge his superiority.

MS: That's what I kind of picked up.

IB: I mean, it was just thoroughly unprecedented, unpleasant jerk. I think is the technical, scientific, theological term. In any event,

MS: Are there any other schisms?

IB: I think that's it. Currently. For all I know there may soon be others. I mean, certainly we get, I get letters from people who say that, you know, they're starting a new group and they're borrowing stuff from us. And that's perfectly fine with me, that was one of the things that I expected to have happen with ADF.

IB: ...out as having been a member of ADF, I had no indication that he had any background in Druidism prior to the membership in ADF, I could be wrong. I would have to go look up his membership records.

MS: It's a bit too late for me to stick him in my paper, except in the end notes.

IB: But he was upset that we had a non-racist, non-sexist policy, he thought our politics were too liberal. His politics were slightly to the right of Attila the Hun. And I'm liberal.

MS: OK, let's get some statistics on the ADF.

IB: OK.

MS: What are the number of paid members in the ADF, roughly?

IB: That has vacillated wildly. At the moment, I believe the current number of paid members is around 250. With a roughly equal number of paid subscribers to the Druids Progress, and about a seventy to eighty percent overlap. Not all the members subscribe to DP, and not all subscribers of DP are members. What I have discovered however is that this is not actually, necessarily, the most important statistic. I found this out by discussing the topic with Unitarians, and a few other people in other groups at the World Parliament of Religions, in terms of the impact that ADF has, it's sometimes more interesting to look, not at the total number of people who have purchased memberships in the organization, but the people who consider themselves part of the tradition. That is to say, we have about a dozen chartered groves right now, that is to say February of '94. Eight of those groves, at least, are having regular meetings at which anywhere from twenty to sixty or seventy people show up. And those people consider themselves members of the local grove, even though there might be only five or six of them in a given grove, who officially join ADF. So, in terms of the people who have been in ADF and consider themselves ADF Druids, they just haven't gotten around to renewing, and/or the ones that are too cheapskate to buy memberships, but they still want to have the access to the traditions, written and other material. We're probably closer to around a thousand to twelve hundred. Normally, in most religions you would say followers, but we don't have much in the way of followers in the Pagan community. Most Pagan's don't approve of following.

MS: Don't want to go into other Druid groups right now, but... Might as well get them out of the way. OK, what other Druid groups are there presently in the United States, and do you consider them to be in the same category as the RDNA, ADF, and Keltria?

IB: It all depends on how we define our terms. The largest by far is the United Ancient Order of Druids, which still has several thousand members in the US, clustered mainly in Ohio and California. They're a fraternal organization like the Koanas Club, or the Lions, or the Elks. They don't have anything to do with us, even though I've written to them occasionally and exchanged nice letters, they're not connected to the Pagan community at all, to the best of my knowledge. The Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, which was very definitely Meso-Pagan when it started out is becoming increasingly Neo-Pagan, under the influence of it's current chosen chief, Philip Carr-Gomm, who is a heck of a nice guy. I'm currently reading his book, that he just published, his new one, called The Druid Way.

MS: Very good book.

IB: Excellent, I'm really enjoying it. Even though I get annoyed when he occasionally throws these things in: "Ancient Druids believed..." and it's one of these things that was invented in the 1700s. But, other than that I'm really enjoying the book a lot. I'd say the OBOD is well on the way from the transition from Meso-Pagan to Neo-Pagan. They have several hundred members, I think.

MS: In the United States, or in Britain?

IB: Mostly in England, but they seem to have at least a few dozen in the United States, they have several local groves in the area, that we're going to be starting to list in DP and News from the Mother Grove. We just voted a policy, that I invented, called "a Forest Full of Groves" policy, whereby we will start publishing the central addresses, and local group addresses of the various and sundry other Druid groups that we get along with, which is most of them, by and large. Oh, that's right, I forgot yet another Druid group that was a schism from ADF, because I repressed the memory. Well, it wasn't a schism so much as it was a rip-off, something called the Divine Circle of Sacred Grove: A Druid Fellowship.

MS: They're an offshoot of Barney, aren't they?

IB: Originally they're from Barney. Their leader joined ADF, claiming to have absolutely no background in Druidism what-so-ever, and then preceded to plagiarize our materials, to mix it in with the stuff she had plagiarized from several other people. We were responsible for exposing them as being fraudulent, and essentially drove them out of town, in the Seattle area, and they've now moved to the Arizona area, and we're keeping in touch with law enforcement people there. They are not nice. In any event, other Druid groups around. Well, there's the RDNA, and it's offshoots. some of them Meso-Pagan, some of them Neo-Pagan, many of them in transition. There's ADF. There's Keltria. Druidactios, if it still exists and functions, is Meso- not Neo- and not interested in being Neo-. Tom Cross is furious that ADF is so "Wicced" as he puts it, even though I've done my best to make sure that what we're doing actually bears very little resemblance to Wicca. But, for some strange reason he's decided that we're Wiccan, and he's agin it. And he's against Neo-Paganism. So, Druidactios is, would be on the Meso-line. There's a whole bunch of groups in England, that we're in contact with,

MS: They're not really pertinent right now.

IB: They're not really pertinent, because they're not really functioning in the United States. I'm unaware of any other Druid Groups in the United States. I'm sure there are some. Oh yeah, there's a, another schism. <laughs> What do they call themselves? The group in Portland. The transsexual people, Yeah. One guy in Portland was a member and was starting a grove to send his spin off and start his own Celtic church or something. Primitive Celtic Church, that's it.

MS: Primitive Celtic Church.

IB: Right. And, their rituals are pretty much identical to standard ADF rituals, and the theology is pretty much the same, as near as I can tell, the only difference is that they're independent. So they're Neo-. Primitive Celtic Church. They exist, far as I know, only in the Portland area. Every once in a while I'll hear about groups being Druid here and there, but when I contact them, I either don't hear from them or it's a group that somebody has just started and they don't know what they're doing and they join ADF. At this point, I have to say that ADF is probably the most influential of current Neo-Pagan Druid groups in America. Closely followed by Keltria. Do you know about Cindy Salee NRDNA grove up in Seattle?

MS: I tried contacting them, and just didn't get anything.

IB: Well, they're not organized in any sense, other than it's just the grove that she's been running for twenty years. Oh right Jay Tibbles. Jay Tibbles was one of the board members of the Divine Circle Group, when we exposed them, and he schismed off from them, and joined ADF. He's also joined the OBOD. He started his own group called the American Druidic Church. You'll be getting these addresses in the mail, I put them in the mail to you yesterday. Yeah, Jay Tibbles, the American Druidic Church. Very nice guy, he's an MD. And, they're essentially doing something that is Wicca essentially, with a strong Celtic focus.

MS: Alright, let try to get back over to the topic.

IB: I'm sorry.

MS: No problem, this is all good information.

IB: I was known as being scattered, absentminded, and having a terrible memory before.... I came down with a neurological disease.

MS: Do you see any similarities between RDNA, NRDNA, ADF, and Keltria, that makes them distinct from any other American Druid group?

IB: Rephrase that question.

MS: Do the aforementioned groups bear a closer resemblance to each other than to other groups?

IB: Well, obviously the NRDNA bears a closer resemblance to the RDNA than to anything else. ADF and Keltria bear a very close relationship to each other. And, historically, we're all linked in a chronological line. The NRDNA grew out of my efforts to convince the RDNA to get rid of the Meso and go for Neo. ADF was in many ways a result of my attempts, of my seizing attempts to do that within the RDNA structure, and just starting up something independent. And Keltria was an offshoot of a group of people inside ADF who wanted to take it in a slightly different direction.

MS: I guess that's good enough.

IB: As far as I'm concerned, all of these, we will cheerfully publish networking information for all of these groups, as well as the groups in the British Council of Druid Orders, and so on and so forth, all the groups that are legit. Whether we agree with their theology or not. If we think that they are, how would I put this? If we think that a group is positively inclined towards helping the environment, and is nature oriented, and upholding what they think of as the highest ideals of Druidism, then we would be inclined to be happy about networking with them, and helping people get in touch with them. I mean, some of the groups just, you know, I have no interest in. There's a cabbalistic group... Cabalistic Druidism, that doesn't make any sense to me. But they like it, so if we have people who come to us who are interested in Druidism, and are also interested in cabbala, I would send them off to that group.

MS: Well, see I wasn't trying to imply that we are the only four groups in the United States, which is not true.

IB: No, but they're the four groups that a) I'm most familiar with, b) that I've played a historical role in, and c) that I can chronologically and evolutionarily link one to the other.

MS: I think we've already gone over what books... Have we gone over what books deal with American Druidism?

IB: There aren't any.

MS: There aren't any, ok, that's right.

IB: The best source to deal with it is Margot Adler's Drawing Down the Moon, Rosemary Guiley's Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft has a long article on ADF

MS: And you.

IB: and me, based on interviews with me that are pretty darn accurate, and that's about it.

MS: OK.

IB: Maybe Gordie has published something somewhere that I don't know about.

MS: There's a few I'll give a copies to you someday.

IB: Oh yeah, Laurie Cabot's book has been talking about me too.

MS: Who's Laurie Cabot?

IB: Laurie Cabot is the official witch of Salem Massachusetts, and she just put out a book called Power Through Witchcraft. And, apparently, she's been mentioning us and recommending us, because we've been getting a lot of people saying, "I heard about you from Laurie Cabot's book, so what the heck." I have no idea how accurate her commentary would be about me. I haven't read it yet, I'm going to.

MS: So you've already mentioned that you share and exchange information with a variety of Druid groups. This is different from Keltria, which does not. I've heard the figure that 35% of ADF members come from Drawing Down the Moon article.

IB: Um, not anymore.

MS: Not anymore?

IB: I'd say that that was certainly true in the first seven or eight years. One of the things that has made ADF such a challenge to organize and to coordinate has been that we made the leap to a national organization at the start, we decided that we were going to function that way, as a national network for people who wanted to reconstruct Druidism in a way that we thought was focused on excellence rather than romanticism. So we have had lots of people communicating with each other at great distances, mostly through the mail, and a lot of people who heard about us primarily through Margot's book, and then joined the organization, and either stayed or didn't stay. This is different from the average organization, which starts out with a small local group of enthusiasts, and gradually gets larger and produces off shoots. So, it's had both strengths and weaknesses to the approach that we used.

MS: What are the main attractions of members now? How do most members come to find ADF?

IB: A multiple number of sources. The 1-800-Druidry line, that has been mentioned in various articles, has generated a lot of phone calls, and a lot of those people have become members as a result. The computer bulletin boards are attracting a lot of people since we have an ADF discussion group in the PODS net echo system. Are you familiar with that?

MS: Not yet.

IB: Pods is Pagan Occult Discussion System, or something like that. It's one of the FIDO net echo systems around the country, small local bulletin boards that use a tree structure to pass messages back and forth. Very informal. It's not a structure, it's a.... bulletin board organizing system paradigm that programmers use in common. In any event, so there's one of the many FIDO nets is the Pagan collection of FIDO nets. Bulletin boards passing Pagan messages around, and ADF is one of the discussion areas. There is also an ADF discussion area in Genie, there's one on the internet. And we also have people discussing ADF on all of the other main computer systems, like America online, and CompuServe, prodigy and so forth. So our name is certainly bandied about a great deal. And we've uploaded basic ADF literature with our address and with our phone number, so we get a lot of new members that way. And a lot of the new members are people who simply start going to a local grove, and attending. One of the biggest challenges we have right now is figuring out ways to persuade people that they should not just enjoy the fellowship of the local group, but actually join the organization and support the work that we're trying to do that requires money.

MS: You might want to take a look at the SCA, they're going through that problem right now.

IB: I'm not surprised.

MS: Yeah. OK.. and you also do presentations at conventions and such.

IB: Well, I.. yeah I go to festivals and things, not as many as I used to, because my health hasn't been good, but a lot... in the early days, a lot of the early growth of ADF came specifically as a result of presentations that I would do. I would go to a festival in some part of the country, talk about Druidism, talk about ADF, talk about what I'd like to do with it, a dozen people would join ADF, and the next thing we know we'd have two or three local groves. And, therefore, the majority of our groves wound up being in areas that I traveled to, which was mostly the east coast and the upper Midwest. That still has a strong effect on founding local groups. But, since

I'm not traveling as much as I used to, it's not as effective a method. There's also the fact that having had a kid, I've had to focus a lot more attention on staying home and earning a living, which I have never been able to do from being Arch-Druid, and that means that I'm spending a lot less time on promoting the organization and increasing its growth than I would like to be spending.

MS: You mentioned a Parliament of World Religions, is ADF part of any other interfaith councils?

IB: Not currently. It hasn't been relevant yet, simply because <pause> there aren't that many national ecumenical organizations. Local groves, are allowed to join local interfaith councils, but most local interfaith councils don't want Pagan groups, so that will vary considerably depending on what the local politics happen to be. I went... One of our members in ADF donated the money for me to go to the World Parliament of Religions, and so I went last September, and you probably read the results in the DP. the Druids Progress, or News from the Mother Grove, have you gotten that.

MS: I don't get News from the Mother Grove yet.

IB: Ah, I will try to send you some of those. It was a lot of fun, I learned quite a bit, and Paganism made quite a coming out party there.

MS: I heard about that.

IB Yeah.

MS: There was also Circle and wasn't Church of All Worlds there also.

IB: Yeah, and the Earth Spirit Community from Boston, which started out local became regional, and now is becoming a national organization.

MS: Do you see this to increase in the future?

IB: What? Ecumenical activity? Yeah, I think it's going to. Because the liberal members of the other mainstream religions are very very interested in Goddess worship, and in nature religion. And, they're perfectly willing to talk to us. So, even though the fundamentalists and the Greek orthodox and the Roman Catholics aren't to thrilled about us being around, the mainline Protestant and Unitarian and liberal Christian groups are very happy to sit down and have a cup of tea and find out what it is we really believe before they start arguing. I expect that there will be a lot of increasing interfaith activity between Neo-Pagans and non-Pagans in the future.

MS: I want to get a little more, I got like two more questions, here. Now as far as I've been able to pick up, the ADF is extremely well known for its pushing forward paid clergy, and obtaining church status. What were the other movements that were occurring at the same time you were doing this? For that paid clergy status and stuff? Were you alone, or were you among many people?

IB: Well, I told you about the ten year gap, didn't I?

MS: Yes I've heard of it.

IB: OK. About five or six years ago, I started talking about the need for professionally trained clergy in the Pagan community. That as Paganism became more mainstream, and as Pagan congregations became larger and larger, we were going to need a pool of clergy who were at least as well trained as the clergy of other religions are. And that meant that we needed to start having standards of qualification for clergy, based on demonstrable knowledge and skill. That in turn was eventually going to lead to people having to go to college or in some other way get an education related to how to be a clergy person. This tied into ADF study program, which I believe I sent you a copy of.

MS: I've read it.

IB: I believe that we are eventually going to have a full time paid Pagan clergy. We have full time Pagan clergy now. It's just that hardly any of them get paid. Some of them do, some of them are actually starting to be paid by their religious organizations for these fifty and sixty hour work weeks they put in. I believe Otter and Morning Glory now get a stipend for the work that they do. And, Anders and Deirdre Corbin from Earth Spirit. Officially they earn their living organizing Pagan festivals, unofficially they're basically being paid Pagan clergy. The topic was extremely controversial when I first brought it up, for a variety of reasons, both legitimate and illegitimate. And, I think that we are going to see paid Pagan clergy increasing, and twenty or thirty years from now, there'll be so many Pagan clergy who are paid that every one will wonder what all the controversy was about. Not that this is going to solve all our problems, since there are plenty of clergy who get paid who still have problems. But, it will relieve one set of stresses from the heads of those of us who put in incredibly long hours trying to organize and facilitate large scale Pagan groups, and then have to turn around and earn a mundane living. The main argument on that will be in the last two issues of Fireheart Magazine, if you can get them.

MS: OK, I don't know if I'll get a chance on that. What is the official church position, according to law, right now, of the ADF.

IB: The official legal status of ADF? We're an incorporated nonprofit religious corporation in the state of Delaware, and we have 501c3 status from the IRS, they think we're a church, or they think we're a religious organization, they don't necessarily call it a church. And, so we're completely legal. And, we are working on obtaining what is called a Group-Exemption letter for our local groves. But, the IRS requires us to pay a fee of five hundred dollars for that, and we haven't accumulated sufficient money to pay for it yet, but eventually, each and every single chartered grove of ADF will also have a tax exempt status.

MS: Are your priests considered to be legal ministers?

IB: By whom?

MS: I don't know, by the courts? For instance if someone confided something to one of your priests, would he be forced to divulge that information in a legal court? Or has this not come up yet?

IB: It simply has not come up yet. Our people have performed weddings and funerals. Several of our people are functioning as Chaplains, not in the Military, but we have a prison ministry operating out of the grove in Texas. And, we haven't had any trouble at all with legal recognition of our status. Over the course of the last twenty years, due primarily to the mischievous going-ons of the Universal Life Church, most state and local governments have backed away from trying to define who's a real clergy person, and what is a real religion. Mostly these days, they examine things on a case by case basis. And, if you have an unusual non-mainstream religious group then a local county court house, or state government may want to see materials about your organization, before they'll say, "OK, we'll let you marry and bury here." But, so far that really hasn't been a problem here.

MS: The last two questions are activism, and differences between Druidism and Wicca.

IB: Ok.

MS: Which one do you want to go for?

IB: You've got my discussion of the differences in the... between Druidism and Wicca... in the little brochures. The standard ADF brochures, I mean, they're not that major, in one sense. I mean, Druidism and Wicca are Neo-Pagan religions, as we practice them anyway. <pause> Neo-Pagan Druidism and Neo-Pagan Wicca are similar in that they are both part of the Neo-Pagan community. They're sibling religions, with overlapping memberships. I would say that at least a third and maybe a half of the members of ADF also practice one form or another of Wiccan. There's no real conflict between the two, but there is a different emphasis in theology, a different liturgical style. And, primarily the difference is between groups that are small, private and exclusive versus groups that are large, public and inclusive. but, there's no reason you can't do both simultaneously. That is to say, you can have a large Pagan congregation that has smaller groups within it. That's what we're seeing develop in the ADF Groves, just as I expected.

MS: The major theological difference is Polytheism versus Pantheism?

IB: No, Polytheism vs. Duotheism. Wicca's basic theology is Duotheistic, or in the case of some feminist traditions, Monotheistic. ADF's emphasis is Polytheistic. We think it's more important to honor and celebrate the differences in diversity of deity, rather than the similarities they might have with each other. So, the advantage is that we don't have to cram all the deities into a small set of symbolic pigeon holes. Not every goddess in the world fits into the Mother, Maiden or Crone trilogy. Not every god in the world fits into the Hunting God, Vegetation God, Sun God pattern. So, we have a lot more theological elbow room in that way. My wife is a Witch and a Druid, I'm a Witch and a Druid. I just spent most of my time, and my emphasis in public on the Druidic side, because that's the side that needs work in developing right now. The Wiccan community is doing very nicely, and growing geometrically in a very quiet fashion.

MS: Last question here is activism. Does your group, as a group ...

IB: We encourage our members, and our local groves to be active in areas that are relevant where they happen to live. In ecology, social justice, and so forth. We don't have one or two particular axes that we grind. A couple... several groves are doing tree planting activities for example. We've had litter clean ups, and recycling days, and one group volunteered at a soup kitchen for a weekend, blood drives, basically we want... I think that Pagan congregations, at least the public church ones, should be an integral part of their local, social as well as biological, environment. And, that means participating in the life of the community, giving something back for what you get. I also believe that Druids are the natural chaplains for an environmental movement. And, that people who think of themselves as being Druidic in nature, so to speak, should be involved in some sort of environmental activism, even if its just a matter of joining Green Peace and subscribing to Nature Magazine, they should be putting some of their time, money, and energy into helping the environment.

MS: Alright, well I think I'm going to close off this interview officially, lets see here.

Alice Cascorbi Interview

August 29th, 1993

Alice restarted the Carleton Druids in 1985 and was quiet influential in giving it a new face for the times, new customs with her friends, and breathing new life into the system.

Eric Hillemann (EH): This is Eric Hillemann, the Archivist at Carleton, the date is August 29th, 1993. What follows will be an interview with Alice Cascorbi, Carleton class of 1988. Also Sitting with us is Michael Scharding, the current Arch-Druid of the Carleton Druids and the Druids are expected to form what we are going to talk about today and what the Druids were like when you were here, but lets start out with some information about your own background and what brought you to Carleton. Get us to the campus...

Alice Cascorbi (AC): ok, I was raised in Cleveland Ohio and I went to a preppy private school for my high school and when it came time to look for a college, which all of were expected to do. I didn't know, what I wanted to be and I found out that liberal arts college would be a place for a person like me. We had a good guidance councilor who first pointed in this direction, but it was really a friend of mine, Frankie Bressman who was one class ahead of me, at that school, Laurel school in Ohio, who came here herself. She was class of 86 I guess, who, when I asked her where you going to school, oh she said, "oh Carleton in Northfield." I said, "Well, I guess I heard of that. It was a good school without the pretensions of some of the eastern schools, my hold cohort was being shoved toward. I had had too much and too much of the preppiness and pretension and so when I visited here, the thing that really decided me, I had looked at Oberlin which was quite close to home and Haverford, and Swarthmore, at U of Chicago and Vassar and of the two, I almost when to U of Chicago, but Carleton with its small town atmosphere. I never had been in a safe environment where people could really walk around at night. Even though it is not perfectly safe here, its a lot safer that what I grew up with. The unpretentiousness and yet intellectual, I don't know what the high intellectual level without pretentiousness and the way people seemed to interact when they walked around campus. I liked the atmosphere here it was relaxed and because it had a good reputation academically, that is all I knew about colleges. I came here. I choose Carleton, well for myself, I really blossomed here and I had a good time, a good experience. It was a life changing experience for me. The Druids are only a very small part of that. I didn't really know what I was doing, as a high school kid. This was a very good place to go and if I could choose again, I would choose a college like this.

EH: That is good to hear.

AC: Anyway, my religious background, which would be some interest to this is pretty typical intellectual semi-agnostic atheist parents. My mother raised Catholic. My father raised Lutheran. My father came from Germany. My mother came from Pennsylvania from a long line of people who been in this country a long time. So I have that in my background, for what it is worth, but neither of them was terribly religious. When their children were going up and we moved to Ohio, there was an Anglican church, Episcopal church just down the road. They considered it a great compromise between Catholicism and Lutheranism and so close to home too and we would go there. It was a friendly place, but we didn't have a community there and they were not into it religiously. I think if my parents had been more religious it would have been harder for me to accept what I did and what I have about my spiritual side. I was brought up with this sort of "religion is for kids." It is something we tell the children. It is, looking back, it is the Easter bunny. The parents didn't really believe it. The didn't really believe the teachings of their church. If my parents have spiritual, they do actually, their spiritual beliefs are a lot closer to mine, than to any Christian churches right now and so they are sort of Unitarian Agnostic people who have nothing against odd practice. They don't believe in the devil, they don't believe in, you know, a strong theology of that kind. I'm only getting to this because I'm not a very rebellious person by nature and if they had been, I probably would never have come out of the closet as a Druid. That is just my personality and unlike some of the other folks who hopefully are being interviewed too, I personally have always had a conflict between my desire to do Druid things and my desire to be a good girl and stay in the mainstream. I only put that out, because there are those of us too who are just drawn to it from an internal thing and have trouble with the flamboyant side. Some people really enjoy bucking the system and really had people like that when I was a Druid who were into it because it was cool and weird. There is certainly a place for that, but it is not where I'm coming from.

To make a longer story short, I had read a lot as a child. I read Greek mythology voraciously. I loved Greek mythology and by the time I was 6th or 7th grade age, I had realized that my parents didn't really believe the stuff in church, but they were acting as those they did only in front of the kids, you know. Don't swear sort of things. Sort of superficial lip service to Christianity. It made me really angry and when one of my little classmates said she was an atheist and that meant she didn't believe in god. I said, "Well that is what I am." Oddly enough, or at the same time, I had what I called my mystical streak. I just gave up try to analysis it because even at that time, there was times when I needed to pray or wanted to pray. Wanted to reach out and give thanks or give for help with something. I was 11 or 12 at this time. When I did that I reached out to Diana. The Goddess image that I knew from mythology and to Athena, but especially to Diana because I was a maiden, I was a young girl with tom boy tendencies and was quite unhappy where I was with my school. The maiden huntress image, was very attractive and comforting. Diana was my goddess, even though I was an Atheist. That is sort of where things stood. I came to College, I was 17. I had been skipped ahead a grade and that was a bad experience that I wouldn't do to a kid like myself at that point, but be that as it may. So intellectually up there, emotionally young, very young. Coming to college was the best thing that happened to me in terms of here I finally had, there were people all around me who were like me who had been smart, who had been weird and had often been ostracized because they were smart and or weird. I loved it, it was wonderful. To open parts of myself, be friends, having good friends. Living with other people all around me, having a roommate. It was tremendously hard especially the first term here, freshman year, but it was tremendously rewarding. For a couple of years, I was just being a student here. I went to Quaker meeting a couple of times. I was interested in their philosophy, but didn't find any real juice in it. I had heard of the Druids in the Carleton Catalogue that this was something that had started back in the '60s. It seemed awfully attractive. No, there weren't any on campus any more, it was something in the past, but what a cool idea, how funny. The amusing, the prankish nature of it to buck the chapel requirement in that way was funny and then somebody took me up to the Hill of 3 Oaks and said this is where they use to meet. That really appealed to my romantic side. God this is great, this hill, these beautiful twisty Oaks, this old stone. This is great. It was just a little part of the background of the school. It was just one of the little legends you here. I didn't. I always very, up until then, had been very private with my spiritual beliefs or spiritual side and very comfortable that way, only comfortable really by myself. Somebody, when I was a freshman, I lived on 4th Musser (Mec snickers)... shut up Mike. I know, I know, that considered one of the worse dormitories on campus and still is. Yeah, coming from Cleveland I was used to that.

EH: Cleveland prepares you for 4th Musser?

AC: That's right, yeah. So anyway, anyway my roommate was Rachel Leader. Done the hall was a woman named Judith Norman who was another freshman. We had a good forum, Judith and Rachel became two of my best friends. Two other people on the floor were Meg Ross who was a junior art major at that point. She had a single, which is probably the reason she was there, in Musser. Another freshman named Maggie Daggit and Maggie was a very frail women with a lot of problems. I think she was drug dependant. Anyway, many different people and I liked all of them. At some point in the fall of '83, Meg came up to us, me and Judith and said, "had we heard of the Druids?" I said, "Yeah" and she said she was a Druid and she one of the last ones left on campus and a guy, whose name many always forget and still forget who is probably David Frankel, right? Somebody who had graduated a few years earlier was the last Carleton Druid and he had inducted Meg into as a Druid, he was back on campus visiting that night and wanted to induct some more Druids if anyone was interested. Meg, asked Judith and me, would you like to become Druids? We said, "yeah, sure, that sounds like fun, what do we have to do?" she said grab your coat, come out to the Hill of Three Oaks (TM). Maggie was there was too and we told Maggie what we doing and asked if she wanted to come and so we all paraded out to the Hill of Three Oaks (TM). Meg had this big green chalice. One of these really ugly glass things that I guess.

MS: Maybe the deep glass chalice.

AC: No, there was 3 or 4 of them kicking around at different times at the Farm House arena, but this one was one big ugly green glass chalice that was probably from Ben Franklin store. Meg had that and somebody had a bottle of spirits of some kind mixed very thoroughly with water. This guy, who ever he was, was staying in Goodhue and we met him at Goodhue and he wore his bathrobe. He had clothes on, but had his bathrobe over as his ritual robe or something. Judith brought her stuffed tiger who is like a mascot. She stills has it and Maggie and I. We tripped up to the hill and the guy, these people know his name...

MS: No, I don't.

AC: Yes you do, never mind. He and Meg, I think we let a fire. We did, they did the blessing of the waters. I guess it was the winter season, so we did the waters of sleep blessing and then they told us the tradition was to become a first level Druid, you just had to say you wanted to, to participate in the waters thing and agree that you wish to be a Druid. He told us that there two things, two tenets of Druidism that we were swearing ourselves two. I found it pretty easy to swear to and they were reverence for nature and respect for all religious paths, respect for other religions. No problem, for me. So we, to use the Druid prevalence, we were sealed to service of the Earth Mother and I related this to my Greek spirituality thing and to my ancestral feelings. You know, that my ancestors are from Europe and this once was their religion. That whatever little bit was left, was left a harking back to that, to something out of my own people, way back and I was delighted. It was mostly for fun and the guy who ever he was, not to take it too seriously that some people in the past had taken this Druid thing really seriously and he didn't think that was a good idea. All the same, to consider ourselves Carleton Druids now. The made the circle. They made the water blessing and then he and Meg both dipped their fingers in the water and they made the circle with the two lines on our foreheads, all of our forehead, it was myself, Judith Norman and Maggie Daggit and Judith's Tiger also received the symbol his forehead. (general laughter) He has never attended another ceremony as far as I know. That was the beginning and the end of my Druid activity for 2 more years.

The next thing in line was, well I had taken a year off. I went through my freshman and sophomore years and decided I wanted to take some time off and so the school year 85-86 I was not enrolled at Carleton and I subsequently take back. I was in Northfield for a portion of that time beginning January 1986 and I was working downtown and living in town. So I still had contact with friends who were at Carleton and I would go visit them sometimes and stuff. Let me make sure I get everything right here, chronologically. There were some other students who were older than I was, who were interested modern Earth spirituality or modern Paganism. One of them I know was Tino Thompson and I think what had happened, the summer before, that is the summer of '85, some students had gone to the Pagan spirit gathering. No, I could be wrong about this. No, never mind, scratch that. Tino was interested in Pagan stuff and some other people were too. They, I wasn't part of that, invited a woman named Selena Fox to come here and speak. It must of happened sometime in early '86, because that is when I was back in town. I went to that lecture, I got an invite from someone I knew. She was a wonderful speaker. She gave a lecture on modern Paganism, modern Wicca. She's a Wiccan, you might say she is a witch and a shamanic practitioner. She talked about the Druids and their part in that small spiritual movement.

MS: She talked about the Carleton Druids?

AC: She did not as far as I remember directly. She talked about the spectrum of beliefs represented in modern Paganism and showed some slides the Pagan spirit gathering, that her group Circle Sanctuary puts on every year. Among them, well there are lots of many kinds of Pagans and there are the Druids. She described them as the Catholics among the Pagans. This was Isaac Bonewit's group. She had slides of Isaac and his group, some of followers at PSG under their Druid flag. I'm sure during the question and answer period somebody said something about Carleton Druids, but the main memory I have of that lecture, a wonderful introduction to people who are out there. There are people seriously worshipping Diana and saying they were, and not keeping it quiet and treating it and insisting they be treated as legitimate religious practitioner which was a new thing for me. As I said, she was an engaging lecture, she is a good teacher and she invited questions.

She talked about Satanism and that was not part of the Earth spirituality thing. It was a Christianity heresy thing. She likened the Satanist use of the pentacle to their use of the cross. In both cases they turn it upside down. I associated the pentacle with icky things and heavy metal music at best. I remember asking her well, who are these Satanists who go out and turn your pentacle upside down. She answered, in her experience, they were people who really lacked power, who were needing power in a big way. She is a psychologist. It was almost an psychological assessment who they might be. This was still freaky and you know the word witch was and to still is not a nice word in a lot of people's ears and certainly in mine. Oh, maiden mother and crow, Diana's maiden. Hmmm, interesting, I might be a witch, but no no no, I worship Diana. When it was over, there was a dinner for them, potluck held out at Farm house where Tino might have been living at the time. Anyway he was associated with people there, if he didn't live there. Selena and her husband Dennis were hanging out after dinner there and I went over there. I think I didn't eat dinner there, but I got there later with my boyfriend at the time, Hideo Yamada who kind of hid behind the paper and read the sports page. He came with me, but he thought it all too freaky, but that is a funny story in itself, but, he just converted to Catholicism and now he was gung ho about religion himself. We're not still going out, but we're friends. Religion was not something he wanted to touch, especially goofy religion. Selena was there. Dennis was there. I and several other folks.

Someone then brought up the Carleton Druids, we have this home ground Pagan movement here at Carleton and the ancestors of Isaac's group started here and Selena hadn't known that or she said, "That is amazing. Are there any still around?" and someone said "No, they died out." and she said, "that's too bad." I was there, and I said, "No, you know, I am a Druid, I was inducted several years ago, into the first level." And they were like "really, wow!" I guess people had said, "It's too bad we'd like to start it up again and we don't have any Druids of the old line." and they did, it was me and I didn't know it. Maybe a week later, we had a big induction ceremony, a lot of people had been sparked by this and had wanted to associate themselves with the Druids. I think Andrea Dawson, I don't know. Andrea Dawson was part of this with Jan Schlamp, both of them have changed their names now. Heiko Koester, Branden Shield, definitely him, Tino, although he wasn't a close friend of mine and I didn't do much religious practice with him. It was early spring in 86. I guess we looked up the Druid Chronicles. Someone had dug up a copy that might have been out at Farm house and looked up some of the ceremony's and things and getting more and more into it. We put together a big first level induction and had 30 people attend. Among them were Clay Christianson, who works for security here. He had been a friend, as much as a staff member can be a friend to little freshies and everything. He was a cool guy. He was the only staff member who I know of who has become a Druid. About 30 people, about mixed equally men and women, many of them I never saw again at a ceremony, but they seemed consider themselves Druids. I remember, I hope Clay doesn't mind this, but one of things you ask the people when you symbol on their foreheads is "are you ready for this, are you ready to be sealed to the service of the Earth Mother? Do you understand what you're doing?" When I asked Clay the question he said, "I've been ready all my life, you know..." Certainly, like in my case, there were people who had been feelings these things or feeling their invested somewhere other than the Christian milieu in which most of us grew up, but not having a name for it or a place to put it and the Druids became that for me for awhile. After the first big induction, there was no big danger that the lion, so to speak, would die out again. I don't know how much time we have left on this side... I can go into what we did as Druids as I went into my junior year and my senior year.

EH: There is time left, go ahead.

AC: So this thing in the spring happened and the following summer of 86, I left town, I actually went to Japan for a short while. Jan Schlamp and Heiko Koester and I think somebody else like Paul Gover, maybe, but definitely Jan and Heiko went to the Pagan Spirit Gathering that Circle puts on. It is a big week long get together/camp out thing in a camp ground in Wisconsin out in the country. They went and when they came back they were even more fired up. Both of them are go-getters, do it people and had a lot of energy which I never had and they we both also a year ahead of me. The were both at least the class ahead of me. That following fall, the fall of 86, we got the Chaplain at the school who was Jewelnel Davis and she began something new called the council for religious understanding. This was to be a lunch time, once a week get together. My impression was she had envisioned the Catholics talking to the Protestants and everybody talking to Jews kind of thing. Pretty typical ecumenical table, but there would be a topic each week and people would speak about their religious paths, responses to that topic whether it be war or the question of evil or smaller things, the place of women, things like this. The idea was to get religions talking to each other as represented by their student members here at Carleton. Jan and Heiko petitioned that the Druids be allowed to come and sit on this council. Things are a little fuzzy, I don't remember how many rituals or what was going on, at that time we began, sort of, the ritual practice that continued till I left here and after. Jan and Heiko had been exposed to the sweat lodge practice at PSG. They brought sweat lodging to Carleton. I'm sure they ran the first couple and Jan especially was really into it. Heiko went out at some point and cut down some Willow saplings and they built a sweat lodge out of saplings in the lawn at Farm house and dug up blankets wherever people could dig them up and put them over the sweat lodge. I don't remember when I did my first sweat, but it was there...

...Was Andrea was the one who started the nudity thing? I said, "no, not that remember." We always did sweats naked, but associated with some of the Pagan people was being a Nudist or going Naked in Farm House.

MS: Clothing optional house.

AC: Clothing optional house it became for awhile, but actually that was a little bit later and I really think Brandon Shield was the most into that. I should say, by this time, yeah the fall of 86, Brandon and I had started a relationship which was sort stormy and since has really got awful and I don't talk to him any more. I hope people don't judge me too awfully for that, but its like one of those college things. He was awfully attractive to me and I spent a lot time trying to get him to be to my boyfriend and a lot of that time happened while the Druid stuff has happening and inevitably some of that plays out. I only mention that for the sake of completeness, yes it is true. Heiko was going out with Jan at some point during this too. So we had couples forming among the Druids. Other folks since have told me like Nat Case who when I lived at Farm house my senior year, the year 87-88. He lived there too. After we both graduated, he let me know, that he considered himself a Pagan also, but never have felt good about coming to Pagan rituals, because he didn't really like Branden. Our leadership, I've seen this in other contexts, people who might have been interested in what we doing, might not have been socially interested in us or whatever and so because this is such a little college and people know each other very well often, the personal and the political get very intertwined. They certainly did for me, but let me try to pick up the thread of the narrative a little bit better.

Back in the fall of '86, I was a junior and I was living with Judith and Rachel, my good friends from freshman times in Nourse, second Nourse, Nourse 200. We were doing Druid rituals and I was trying to get through Organic Chemistry. Jan and Heiko were sitting on the council for religious understanding. There was a debate, the beginning of a series of debates around the Druids and around the legitimacy of the Druids, because here is a goofy out of the ground mushroom religion that the kids are doing. They decided we weren't a cult, which is good. A cult, not occult. No Guru not leading us down the wrong path, it was self-delusion if that, and that was ok. Many of the people on the council for religious understanding was quite wary of the idea of a non-Christian spiritual group claiming to be Druid and having meetings under the moon and probably naked sometimes and they were right. All this stuff. I recall reading, I think in the 'Tonian, something about this debate, Druids trying to get into the council for religious understanding and that the council had brought up the question, "well the Druids want in, what if some Satanist came and wanted in? Would we have to let them in?" "And that essentially they decided, that they would, if they wanted to be there. It was Heiko and Jan who did it. They went to those meetings. That was very typical, certainly of Heiko, he's kind of that activist personality. I applauded what they were doing. At the same time it really scared me. I didn't want anything to do with it at that point. It wasn't my stick or so I thought. Meanwhile in our company, among our own company, we had some sweat Lodges, mostly on the Farm house Lawn. I recall Paul Gover becoming involved, another guy Paul, Michelle.

MS: Gretchen

AC: Well, Paul Gretch is Paul Grover. Paul Gover was called Gretch because he and another Paul lived at Farm house at the same time, and in one of those precious little traditions, that was really kind of funny, they... Years before they had 2 women living there who had the same name of Laura, I think They decided the younger of the two, should have a different name to avoid confusion. And her middle name was Gretchen. And so, they got Laura and Gretchen. And then the next time two people with the same name showed up, they decreed that the second of the two should be called Gretchen. And I think the third time two people with the same name showed up, it was Paul Grover and Paul....long tall Paul with long hair, who worked in computers, I don't remember his name...he went out with Michelle, and they almost got married. But he was older, and so Paul Grover was called Gretchen, or Gretch. And that name stuck with him.

Anyway, he was in big with the Druid things. Digby Willard came to one of our sweats, kind of late. We had a floating batch of people, and...I found the sweat lodge a very good practice, you know, I guess we're not even close to what the Native American people do in their sweats, but we would...it would be a big event, you know, an event that took time, anyway, and finding time away from studies was always part of the milieu of the Druids. And building the sweat lodge, which had to be rebuilt now and then, because they are fragile - just saplings tied together with sticks - finding enough old blankets to put over it, which wasn't as much of a problem at Farm House, because they had a huge collection up in the attic. Building a fire, getting some granite, or hard stone, heating up the stone. When everything...when the stone was good and hot, bringing it into the sweat lodge, and laying it down. Then the people would crowd in, and I think they told us you always enter going clockwise, which is in...certainly in the Wiccan tradition, circling clockwise is building up energy. And circling counter-clockwise is letting go energy, or drawing down energy. And some traditions are very strict about which way you do what, and we were told, yeah, go in the sweat lodge clockwise.

Piling in there...we would all be naked, you know, people had the option to wear bathing suits or stuff if they wanted to, but the five or seven of us who were sort of core members at this point were into being naked for sweat lodge. I related to it, again, partly because it was...I don't how to respond to it exactly, but I felt like I was in National Geographic, you know. It's like wow, you know, we have all these bodies of really different shapes, and it's okay to be naked for a little while, you know, all together, and not look at it, you know, as sexual, necessarily. Although some people did, I think (laughs). Never mind that. But, no, some people got more of a thrill out of just seeing their friends naked. And some people got more of a thrill out of being naked (laughs). Except when it was very cold, I kind of enjoyed it, you know, alternative stuff.

EH: You had a copy of the Druid Chronicles and things. Was there any feeling that you had used any of the rituals that were done by the early group, or did mostly concentrate on the sweat lodge?

AC: No, we did...I was just getting long-winded on the sweat lodge. We did certainly look through the chronicles, read through them, and look at the rituals that they had done, and re-enact according to their, you know, their formulas, or whatever. We tried having...I think we tried having new moon or full moon meetings each month on the Hill of Three Oaks for a while. And it worked for a while. All of these things would always fall apart when, you know, finals time came around and stuff. And the cold weather, during a lot of the Carleton school year, kind of puts a damper on these things. So, often times, somebody would say...it would be informal, but Branden or Andrea or somebody might say, "oh, let's have a ritual tonight," or "Let's have a ritual next Saturday. And... okay, well, so-and-so is gonna tend the fire, and so-and-so said she'd get firewood." I'll go into that in a little bit more detail. Often these things would sort of fall apart, and the day of the ritual, the people would call up, and just say, "Oh, I'm working on a paper, and I can't do the fire like I said I could." Or, "Well, I can be there at nine, but not past ten." So, it was very...it was loose, and it was not...well, there was nobody to say, you know, you can't do that, because at Carleton studies come before everything else, and it was just one of those things. But oftentimes, you know, we'd hear with joy, oh, you know, seven or eight people have said they'd be here up on the hill at ten. And two people would show up. And so, that's the way the Druids' roulette worked when I was a Druid (laughs).

EH: Did you have leaders, officers? Was there an Archdruid? Was that title used?

AC: No. When I was there, that title was not.

EH: Were any titles used?

AC: No. We...Depending on our interests...Heiko, and I think Branden got very much into reading the Druid Chronicles, and Jan too. And some of the stuff...they would sort of bring me stuff, and I read some of it, but looking at the formulation of the Druid hierarchy, I think Branden and Heiko got into that, just looking at it. And they decided, and I agreed, that a lot of the sort of playing with, you know, fourth, fifth, sixth level, who was who and what was what, and having a bard, and an I don't know what all, you know, an officer in charge of this and that, just was not appealing to us. It was too hierarchical. None of wanted to be Archdruid. Certainly in the following year, some of us who had been in it longer were looked on as leaders, but it wasn't...it was neither a self-given nor a formally others-given title. It was more a hierarchy of age, like a lot of things are at college...What am I trying to say...? Branden and Heiko made the decision to do vigils. You know, we had a lot of first-level Druids. And I think one of them...I didn't do this myself, but one of them said something to me, like, "Well, you ought to be second-level," you know, "You must be second-level by now," because of what I had done, you know. And I'm like, "Oh, great." They decided they wanted to be third-level, and they...we accepted the idea that for third-level, which meant a more serious commitment to these things, you were to vigil on the Hill of Three Oaks, theoretically, or someplace, anyway...Stay up all night in the Arb and meditate, think about being a Druid. I know that one...I think the night Branden was going to vigil, it was a horribly cold, rainy night, and...I mean, it was about this time, it was...at the beginning he said August - this was October, we're actually in October today, and Hmm?*

AC: Yeah, you did. But anyway - cold, almost snowing, rain, you know, right around Samhain, or Halloween time. And he decided that - or we all decided that vigiling at Farm House was quite acceptable instead (laughs), and so we had a ritual out on the Hill, and then came back in. And we would do the Waters of Life ceremony. That was a big part of any ritual we did. Other things that our rituals included were guided meditations...we did a little bit of the seasonal celebration, but somehow Samhain, or Halloween, always took big precedence over the other holidays. I think partly because of Halloween, and partly because it occurred early enough in the year that people had energy still to put into it. And a couple of the really big Pagan holidays, or cycle holidays of the ancient Europeans, occur at really awful times for Carleton grads, (correcting) or for Carleton students in class to be doing things with. You know, the winter solstice is when we're all on vacation, and so is the summer solstice. Fall equinox...well, I don't know. We never did much with that. Beltane, May Day, which we should have been able to do a lot with, we never did, somehow. It was never as big a deal as Samhain. Maybe because of Mai Fete, and other things that the college already does around those...I don't know. But it came to me, I guess, the second year that...well, we have this big, you know, Samhain, and people went and dug up just a little bit of Celtic mythology, and I understand I'm not actually pronouncing it correctly, but we said "Sowan," even though we spelled it Samhain, and I didn't really understand why. Okay, that's the end of the year, that's the final...that's the finish of one yearly cycle. It was the day of the dead, where the ancestors could walk again, you know, and people would honor their ancestors, and their connections with those who had died. And we'd have a big shindig at that point, a big ritual on the Hill of Three Oaks, and then always there were Halloween parties to go to afterwards. And the Druids would, in my two years of being associated, they'd, you know, go right to the Farm House Halloween party and have a blast. But we didn't do the same thing on the happy holiday that balances that somber one, which is Beltane, with flowers, and fun, and everything.

Let's see...so yeah, we did...we looked into the old Druid things, but we were anarchistic. Jan and Heiko had learned these...the sweat lodge-type things, and I guess elements of Wicca that weren't really present in the early Druid things. I think the calling of the four directions, and the association of certain qualities with the four directions was not originally done by the old Druids at Carleton. But we would...because they taught us this invocation, we would invoke spirits of North, of South, of East, of West, usually going in a circle, usually North, East, South, West, North being Earth, East being Air, South being Fire, and West being Water. So we would cast a circle, we would ask them, these spirits, to be present. I remember a discussion with Heiko once, 'cause...(laughs), yeah, here we go. One of the Council of for Religious Understanding things was reported once, again, probably in the Carletonian, and they said, well, "a discussion of spirits was posed, and Heiko Koester said the Druids do not conjure up evil spirits, even though they certainly could." And I kind of...I didn't agree with that at all. Because essentially, I don't think they're there to be conjured. So we had some theological differences, you might say. And I talked to Heiko about that, and said, you know, "what do you mean by this?" And he said, "Well, when we invoke, you know, the spirits of North, the spirits of East, I feel they're really there." And Joseph Walzer, who was younger than us, was there with us, and he said something like, "But I think of those as spirits of mind." And I agree with that. So some of us, like Heiko, were truly into the reality of these things. And others of us were seeing them more as symbols. And I certainly fall more into the latter category. But we would invoke the directions, and cast a circle, you know, ask these spirits to be there with us, to protect us and bless us with whatever we were going to do.

We would then have the Waters of Life ceremony, the blessings of the water, which was usually in one of these big, ugly, green chalices from the chalice collection. And Heiko had dug up several of them from somewhere, I think probably in the attic at Farm House they were stored - there's a lot of old dishware kicking around over there. Or there was, anyway. Waters of Life, which were usually totally non-alcoholic. I think the original recipe calls for some whiskey to be added during the summer half of the year, when they're the Waters of Life. And when they're the Waters of Sleep, that is, from Samhain to Beltane, you don't add any alcohol. But we hardly went out from Samhain to Beltane, anyway, and so it wasn't all that much of a big deal.

We would often dance. We did spiral dancing when we had enough people, and that's really fun. That's...you probably heard about that from other people. There was also...there was a lot of creativity, and we would switch off leadership, who was going to lead the ritual, or once in a while, somebody would come over and say...like Heiko and I might go to Andrea and say, we want to have a ritual to celebrate X and such, you know, the...I don't know what - the winter equinox, whatever - do you want to lead it? And then the person would agree or not, and so whoever was leading the ritual decided what we were going to do. It was always celebratory. Sometimes it also included a prayer, or what you might call a magic working, in that we would raise energy for some specific purpose. The energy was raised by dancing, by chanting...there were several chants which were...which came from PSG, and they're basic modern American Pagan chants that a lot of people know - "the Earth is our mother" is one of them, "Air I am, Fire I am, Water, Earth and Spirit I am," ...what else?

MS: Circles?

AC: "Circle around, we circle around." Those were some biggies that we also did in the sweat lodge. But what I'm trying to lead into is the freedom and the creativity that people brought to these little rituals. And they were little. We didn't have the time and we didn't have the energy to be truly making this a focus, at least most of us...If somebody feels that they were, it's news to me. You know, everybody had their schoolwork, and everybody had their friends, and their relationships, and their sports, and who knows what, you know, also going on, a lot going on. So we didn't have a lot of time to put into this. But...one of the early rituals that I remember, that was totally off-the-wall, was...Curtis Love and Andre Baskin were two guys who...they lived at Farm House that year. Andre was sort of a computer whiz, and kind of an anarchist. He did a few interesting pranks with the computers. Like he set up a vax terminal in one of the closets at Farm House, an illegal vax terminal, which was wonderful, because at that time, when personal computers were just beginning to come in, lot's of students wanted vax space to do papers, and the vax lab was incredibly crowded. And to live out there, and walk into campus, especially on a winter night, was a lot of trouble. And so, I don't know where he kyped the equipment from, but he stole some computer equipment...didn't really take it off campus, 'cause he just put it in a campus house, and got a modem hooked up, so that Farm House had a vax hook-up in its closet. Anyway, that was Andre. And Curtis was a really interesting person - goofy guy, friend of mine. We had bio classes together. And Curtis had a very active, child-like side to him. And he really loved his stuffed toys. And he had this toy lion, called Leo, I guess, just this...

MS: There was the dinosaur too.

AC: Yeah. I don't what all...I do remember Leo the lion clearly. In one of those little in-house things that I wasn't really privy to, because I wasn't living out there at that time, Leo got kidnapped, and it was a big deal. And I think it turned out

Andre had done it. And Curtis was putting notices in the NNB for the return of Leo, and, you know, talking about him as though he were truly alive. And somehow peace was made, and whatever factions had done this came together again, and there was to be a ritual sometime, I think, in the fall of '86, late fall, the return of...the reappearance of Leo the lion. And Curtis and Andre set the whole thing up. We did some folk dancing at that ritual. Andre was into folk dancing, so instead of the spiral dancing, we did some Irish jig-type stuff that he taught us, which was sort of fun. And he had a boom-box for music. That was always...the innovations of what to do up on the Hill for entertainment for the theatrics of rituals - music, lights, whatever you want. He had a boom-box, and I remember thinking, "well, that's not very primitive" (laughs). Sort of techno-Druid here. And Leo the lion appeared in a flash of black powder at some point. It was like...there weren't that many people there, there were maybe six or seven of us, and then Andre and Curtis, and Curtis stood up and said something like, "And now, the moment you've all been waiting for, we're going to ask the Earth mother if Leo could come back (laughs), and we really hope she'll grant our prayer." And they did something, and I think Andre threw some, you know, firecracker-type thing into the fire, and there was a big poof, and Leo reappeared, I think on the alter stone. And I remember Curtis picking him up and going, "Oooh, Leo, you're back" (laughs).

And I tell this to emphasize that a sense of fun, and a sense of humor about all this was very much a part of the Druid time that I remember. We could be seriously thinking about our relation to the Earth, and the spiritual nature of that, and at the same time having these sort of silly rituals. One of the things that I like about the Druid path, as laid down by the Carleton people in 1960's, whatever, was the beginning prayer, the apology that we actually didn't use much, but the spirit of it appealed to me, where they said, essentially, to the Christian God, you know, forgive us for doing these things, forgive for asking...you know, forgive us for offering these prayers and sacrifices. We know you don't need prayers and sacrifices. Forgive us these sins that are due to our human limitations, and the sins being offering to a specific God entity...to personifying God in a certain way, and to offering prayer, and to offering sacrifices, which I'll explain in a second. The implication being we know God is bigger than all this. And that's what I believe, that whatever we call God is much bigger, and much more inclusive than any human religion has ever captured. And part of the reason I think this is, if there is such a thing...I'm a scientist, I come from a science background. I believe evolution happened. I believe what they dig up archeologically is true, you know. So it seems that humans have been on the Earth at least several hundred thousand years in their modern form, and several million years, if you count hominid thingies, that probably had language capacity, and made tools too. So in all that time, there have been so many different ways of reaching out to the divine. And I thought then, and I still think, you know, organized religions are an attempt to get a handle on our place in the cosmos, but whatever's out there, if there is anything out there...it's been worshipped in a lot of different ways. And if it's as great as they say it is, you know, as it must be, the only thing that I can think that would differentiate good from bad is intention. So actually, I consider myself more of Unitarian now than anything else. I'm sort of a Pagan Agnostic Unitarian. I have sort of a radical vision of God in that way...that what we were doing was in no way evil or offensive. Which was not shared...this opinion was not shared by all of the campus Christian groups, but I'll get to that in a second. We offered, as per the old Carleton Druid way, vegetable sacrifices. And everybody talked as though that was hilarious. The question of animal sacrifice runs through most people's minds when they think of Druid, or Pagan. And when we'd say, "No, no, we're the Reformed Druids, we offer only vegetable sacrifices," it would diffuse that tension in a big way. And we did. I mean, we thought about...our connection to the world that feeds us, essentially. Sometimes the sacrifices was Pine branches, I remember getting some from the Pines down near the hill. I was into harvest-type things, like food, you know, not just leaves that we wouldn't really eat, but corn, and squash, and things like that. So, on the occasion where we did, we would usually make

End of First Tape

EH: This is tape two of the interview with Alice Cascorbi on October 29, 1993.

AC: Okay, just to finish up about the vegetable sacrifices...yeah, we would normally leave them up on the Hill to be accepted by wild creatures. And sometimes someone would go back, like I'd go back a day later or something, to see if what we had left on the stone was still there. And if it was, I would throw it in the bushes somewhere. We always used the prayer in returning things, any such like dumping out things that we had to get rid off. "To thee we return this portion of thy bounty, O our mother, even as we must return to thee." This is a Druid prayer that I think is very beautiful, and you always use it when you're dumping the surplus Waters of Life onto the ground, returning to the Earth. And so, I guess, when I did that, with the vegetable sacrifices, I would certainly say that prayer as I threw the apple in the bushes, or whatever. It had always struck me as humorous that, in my reading of the old Greek practices, the Gods were said to be nourished by the stuff that the people didn't really want. Like they would sacrifice bullocks, as I understand it, and whatever else, but of food animals, the horns, or the...I'm sorry, the hide and the fat would be burned, and the scent of this wafting to Olympus was said to please and nourish the Gods. That's what the Gods got out of a sacrifice, and the humans got the meat. And I led one ritual, probably one of the better ones that I led, in the next year, in '87, and we had a fairly yummy selection of fruit, like some bananas, and stuff, and a large group of people - it may have been the first big ritual of the year, because we had a lot of freshmen interested in the Druids there at the time. And they included Heather Franek, and Heather Gruenberg, and several other younger people. God, what was that guy's name...?

MS: John Nolan(?)...Joe Banks?

AC: Yeah, John Nolan(?) was there. Joe Banks...he was...he wasn't a freshman then...But anyway, lots of new folks...yeah, people who subsequently got to be, I guess, leaders after my time was over, and after I was Carleton. But anyway, we had a large fruit selection, and I explained to the people that what we were going to do in this ritual that I was leading was offer the fruit, and, in the grand tradition of sacrifice, as I said, we were going to then eat it (laughs). So, you know, we would offer to the Earth Mother, but then it would for us to consume. And so, people liked that, they thought it was cute, whatever. And the skins and the cores went into the bushes. But I'm getting a little ahead of myself. Okay, the year '86-'87, it was academically my hardest year. I lot of core classes for my major at that point, which was biology. And had to really drag myself through organic chem, that was just hellish. But as Spring came, somebody asked me, I think it was Heiko, whether I would be willing to sit on the Council of the...the Council for Religious Understanding the following year. And I know at first I said no way. I just said I wasn't interested, I didn't feel a need to discuss my beliefs. But somehow it turned out nobody else was going to do it, or they needed two people, and I think Jan was graduating...would that have been correct? Yeah, I think so. So Jan was leaving, and they needed somebody. And Andrea Dawson also graduated at that point. And Tino was out picture...Tino left, I don't know if he graduated or not, I just don't know. But he was gone. And so, for the following year, '87-'88, which was my senior year, I was one of the elder Druids on campus. And the other elder Druids included Heiko and Branden. Now, wait a minute...I'm wrong about Jan - well, I don't know. Don't take me too literally on all these dates, I'm not quite sure about those things.

EH: We can look up when Jan graduated.

AC: Yeah, okay. But anyway, for one reason or another, I ended up serving on the Council for Religious Understanding in my senior year, which was an interesting experience. That was also Dave Diehl first came in, I think he was a freshman that year.

MS: No beard.

AC: No beard (laughs). He's a character, he always has been. And I found later, somewhat later, that he and I are like third cousins. Yeah, it's kind of cool. Anyway, Dave...these two young women named Heather were very different - we called them Heather Light and Heather Dark, because Heather Franek had long, dark hair, and Heather Gruenberg was very blond, and....I don't know. Heather Gruenberg was a very interesting person, and it was the first...I liked Heather Franek a lot, she became a friend of mine. But Heather Gruenberg was one of the folks who was totally enthralled with the weirdness of it all. This is almost more personal than Druid stuff, but Tino Thompson came back to Carleton that Fall for a short time. He stayed maybe a week or two. And he was kind of living in his van, and kind of traveling around. He came back here...I don't really remember why, but he stayed at Farm House, which was nothing unusual, you know, folks who had been associated with that house, or with people who were in the house always had a welcome, you know, to come and stay over a while. And he and Heather took up with each other (laughs), and it led to a couple of...it led to one very serious situation, which I'll get into, but she was totally enthralled. She was from Michigan, and from a...I guess a kind of conservative small town, and dove right in. And the Druidism was just like the Doctor Who club, and the watching Star Trek, you know, which are also things I love doing, but the sort of just complete immersion in it I don't do. I had some problem with the whole attitude. I said some things I wasn't terribly proud of later. I had, for the first time in my life, the annoying sensation of people expecting me to help them find their spiritual self. And I had always been really solitary. Like I say, I'm not proud of this, and I certainly hope I get better at it as I get older, but...One time I was up on the Hill of Three Oaks, and it was daytime, it was a beautiful Fall day. And I don't remember why I was going up there, but Heather Gruenberg was there, and she was lying on top of the alter stone, kind of belly-down, I guess. And when I got up to the top of the Hill, she looked up at me with this sort of puppy dog expression. She said, "(affects a little girl voice) I've been lying here for the past hour trying to communicate with this rock, and I haven't been getting anything." And it really annoyed me, and I looked at her, and I said, "It's just a rock" (laughs). Oh, Alice, you're so mean, you're so awful. I really am not good with...this is not true confessions tape, but this is what would go on. Tino was really flamboyant, and they started going out, dating or whatever, and she would go around telling everybody that would listen that her new boyfriend was a bisexual witch. And she was really loud about it, you know, like...I think she lived in Goodhue...just giddy, totally giddy with this new freedom. She told everybody at home, at her place back in Michigan. And, sometime in Fall term that year, the whether was still very summer-like, I got this...Farm House got this phone call, and it was from Dean Jean Phillips...and let me make sure I get everything right here...Okay, Dean Jean had been contacted by a man who turned out to be Heather's old hometown boyfriend, who was younger than she was and was still in high school. And he, having heard about the Druid thing, and about Tino, and being obviously slightly unstable, and extremely jealous - he wanted Heather to marry him, is what I heard from Heather. He really was dead set on holding onto her. And called Dean Phillips, and told her that animal sacrifice was going on, and horrible things were happening in the Carleton Druids, and out at Farm House, and that she really ought to be concerned. And I knew Dean Philips from an academic thing the year before, where I had petitioned to take a bio credit by examination, and she had really helped me out, and she knew me from that, and knew me as, you know, a relatively sane person or something. And she said to me, "I was so relieved when I saw your name on the Farm House residence roster. What's going on?" And I could put it together, because I was, you know...Heather had in confidence...you know, she was looking for people to give her sympathy, and she had told this whole story about her awful boyfriend. Her boyfriend had even threatened her with court action for...I mean, the guy was just nuts. And he had said he could get her for statutory rape, as he was younger. And he would do it if she didn't get back to him. And so with this whole business of her informing him in no uncertain terms that Carleton different, and she was now going with a bisexual witch....Dean Philips said, "Well, when I saw that it was Farm House, which had the purpose of being natural history house," she said, "are you doing any taxidermy, are stuffing any animals out there, is there a legitimate purpose for..." He said things about entrails and stuff. And I said, "No, no, no. Not even that was going on. There's nothing whatsoever to this." And it was so frightening. And it was just...I mean, I told her about the vegetable sacrifices and everything. Yeah, that was a major episode. And she believed me, and I told her...I had also just been approached, Heiko and I both, by someone who was doing an article for the Carleton Voice about the re-emergence of the Druids, and both Heiko and I would be interviewed. And Dean Philips hadn't known about that, and she said, "Oh, that's wonderful, that's great." And I said what was going to happen, and this woman was gonna come out and take photos of us both...Steve Philips was saying, "Do you have anything about the Druids that I could send to Heather's parents?" You know, to let her know that this is not some horrible cult, you know, dismembering animals or something. And I said, "Well, there's this thing coming out." And Dean Philips said oh, that would be perfect, that would be great. And so I heard nothing more about this matter, but it was one of the incidents that brought home, you know, this is not all sunny fun and games...it's very serious shit to some people. It can be made into very serious shit because most people think it's damned weird, and that's, you know...and if they say, "Oh, they're doing whatever...their rights..."

MS: Seriously, I'm thinking of some follow-up things to that, because I remember, like maybe '90...Beltane of '91 or something, there was the hush where Heather was up on the Hill, and boom! It was very hush-hush, and I couldn't figure out what it was about, but suddenly Beltane...boom! fell flat. And apparently someone had pushed her at the alter stone, and maybe thrown blood onto the stone...some crazy guy. So I'm just thinking maybe...

AC: Maybe this was that guy. I should talk about this, because it's probably the most...one of the more interesting things. As the Druids became more public, one of the first things I heard was that the Carleton Christian Fellowship was praying for us. And I knew some people in CCF. One of the people I met through Council for Religious Understanding was John Johnson (laughs), who did come from Wisconsin. He was this tall, really blond guy. Nice guy. He originally came as a Quaker, to the Council for Religious Understanding, but he underwent a conversion. I think it with CCF that he started hanging around...but with one of the more conservative and more dogmatically Christian groups. And I think it's from him I heard they were praying for us. And I said I was offended, and I said something like, "Oh, thank you, we'll pray for them too at our next ritual." I'm just giving my own emotional responses so you understand...I mean, at the time I was this, you know, nineteen-year-old, or whatever I was...Anyway, it became a force on campus, or it became that hadn't existed before, the Druids. Something that could be one the one hand played with by other people who weren't part of us, on the first hand, or whatever. Certainly some of the Christian groups found us...found a focus for...you know, I don't know, (laughs) saving lost souls or...whatever. That right here on campus were people openly calling themselves Pagan, and openly...kindly, but firmly, saying, you know, "No, we don't believe what you believe." I never got any hassle from Christian, and as part of the Council for Religious Understanding, I thought it was important to be as open as possible about what we did, and to allow people to come to our rituals, anybody, if they wanted. Heiko was not as much into that. He was other one who usually sat on the Council. He felt a lot of people want privacy, and want only a group of people they know they can trust when they're doing ecstatic dancing, or you know, whatever they're doing...Magic working, which is in my definition just prayer. It's where you raise and raise energy, and then...send the energy to some specific purpose. Ones that we did that I remember include a couple of sweat lodges for endangered species...one for a friend of ours who was going into the military, to send him some energy. Those were purposes I remember.

MS: Was that [name indecipherable]?

AC: I don't remember who...just...this raising of energy and sending, it was not a huge part of what we did. But anyway, on the Religious Understanding Council, Heiko thought, "No, our rituals are private, they're for insiders only." And I thought we had nothing to hide, let's be as open as we can. And we made a compromise, and we had one big open ritual for Druids. And I have a poster still from that, Nat Case, made the poster, and it said "Druids, One Night Only! Come Celebrate the Season of Fall and the Rising Moon," or something, "Hill of Three Oaks, Nine p.m." And we invited some folks to come. And we had a tradition that I think they picked up at Pagan spirit gathering, of...there was a circle of participants, people who wanted to actually do the chants, and accept the Waters, and stuff like this. And then there was what they called the Circle of Fair Witness, that's people who didn't want to participate, but were friendly, or at least not hostile, and would stand around and watch. And so we had at least that one big open ritual that was very public. We got some people - it wasn't huge, the weather was cold...But I think John Johnson came to that one, and some other folks that I didn't recognize at all, from other groups, Christian groups, or whatever was on campus.

Some time in the Spring of that year, of '88 now, graffiti began to appear that said "DENMAD," D-E-N-M-A-D, and that's "damned" spelled backwards. And I still have no idea who was doing that. It wasn't one of us, or one of the people I knew. And "Denmad" symbol, this "Denmad" was written several places, including by the computer center, and in front of the library, and in some sort of chemical that killed the grass, out on the Hill of Three Oaks. And, again, it hit the 'Tonian, you know, there was some suspicion, whatever, or not suspicion, but people were saying, "Well, are these the Druids doing this? Is this, you know, Druidism, are you responsible for this?" Of course not, and I recall something good that Heiko said, was basically, "We worship the Earth, we're working to save the Earth, and why would we put chemical on the grass that kills the grass?" Especially up on the Hill, it's like graffiti on a church. And he kind of made a big deal about it, and that he was offended by it, it was religiously offensive. I think he went out and did something for the grass, like he reseeded it, or he did something publicly to try to erase the graffiti.

I ran into...okay, another story. A man, a staff member, whose name I don't recall right now, who was in the post office, probably still is...God, I wish I could remember his name. Middle-aged man, full-time staff member. We got a note from him, the Druids got a note, that said he had intercepted a mailing that was supposed to be an all-campus mailing by us, by the Druids, that had seemed so odd, that he wanted confirmation from us. And indeed, it was spurious. It was somebody trying to send something really weird to everybody on campus. And there were boxes of it, just like all, you know, all clubs, all Carleton clubs could, at least at that time, do a mass mailing, just by dropping off a box of enough flyers. And this was some really...narrative thing about...it was just a narrative, it was a story, several paragraphs about a cosmic creation, and something about...I think weird shit, some gryphons...it had vaguely sort of cabbalistic, satanistic weird shit all mixed together. I can't remember it exactly, but something about the unicorn mated with the snake, or something. It was nothing to do with Druid stuff, and it was...ostensibly put out by us, and I think it might even have had our phone number, which was certainly public, I mean, Heiko's number as the Druid contact person, or whatever. Well he snitched...I mean, this guy snitched it and didn't let it go out, he said, you know, "Stop that," and "let's not put it out until we get confirmation." And I went later to thank him for that, you know, and I said...was his name Eisner? Eis-something...Eishorn, Eishner, something like that. And I said, you know, thank you, and I had known him in other contexts, and said, "I'm a Druid too, and I really appreciate your catching this." And he kind of gulped, and he said, "Yeah, that's my job. I've heard a little bit about Druid worship, like those kids over wherever they were who set that bum on fire..." And I came really close again to that really scary zone, because this was a good man who I knew in other contexts, and who, you know, certainly is a staff member to student...we were in good relationship, and he was doing his job, but his church, or whatever, was equating anything non-Christian, whatever, with some very sick happenings.

There had been some episode where some teenage boys around town - not here, exactly, but maybe in Faribault?

Somewhere close by, set this old vagrant on fire. And this guy, the mail clerk...the staff member, he was thinking that that was our kind of thing. And even with that in his head, he still pulled the mail, and contacted us. And in some ways that's really beautiful, and it's really touching that he would do that, and on the other hand it's really sad and scary to me, personally, how much misinformation there is. So, anyway, as we became more public, we also got targeted, to some extent, by some pranksters. I don't know who they were...Nat Case...if you ever get a hold of him, ask him about...Nat is a good friend of mine. We lived in Farm House together. And he said he thought some weird groups at Carleton, very secretive...that he had seen some people out in the Arb once, all dressed in robes, and it wasn't the Druids. We didn't have robes of our own to wear, certainly not that all looked alike. And he said he saw a bunch of men in robes that all looked alike, who were like student age, all down...they walked past him, he was down by the river.

MS: I saw that once...

AC: You did?

MS: I was sitting at the sign fire over in the Oak grove, and there was like...I came in there, and I had wood up to my nose, and I couldn't see what I was doing. I just dropped the wood, and there was this circle of about seven or eight people...they were all blond, and they were all wearing light clothing.

AC: Maybe they're Oles.

MS: And I thought I recognized a Carleton student. But I came back with [rest indecipherable]...They put up a cross, in the place of the maypole.

AC: They put up a cross in place of the maypole. Very interesting...That's right, the Denmad thing would have crosses associated with it. There were little...it would say "Denmad," and then a little cross. Very interesting.

EH: When you would describe Druidism to someone, would you use the word religion?

AC: I guess I would. But it was clear to me, and certainly from the way I got into it, that it was a religion or a philosophy. Other people have said a spiritual philosophy, that you can take on along with other ones. You need not give up your spirituality or your religion to be a Druid. For me it was something to call what I believed, and I got involved, as I think I've described, in the public aspects of it, for what you might call idealistic reasons. I did not, and still do not, really feel my own spiritual connections with the world except when I'm alone. I did a lot of outreach work, because I thought it was important. I thought it was high time that this kind of thing be recognized and legitimized, and I wanted to spread it around to other young people, like myself, who in essence were already...you know, were already somehow converts, or were already feeling these ways, that there were other ways of approaching the sacred, and that to look back at the old ways was a good way. That's why I was so public. I know the first Carleton Druids were adamant that this was a philosophy. They didn't know about the Pagan movement, as such, and they weren't connected with it for a long time. Many of them are still Christian, and I think one of them is a Christian minister now. Heiko was pretty firmly Christian for while, and for a while he was saying he considered himself both Druid and Christian. As I said, for myself it was not that. The Druidism we had was pretty loosely woven, as I'm sure you know. We would invoke the Earth Mother, and the male principle, sometimes, sort of secondarily, in the form of the Celtic God, I guess, Dalon Ap Landu, the lord of the grove. But we were very much a Unitarian-type group, you know, free-flowing...people would essentially invoke whatever God image they chose. Some of us were into Hindu mythology by then, and would invoke Shiva and Devi...Brandon was very much into Pan, the God Pan...now I'm coughing all the time. This we saw as perfectly fine. We saw whatever you wanted to call the divine as acceptable. There are a couple of chants that I recall - we had a guy from a Jewish background once come to one of our rituals, and there's a chant for the Goddesses, that's Isis, Astart, Idiana, Hecate, Demeter, Kali, Ynana, and then there's a corresponding one with God names, old God names...Pan, Dionysus, Odin, something, something, and it includes Baal, the Baal of the bible, whose name is related to word bellinose, apparently, and it comes back to the beautiful...anyway, an old, old word, and an old, old name for the male consort of the Goddess. And this guy freaked out, he's like, "I can't say Baal! I'll go to hell if I worship Baal!" And we said, oh, okay, don't say it, you know. And, you know, he was kind of joking around, he was kind of kidding, or he wouldn't have been there. It wasn't really freaking him. But as far as I was concerned, that was fine. And we had a couple of folks from St. Olaf come over and join us...

End of Side One

AC: Anyway, so we had the occasional Olaf student, even, coming over to be part of our rituals. Heiko took a lot of charge of that. He was, I think, cross-registered for some class over there, and he'd put notices that Druid rituals were happening up over there. And this guy, Sam Adams, who was a music major, or musically inclined, he wrote a chant. And it's...(sings) All good things from you, mother, all good things from you. / All good things from you, mother, all good things from you. / Your's the dawn so new, mother, your's the sun-drawn dew, mother. / All good things from you, mother, all good things from you. (laughs) So now you can have it again, if you want.

MS: Spring it on 'em.

AC: Spring it on Sam, yeah. But there was a young woman named Christie...very powerful, interesting, and very innocent woman. Really tall, like six feet tall, you know, Norwegian stock. And she came over, and she was so interested in the idea of worshipping Goddesses, and so careful, and so frightened in some ways that she was doing wrong by her God, and by the way she'd been raised. And she and I got to be friends, and I remember she wanted to do a meditation once, and we took some Manheim Steamroller to music, in a boom box, up to the hill, and lit a fire. And she really wanted to do this, and the moon was full, I think, and to be there, and to salute the rising moon, but she asked me, "Is it alright if ask...you know, if I bring God into this?" And I said of course, you know, that's...yeah, sure. And she asked God, the Christian God, to bless what we were doing, and to understand that we were meaning no wrong, or something like this. And then she spoke to the moon Goddess. And I really liked her. I don't know what's happened to her since. So for me, at least, and I think for most of us, it was very heterodox.

EH: You mentioned, way back, about...I believe it was Curtis, or someone, who was a folk dancer. And that reminded me that I'd heard in the late '60's, early '70's, there was a big overlap between the folk dancers and the Druids. Were there overlaps that were obvious in your time with other groups?

AC: Yes, oh yes.

EH: Which ones?

AC: Definitely with residents of Farm House, who were thus drawn from people with demonstrated interest in natural history and Earth preservation. Definite overlap with the computer crowd, very...many of these people were all the same. Folk dancing, yes. I was not a big folk dancer, but many of my best friends were, like Judy(?) and Rachel. And, well...like Andre too. And Andrea Dawson was big into it. Jan did that also, Heiko some. I was maybe the only one of the group that wasn't a big folk dancer. Folk dance, Farm House, computers, and what you might call the science fiction crowd. Some of these people never had anything to do with the Druids, but many people who were occasional Druid participants were big into, like the Dr. Who club, and the Star Trek fan club, which in my time were more...groups of people who got together to watch the show in question, you know, rather than doing anything else outside that together. So yeah, our social groups overlapped quite a bit. And there were romances in between all of these things. Most straight, a few gay (laughs). But, yeah, these four groups I can name as being definitely interrelated.

EH: I'd like to know something about how you feel that your Druid experiences has stayed with you, and informed your post-Carleton outlook. Do you still consider yourself a Druid? If so, how so?

AC: I do for the sake of history. I very much like the idea of being tied into a tradition like this, you know, little as it is, and homegrown as it is. Carleton was my village for the four years that I was here, and it was the first time I ever had that feeling. I'm delighted to be part of that, and to be...you know, asked to interview like this. I've gone back to solitary practice when I want to pray, or to celebrate. I haven't done it with a group, really, since I left Carleton. While I was here, I called everything I was into in my belief system Druid. Now that I'm not with other Druids, the closest group I've found is Unitarians. And they have a Pagan element now, formally, within their structure, called the Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans, CUUPS. And I sort of stumbled into a group like that in Ohio last time I was home. It's been an experience. It was my first big experience in outreach in a religious way. This past summer...well, I first made contact with the Circle Sanctuary people, you know, Selena Fox, and her husband Dennis, through that lecture that Selena gave back in '86. And I subsequently subscribe to their newspaper - they have a quarterly that comes out - and went to a couple of their gatherings, went to PSG myself the following year, the summer of '87, and again in 1991, and to a couple different events at their land, down in East 'Consin. So I've stayed in touch with them. And they're very eclectic - they have people from many different Pagan paths there, meeting there and doing retreats there, basically. I did an internship with them this past summer. I wanted a place to work and find out more about them as working psychologists, who also have this religion, or this spiritual bent. And I found myself using a lot of the same skills and doing a lot of the same things that I had as a Druid on the Council for Religious Understanding. And, you know, tabling in Sayles-Hill, we also did that, I didn't mention, but we had, you know, the annual freshman round-up, or whatever it was called, where you have a table, and say what you believe. And that's where one of the Carleton Unitarians - I was not part of that part while I was here, but this wonderful woman came up to me, and said, "I'm so glad you're here! You're the only other liberal religious group on campus, and we're so sick of being next to the fundamentalists every year!" It's like, okay. So we got a welcome from them. It's a part of my life, but it's not....I haven't gone and founded a grove. Yeah, I don't know what to say.

EH: Are there ways of thinking that you find yourself possibly being able to Druidic, that you find stay with you?

AC: Yeah. You know, the things that have stayed most with me are...this little prayer, the returning to the Earth Mother prayer, which I've used quite often, both when I throw out my compost, and a couple of times when I've pulled a dead dog off the road. It's a prayer that you can also use when you learn about a death. And the copy of the letter that's within the Chronicles, called Joan's Epistle to the Myopians, you know, I find really wonderful. And yeah, you sort of pseudo-King James' language of it all is sort of funny. But the sentiments expressed in that are very profound to me, and...I won't say this is the first place...no, I shouldn't say that. To know that there were other people who thought that way, and cared enough to put it down on paper, and include it as part of the Druid Chronicles has been powerful. The sense that...it was the first place I got the sense that I was part of a community in my spiritual way. And though I choose to be [a] fairly solitary member of the community, I still now know where I am, and that I'm not alone. What else...I definitely gained a better knowledge of my own history. As I said, part of thrill of it, for me, was also the thought that we were trying to go back to something that our ancestors had done - some of our ancestors, some of mine, anyway - had done before the advent of Christianity in Europe. You know, they were people, they had a religion. And one of their old religions, the Celtic side, anyway, was this Druid thing. And what we did was not Celtic reconstruction, by any stretch of the imagination. But just the thought, and the name, and the association with the Oak tree, which is a very ancient sacred symbol, wove that into the mixture for me, back to my own roots, in a small way. And I learned about the cycle of the holidays, which I certainly had not known before. We celebrated...this is history again, but we celebrated the holiday of Oimele a couple of times, which is pretty obscure, but it's the beginning, the very beginning of Spring. It's Candlemas in the Christian calendar, end of February, and I recall...Oh yeah, one of the lovely things about the chapel business was [that] Jewelnel Davis allowed us to use the chapel space for Druid rituals during the winter, when it was really cold out on the Hill. And we would, you know...very grateful for that, and we would look at the limestone walls, and I recall leading rituals in there, and talking about the limestone, and the little shell-creatures that had made it, and that it too was part of the Earth, and though we were inside, we were never away from the Earth. And we had a ritual in there once where we passed a chalice full of milk on Oimele, instead of water. And I find that the conception of these holidays, as my life goes on, and as I experience more, I tie in more with the different holidays. And I had no exposure to that before I came here. I was in Germany this past February, and they had always said that Oimele was the beginning of the lambing season, when the sheep and the cows first lactate. And I thought, God, that's way too early. But in Germany, it's true, the first lambs were born right about then. And so, I'm like yeah, this isn't just bullshit (laughs). So, I don't know if I'm answering the question, but, you know...

EH: I think that might very well be a good place to draw this to a close. If you have anything else you'd like to add, go ahead, but otherwise....

AC: Let me think for a second...Just to thank you both - I'm glad this is being set down. I don't know who will hear this, but, you know, good luck to you. And I hope the arboretum continues. I hope the Hill of Three Oaks remains a site where people can gather in a more or less natural setting. There's gonna be a lot of change at Carleton in the next couple years, and I really hope they don't draw lines on that and make it into a football field. 'Cause the Arb has many beautiful places, but the Hill itself is someplace special.

EH: Thank you very much.

AC: Thank you.

[Tape 1, Side A]

EH: This is a tape for the Carleton oral history program. The interviewer is Eric Hillemann, College Archivist, and the narrator today is Michael Scharding, class of '94. The date is the August 27, 1996, and we're talking in the Gould Library. Michael, why don't you tell us a bit to begin with about your own personal background and how you came to Carleton College.

MS: Well, my father was in the military, doing food research and stuff, and also inspecting meat plants. And so we moved around quite a bit around my first 16 years and I lived in 12 or 14 states. But I had always considered Minnesota to be my home, primarily because we have a family cabin up near Hibbing, which I had gone to every year of my life, for summer vacation. And so when I started deciding in high school where to go for college, I naturally wanted to go to Minnesota, because I had grown to love the state very much. My qualifications for Carleton, for any kind of college, was that it had to be in Minnesota, or someplace with a lot of trees. It had to have an indoor and outdoor track and field program, and had to be small, because I didn't like the idea of a large college, and mostly private colleges too. Though I went to public school most of my life, thought they were quite good public schools.

That really narrowed it down to St. Olaf, Macalester, and Carleton, though I did look at Dickinson. I knew when I was looking through publications back at my High School and I saw the Carleton folder, I instantly decided at that point that it was for me. There was something about the pictures - I don't know. They had a package perfectly for me. And I opted for early decision, and they accepted me, along with Olaf and Macalester, but I decided to go to Carleton, though I did do tours and stuff of the various colleges before I came. The track and field thing fell through because I busted my knee right before I came to Carleton, which interfered with my track career. But the trees - actually I think it was Lyman lakes, more than anything else, that convinced me to come to Carleton. Because I really liked water, and I thought it was great that they had a lake on campus. I lived in Goodhue for three years straight, four, if you count living in Myers. I always thought it was great, having your own little house next to a lake, something that most people only dream about doing.

EH: Okay, good. I think I wanted to ask this point too, something about your religious background, because that's going to be relevant to what we're going to talk about later.

MS: Okay, I was raised a Roman Catholic. My parents are Roman Catholic, but two of my grandparents - my maternal grandfather and my paternal Grandmother were both Protestant, and back then, a Catholic marrying a Protestant was kind of like a mixed marriage, or even interracial, because they married Irish and German together, on both sides. But it was never a very powerful Catholic, because it wasn't that old on both sides.

But I've been an acolyte and gone to CCD on Sundays, though CCD doesn't really teach you very much anymore, but it keeps you out of trouble, at least on Sundays. I guess I came to Carleton pretty much in mind being Catholic, but it's kind of interesting - people talk about like Dungeons and Dragons breeding paganism, and they might be right in some aspects of that, because I did play Dungeons and Dragons a lot, and I was familiar with mythology since I was about seven or eight years old. My first D&D game would probably have been around age nine or ten, and I played a druid, my first character, which is kind of interesting. And I've always liked playing the druids and the rangers, ever since then. Both my parents were mountain climbers, and they're veterinarian doctors, and very interested in old history, so we often went to old historical villages and they showed me about nature when I was growing up. Not an incredible amount, compared to some people, but more than I think was the average. And I'd always been more interested in the ancient mythologies, because they were more exciting than Sunday school. And when I was a kid I read everything I could about vampires, Norse mythology, and monsters, everything kind of supernatural. And I still have some interest in that today, though my interests have moved more in an eastern direction, to China and Japan recently. But I'm very prone to mythology, and that shows up, the fact that I named about 150 sites all over campus after various mythologies and stuff. Much to the annoyance of the other Druids, who don't know what I'm talking about.

EH: You hadn't heard anything about the existence of Druids at Carleton before getting here, had you?

MS: Nope. I hadn't heard a thing about them. In fact, when I got here, it took me about six months before I found them, finally found enough information that I could finally attend one of the ceremonies. It was very difficult to track them down, because they were in a slump, back in '88 through '90. Enough people had graduated from the early renaissance, maybe '86 to '89, that they were kind of getting their feet back on the ground with Andrea Davis. And she's not the most organized leader that we've had, but better than most.

EH: Why don't you tell me about some of the activities that you got involved with at Carleton and then use that as a springboard to talk about how you got involved with the Druids?

MS: It looked like I was going to be majoring in extra-curricular activities, because I essentially signed up for far more activities that it was possible to pursue. I was in the juggling club, I was in the Science Fiction club, the folk music society, folkdancing, social dancing, I did a little bit of intramural Frisbee, but not much; a couple other small little groups that I can't remember now, but since I was spending far too much time doing extra-curricular activities, I started to develop - I came to Carleton with a fascination for the Grateful Dead, after essentially seventeen years of not listening to any radio, and so my first real music interest was with the Grateful Dead, and eventually I managed to get into folk music here at Carleton.

Mark Heiman was at that time a Junior or Sophomore, and he played, he had little miniature concerts where he would sing Irish and Scottish folk tales, and he would sing for six or seven hours, after science fiction club. And I would just sit there and listen, because I thought it was great. I love listening to performers. And at that time, my interest in Celtic things really started to peak. And I started studying languages at that point, and getting as much information as possible on the Celts. And someone told me that well, you're interested in Celtic stuff, why not check out the Carleton Druids? and I said, okay. This was the spring of 1990. By that point I kind of knew about them, but I didn't really know anyone who was in it. And I decided to check these people out, and little did I know that they had practically nothing to do with Celtic stuff. The thing that Sam and I first had grudges about in the beginning (but have since mellowed out about quite a bit) was that I kept pestering Matt Cohen to tell me when the next thing happened, 'cause they were having all kinds of stuff happening over at Farmhouse and the lower Arboretum at the time, over in the Oak Opening, which is now prairie and we can't use anymore.

So that spring, on April first, I got a note saying to show up on the bald spot, dressed in funny clothing. And it was signed 'Pookums.' And after asking enough people, I found out this was Mark Danburg, and this was his way of inviting people to Druid things. So I showed up wearing nothing particularly silly, and I met Joe Banks wearing a boot on his head, and Mark Danburg dressed in polka dots. And it was raining, so we went to the chapel. And I met Andrea there, for the first time, and I can't remember the other two women there. But I think Bill Shearer might have been there also. It wasn't actually a druid ritual that they were having, but it was a Erisian ritual. An Erisian is a person who believes in the goddess of chaos. And April fool's day was a particularly good day for them. And so there was some kind of washing machine anthem, like 'rinse, recycle, spin, wash' or something, and they handed out Oreo cookies, and spun around until they fell down. And I remember going home extremely disappointed because, first of all that was not Celtic, and second of all it was plain silly.

This was during my more serious phase of Druidism. I helped out with some campfires along then, but the first time was Beltane, after that, which was much more serious. It was over in the little grove, also known as the druid den, within a hundred meters of the hill of three oaks. It has a little wooden gate there, and a depression in the ground surrounded by conic hills around it, making it a nice wind trap, where none of the wind can get into it. I don't remember much about the ceremony, but I do remember camping out there with Sam Adams, from Olaf, that night, and we both griped about how unCeltic it was, and that was the start of one of our close friendships. But I didn't do very much Druidism in the 1989-1990 year, but things did pick up the next year. Fall term, I remember, I started doing a great amount of research in Celtic history and doing research for credit, independently, on Celtic deities and stuff, and I was ignoring my Biology major at that point, to the point of hazard. And I had pretty much given up on my Biology major fall of '90 and thinking about history, but I wasn't sure if I really wanted to. So I decided to go to Scotland, to do some on-site language study and Celtic history study. Before I left, I was still not extremely active, I showed up like one out of every two rituals, and they still weren't inviting me to all of them. I didn't hear about some of them until it was too late. This is still under Andrea Davis' Archdruidcy. And I remember I became second order right before I left, which for me was a very definitive moment of independent religious thought at the time. I was kind of spiritually mature for making a quest at that point, right before I went to Scotland.

EH: What was involved in the second order thing?

MS: Well, during the mid-'80s the Druids had revived Druidism in some form or another, which was talked about by Alice Cascorbi in one of the other interviews. And basically, the older Druids were more into, well, they had their own tradition and were also more into eastern thought and just a wide eclectic choice, but they were definitely not neo-pagan. The people who revived it in '85, '86 were more Native American, neo-pagan, and Wiccan oriented. They occasionally did the old rituals, from the Carleton Druids, but most of the time they made them up, and they had stopped the third order. The third order had come to a halt around 1984, and it wasn't passed on, but the first and second order continued on afterwards. Normally a first or second order Druid has to be ordained by an Archdruid of a grove - an Archdruid is always a third-order Druid, at least in the older days. Now, after '85, there really wasn't an Archdruid, and there weren't any third-orders, officially, though people did vigil, to stay out all night, and just assume that they were third order at that point, because they couldn't find anyone to ordain them. And second order was passed on by Alice Cascorbi who was ordained to the second order by a previous third-order Archdruid, probably Bob Nieman? or Tomone of the people ordained by Franquist, and so she was second order, and so she passed it on to the various people living at Farmhouse, the second and first order, which was a new thing, because normally the Archdruid has to ordain the first, second, and third orders of that grove. So they started off a tradition whereby second orders or first orders could ordain people to whatever order they were holding at the time, so that's how it continued after '85. There's no first order ceremony, but they didn't use the second-order ceremony, though they still consecrated the waters of life at various rituals.

By the early 90's, they had stopped using alcohol, mostly because Andrea Davis did not like alcohol at ceremonies. They substituted a very strong mugwort and verbane tea, which was quite effective. And there's a special ingredient, which she never told me about, but she was substituting that for the waters of life. So when I was being ordained to the second order over in the lower arboretum, I believe it was at the Oak Grove - it was one of the last rituals at the Oak Grove that I remember. Basically, she ordained Bill Scherer, Bill Scherer ordained Matt Cohen, and Matt Cohen turned to me and said... Well, Andrea was saying that "Do you believe that the earth mother is good?" and then the person was supposed to be replying "Yes, I do." And she seals you to the second order with a druid sigil painted on your forehead, which is a circle and two lines vertically passing through the circle. And then that person ordained the next person, that person ordained the next person. But Matt Cohen turned to me and said, "Do you dig that the earth mother is groovy?" and I replied, "I dig." That was considered satisfactory, and I was ordained by Matt Cohen. Then I ordained the woman next to me, and then on and on and on. But I remember asking at that point, because I was kind of in turmoil at this point, I wasn't sure whether I wanted to leave the Catholic Church, or not, so I wanted to make sure that this oath would not violate my conformation, because when it comes to vows I'm pretty faithful to them as far as I can, and so I wanted to make sure that my oath to study Druidism wouldn't violate that oath, and I was very careful in asking this. And Andrea said that it was always a tradition that being a druid of Carleton would not violate any person's religion, though that person could change over time, if they wanted to, later, but it wasn't because of Druidism. So when she said that, I agreed to be ordained to the second order.

EH: Do you want to say a few things just generally about your attitude towards Carleton as you started?

MS: Well, the first term I studied my butt off, and I realized I didn't have to. I quickly came to the understanding that ...well, I think it was summed up best by Topher, who was a prominent protestor at Carleton, and also a member of the Juggling group, he said once that "Carleton would be a lot of fun if it wasn't for all this work." And I took that to heart pretty strongly, and I pretty much determined by the winter of my freshman year that I was not going to be the wonder that I thought I was. First of all, everyone here is incredibly smart, far smarter than at my high school, and I thought I was reasonably smart, but these people were working their butts off far more than I wanted to, because I was having so much fun, just finding people who were like me, and having fun in groups, which I hadn't done much before, that I didn't think it was worth it to waste my time doing homework here. I figured I would pass and get a degree and I'd be fine. I wasn't going to become a library rat and waste away all the time here because I'd heard that college is the best years of your life, and you should live your youth while you have it, and all these other adages, and so I had pretty much determined that I was going to get as much social growth out of these years at Carleton as I could, versus working my butt off, subjects that I'd forget about in four years, doesn't make much sense to me to work hard like that and forget it all, though it does show up nicely on your transcript, to have a nice 3.7 or something. I escaped here with a 2.7 GPA and I thought I was lucky. I basically was a lightweight when it came to classes - I'd take two serious classes and then I'd take lots of music lessons to pad my GPA. I think I ended up something like 410 out of 465 here at Carleton...somebody was working harder at being a slob than I was, and I couldn't figure out who it was. I devoted far more of my time at Carleton to extracurricular activities than just about anyone else I know, possibly excepting some senators.

EH: Tell me about your trip to Scotland.

MS: This was during the height of my Celtic nationalism, with got me in lots of trouble in airports. I went to Scotland, to the University of Glasgow on a two-week notice - I applied two weeks before the end of December, two weeks after the deadline, and the only place that accepted me was in Scotland. I would have preferred to go to Ireland, but Scotland was the only one who would take me. So without asking Carleton for permission, I just up and left, and Carleton responded by saying, 'Oh. Don't come back, if you're not going to tell us.' Because I didn't tell them until mid-January that I wasn't coming back on January fourth. Oops. So I pretty much studied Scottish Gaelic and Scottish history and Database Programming for Historians, and just jumped right in the middle of the school year, right in the middle of a year-long class, and I came out at the top of the Gaelic class and pretty much at the bottom of the history class, because I couldn't write the papers like they did. They have this weird thing in Scotland - they don't use computers, so I had to hand-write all the papers. And I am such a lazy lout that when it comes to writing papers, I write them once. And I had to write by hand, and so I didn't revise them, so I got lousy grades. What can you say?

I was not impressed by Scotland's educational system, which consisted of lectures, lots of notes, and then exams. No discussion at all in the classroom. Not even the tutorial sessions. I was always trying to get conversations going with the little tutorial groups; not a single one would say anything in the class. Even when asked by the Professor! They just hid in their chairs, cowering before his wit and sarcasm. And I was constantly goading him, and being goaded back, and I decided that even though I did like the subject I was studying, that Scotland was not the system of education that I wanted. I preferred Carleton, with fierce in-class discussions and debates, and people talking about issues after class, something that wasn't happening over in Scotland. People did not talk about their homework after class. They weren't interested. It was just something they were doing to punch their ticket.

So basically I studied a lot of Celtic folklore, dance, and everything, and kind of found my roots, Celtically speaking, during that year. I got terribly homesick for Carleton around that time period, and decided to come back for the fall of '91. The college graciously allowed me to come back, but refused to give me any credit for the time I was gone, so that forced me to move my graduation year from 1993 to 1994, meaning an extra year. And I think that year was very important, because it gave me a chance to step away from Carleton and come back with a renewed vigor for what was truly important about Carleton, which was not classes, but the people I was meeting.

EH: Well, let's get back to your connections with the Druids again. You've said some of this already, but I'd be interested in having you sort of characterize what the Druids were like, the kinds of things that they were doing, what ritual was like, et cetera, when you first became involved with them, and how that then changed.

MS: By the time I came around in the fall of '89, to end of '92, it had switched from being Native American-based with some Wiccan things and occasional Druid things becoming almost exclusively Wiccan. All the major leaders of the group - John Burrige, Andrea Davis, Salem Clark, Celia Lange? - everyone who was really in charge of the group, were Wiccans. They weren't Unitarians or eclectic Episcopalians like in the old days, but they were Wiccans and they had a good idea of what neo-paganism was about. It was not the most open group to Christians or Jews or any monotheistic faith. It wasn't like they would run you out or anything, but they just never really talked positively about monotheism or anything like that. While I was really interested in Wiccanism during my freshman and sophomore years, I was more interested in Celtic customs and stuff like that. Wicca, I knew, was not Celtic stuff; it was based on Anglo-Saxon history and is also based on 19th century ceremonial magic, cabalism, and other kinds of gobbledygook kind of new age - well, it wasn't new age back then, but it's now called new age stuff, and most of that stuff doesn't interest me, I don't believe in complicated magical rituals and stuff like that. So I kind of sat through them and nodded my head, and I think I rebelled more in just in the fact that these were people who were seeking religious truth than actually appreciating the products of their research, because most of their research into Wiccan and Neo-pagan thought was just not interesting to me at all. And so I just kind of hung out with them because they were the closest thing to what I was looking for. It wasn't incredibly satisfying, but it was nice being around the people. That's how I kind of characterize the '89 to '92 period.

EH: So there was something there that was attractive enough to just keep you in there.

MS: Yeah. It kept me from dropping the group. Those were the years, '89 - '92, when a lot of groups were interconnected. Essentially from '86 to '91, the Folk Music Society with Pickin' & Grinnin', the Folk Dancers, the Science Fiction Group, the Druids, and Pro Musica, everybody in those groups knew everybody else in the other groups and often were members of the same groups. It was hard being a member of one group without being a member of the other. Around '91-'92 that kind of stopped; more compartmentalization had happened, where students found they only had time for one group, in addition to their studies. I think Carleton was getting more study-oriented at that point. People were members of one group and not the others. So around '91-'92, all the groups started to separate, and people who were Druids were not necessarily into science fiction anymore, not necessarily folkdancers. That might have been one of the reasons why Druidism had elapsed there, because people didn't naturally carry over from the other ranks to fill in the groups when people graduated. Kind of a strange period. I'm sure if you interviewed Mark Heiman, he could give you a very detailed description of this process.

EH: This is sort of an aside at this point, but I wanted to ask who the cloak people are and how does that relate to Druidism?

MS: Ah yes, and the cloak people were the other group. I think it was Vanessa or Linnea Johnson? back in '87 or '88 she brought a cloak to school, and other people thought it was really neat, and they started wearing cloaks too. Not because of any Druid thing, but just because that was really neat. And cloaks are really nice in the winter - cloaks are very warm, especially to wear over the outer garments that you're wearing in the wintertime already. And they're also mysterious and romantic in their own type of way. Carleton has a Society of Creative Anachronism chapter, which recreates medieval activity, and they like to wear cloaks for their activities. And so the SCA-ers started to wear cloaks. And then the Druids around that time said you know, cloaks are really nice when you're sitting out all night in the woods with nothing much else, so why don't we all start wearing cloaks too? So they started wearing cloaks. And since all the groups were connected at the time, they all started saying 'why don't we wear cloaks too, because everyone else is wearing cloaks.' So essentially, the 'cloak people' was just a coverall term for this enormous five- or six-group clique around campus. And at one point we had something like 25 or 30 people wearing cloaks during the school year. That number has dropped down to maybe six or seven who wear them normally, but for a while there was just a whole parade of cloaks around campus, and the only people who wear cloaks anymore are Druids and the occasional person from the SCA; I guess partly because everyone kept saying 'you're wearing a cloak - you must be a druid' and they go 'no, not really.' But after enough of these kind of inquiries, people just stopped wearing cloaks because they got tired of being asked the question. Of course, if you ask a Druid that question, they just kind of look at you, and smile. That was the preferred response.

EH: To what extent up to this '92 period of Druidism that we're talking about did that group have a sense of connectedness to the historical tradition of Druidism at Carleton? How aware were they of the origins of the group and what it was like in the decade of the sixties/early seventies?

MS: Well, the blue book of the archives, which had contained all the documents of Druidism from the beginning, was kind of lost around 1985. It was found again by one of the Druids, but he didn't hand it around to everybody else, and it got lost again at his apartment, and found again about '88, and got refound in 1994. But the blue book had never been widely distributed, only like one or two people read it at any one time. The archives had some minimal material on the Druids, but basically, when they restarted in '85, they only really had Isaac Bonewits' Druid Chronicles Evolved, which has an extremely heavy neo-paganism basis to it, and so anyone reading that, not knowing... See, I originally thought at '85 they had a break in their tradition, and they started again from scratch, using only Isaac's book, not talking to the original Druids. So unlike the previous renaissance of Druids, they didn't have a direct line back to the original founders - they were originally working from Isaac's point of view when they started the group, which was perfectly fine, because that was the way they were going anyway, because there were already people at Carleton before the Carleton Druids got revived who were interested in paganism and native American beliefs. So finding Isaac's book made it very easy for them to restart the Druids, because they were already interested in the stuff that Isaac was talking about. However, I'm starting to revise this, based on more interviews, and learning of the contacts Shelton had with them.

Most people, I've found, in the '89 to '92 period, knew the basic runup story, that the Druids had been started as a rebellion against the Chapel requirement, and had always had a playful sense of humor. Maybe one out of every three people had actually read the five little books of the Druid Chronicle. So. And that was about it. Not much more than that was actually known, and almost everything else, again, was made up, as it still continues to do. Far more tradition of the group exists outside of the printed matter, things like how to collect your firewood and what kind of people you ask to join the rituals, how do you do it, where you go, all those little details are far more important to the vast majority of Druids at Carleton than what happened in verse 2, chapter 5 of the book of Meditations, which was never very important anyway. They read the book throughout the history of Druidism, they just read the book once or twice and never saw it again, and got on with their own personal searches. Which is okay, of course. And in that way, I guess, the Druids were pretty much sticking to tradition, except that most people did not know the original liturgy of the Druids and did not see them practiced very often, if they did see it once. They were starting over from scratch ritually, using a lot of Wiccan-based liturgies and stuff. But they did talk a lot to each other about Druidism and alternate religious ideas after rituals and with each other, and in that way they were exploring religious thoughts, which was still in tradition of the older Druids. But it was more oriented towards the neo-paganism and Wiccan ideas then talking about religion as a whole.

EH: What kind of activities were characteristic of the Druids? What was done at typical rituals or what sort of things were popular? When Druids got together in that era what did they do?

MS: Well, one of the things that separates us from the older Druids is that we have sweat lodges all the time. This was one of the major things from the Native American interests was that we started having sweat lodges, originally over at Farmhouse and then later wherever we could find firewood. Setting up the sweat lodge was basically a ritual in itself because you had to pick up dead, fallen wood, carry it to the site, build a frame, cover it with blankets that you had carried on your back from Goodhue or wherever they were. All these little details that you had to fill to get it ready, and digging a hole, finding the sage. It's a lot of work, five or six hour's work by oneself, easily, setting up a sweat lodge. Then there was all the mailbox stuffing of invitations to invite people. It was by far the biggest type ritual we had at Carleton was the sweat lodge, because there's so much preparation work required.

Basically, you show up, sit around the campfire for about an hour while the rocks are heating up, talk about various things, and basically Andrea was the only one who led sweat lodges while I was here. You get in a circle, you call the four directions, ask for their blessing, drink some more mugwort tea special. You strip down, get in the sweat lodge, close it up; the rocks are already in there, and you pour water on the rocks - you have four people, each one calls one of the four direction, then they call the sky and the earth, then they say hi to all their plant and animal brothers, and usually there's some form of anonymity involved, where anything that's said in the sweat lodge cannot be told to other people afterwards. Then they usually sang one of two chants, they get the energy going, and then they do some random singing, noises, meditation perhaps, where you imagine that you are a tree, and go to the roots, then you go to the roots around the roots, then you start traveling around the landscape, kind of diffusing your consciousness as far as you can, which is quite easy with her mugwort tea! Then you ask for blessings, and pray for different people who are in trouble and stuff, and ask for wisdom; then you come back from meditation around the hills, the dirt around the roots, then you go to the roots, then you come back into yourself, and eventually you're human again. Then you thank the four directions in reverse order, and then you open up the flap and you go outside, and everyone's steaming, and it's kind of neat; then you roll in the dewy grass, then you dry off by the fire. If you want to, you do it again, make it pretty quick. But it's the most intense form of ritual that we've ever done at Carleton. Far more than anything Carleton has ever seen before us.

The Wiccan rituals were mostly new-moon rituals. They had the Beltane one in the spring with the maypole dance when they could, and designed one - usually it's just a big bonfire somewhere - basically it's similar to the Native American that you call the four directions, they call them watchtowers, usually there's a circle drawn on the ground before the thing starts to cut off that space magically from the rest of the universe, which is kind of different from Druidic ritual, even Reformed Druidic Ritual, which generally just takes place in nature, versus being separated from nature - that's a hand-me-down from ceremonial magic, where you build a protective circle to protect you against the demons or what-not. There's a lot more, like you have magic knives, and you have cups - the knife is for the male element, the cup is for the female element; there's some sexual symbology with the two things when you unite them. There's some cakes you pass around, in Wiccan ritual. You really have to interview Andrea or Michelle Curtis, since they're much more into Wiccan theology than I am. Basically, Wiccan ritual has a female goddess who's pretty much head honcho. She might or might not have a male consort who runs around the woods with the animals, but the more feminist you get the less likely he is to show up in the ritual, because male gods are 'icky.' They don't like them. So.

EH: Do you know anything about the Wiccan history of people like Andrea or Michelle? Did their Wiccanism predate their involvement with the Druids?

MS: I'm going to be interviewing them before I leave, hopefully, or I'll have them come in. Most of the Wiccans come to Carleton now with Wiccanism before they arrive. Because witchcraft is mainstream enough that most people have heard about it before they get to Carleton, if they're already in that area. I didn't know about it before I came here, so it was kind of.. I don't know. The whole thing about witchcraft is that they for some reason have chosen a really stupid name for themselves, because they've got to reclaim this word, and make it good again, just like homosexuals have to reclaim the word 'queer,' and lesbians have to reclaim the word 'dyke,' and so on. I'm sure there's a pretty good reason why they're going through all this trouble, but I always liked the word 'druid' because, except for the human sacrifices, we have a pretty popular image: you know, tree huggers. I kind of like that. A lot less trouble from the naysayers.

EH: Well, tell me some thing about changes over time then, in your own connections with Druidism, and how the group changed focus.

MS: The group had pretty much dropped the Native American part of it when most of those people had graduated in 1988/89, and it switched to a more Wiccan/pagan orientation from '88 to '92. They had pagan studies from '86 to '89 or so, where they'd have intellectual discussions on books on paganism. They'd bring in speakers to talk about 'what is Satanism and how is it different from neo-Paganism' and such, and they'd invite people from around the campus to come and listen to them, but generally most of the Christian societies just kind of avoided the pagan studies altogether. One thing that was noteworthy was that they were more activist than the older Druids were. Most people who come who are neo-Pagans or Wiccans are afraid that they're going to get burned at the cross at some time during their lives. So they have this paranoia to some degree, probably rightly so, that the Christians are out to get them. For this purpose, the group since '86 had had a much closer connection with the college than ever before, because they wanted to make sure first of all that the college was never on the side of whatever group decided to pick on them, but also because they wanted to use the college's resources to help fund activist activities, like bringing the speakers, letter-writing campaigns, and such, so that Carleton College had actually funded Pagan Studies as a student organization, from '86 to '89, when it collapsed. After that, I think from '90 to '92, there was 'Catalyst' run by Salem Clark and Celia Lange, both of whom were solitary witches who didn't do much druid rituals, but they kind of had Sunday morning breakfasts at their apartment, and we discussed various issues of paganism. But, that was not officially funded by the College, but it was still a form of separate organization from the Druids to kind of bring people together and talk about these issues of where Neo-Paganism fits into society. During my Archdruidcy of '93-'94, I founded 'The Friends of the Earth-Mother at Carleton College' which was a front for getting money for the Carleton Druids without making the Carleton Druids an official organization. Because if you're an official organization, then you have to have your membership open to perusal by the administration, and we didn't want all of our members' names to be released, because of this same paranoia. So we had a front organization to filter money to our group. And I think we got about $500 dollars that year, and we brought in Isaac Bonewits and bought candle wax and purchased some magazine subscriptions and such with that money. And in spring of 1995, I think, or 1996, Becky Hroback and Anne Graham and Michelle Curtis finally got the Carleton Druids sponsored as an official student organization. And so Carleton's longest-running unofficial organization ended 33 years of being an outside organization and became an official organization. So far no major problems, but they're directly budgeted now, and I can see the '86 to '96 period as being a quest for legitimization of alternate spirituality at Carleton, far more than the older Druids ever did. They kind of played around with the idea and had fun with it, but they weren't dead serious on becoming an official organization, like the Druids at Carleton were since '86.

There was a lot more seriousness involved with the rituals. Most of the rituals were held for specific purposes, like healing, trying to - well, they never did black magic that I knew of, but it was to influence powerful people not to do something stupid, like putting nuclear waste on Prairie Island, and things like that. Environmental issues. We held rituals to clear up bad feeling in the air around Carleton at crisis points, for good luck on grades, stuff like that. The rituals were held for specific purposes, rather than being an excuse to meditate, like in the older days. And in that way I think they were different. And at that point I think I was more interested in just doing rituals for meditation than doing magic for practical purposes. Because even though I do believe that magic can exist, I don't feel like messing around with it because when you start disturbing the cosmic order with your own personal desires, I think you might cause all sorts of chaos to happen. So I don't generally try to influence things through magic, if I can help it. Though from a Catholic background, I do believe that prayer is effective. But to have huge rituals, with all sorts of magic being raised up, sounds a little bit like using a machine gun to catch a butterfly. It's overdoing it a little bit, in my opinion, with dangerous consequences for the bystanders.

EH: At what point did you or other people get interested in researching the history of the group and reviving some of the old forms and traditions and offices and things like that?

MS: Well, in February of either '92 or '93 - I can't remember - I essentially became very interested in becoming third order, because during that time period I was getting to the point where I wanted to start leading rituals. And the group had faltered, back in '91-'92, because of John Burridge departing. There weren't Archdruids between '86 and '92. There were strong minds who made sure that rituals happened, and that was all there was. There wasn't any kind of totalitarian 'I'm in charge, we're going to make sure this thing happens' and such, it was more like someone showed up and said 'I'm going to lead a ritual on this day. Any of you guys want to come up?' and we'd all show up. And then someone else would say, 'I'm going to lead a ritual' and then people would show up. That's generally how things worked. Whenever someone felt like doing a ritual, something happened. Andrea Davis, from the period of '89 - '92, ended up being pretty much the only person who ever decided to do anything. And as a result, it started to develop into an Archdruidcy, because no one else organized anything, so she ended up de facto becoming Archdruid. There's an old proverb among us that the person who runs away from authority the slowest becomes Archdruid. So Andrea became Archdruid by default. But after three or four years, she was tired of that. And by the spring of '92 she pretty much had washed her hands of the whole group. I think she graduated in '93, a year late.

However, I was seriously helping her do all the detail gruntwork of carrying everything and collecting firewood and stuff, but I didn't want to lead a ritual at that point, until the spring of '93, when I felt I had sufficiently gotten a feel for the group. Now I would have graduated in the spring of '93 if it hadn't been for that Scottish thing, and the group might have well faltered at that point if Andrea and I had graduated in '93, but I stayed on for the extra year. The spring of '92 was when Sam and I decided we wanted to become Archdruids. '92, '93 - I can't figure out which one it was because they were almost identical years in my mind, because in the spring of both years I'd decided to become Archdruid in different ways. In spring of '92 I decided to become Archdruid just by staying up all night and saying I was Archdruid, which was the way things ran.

EH: Do you mean Archdruid, or do you mean Third Order?

MS: I didn't really think there was much difference, because no one had done vigils in a long time. In the spring of '92, Sam and I went into the little grove, where we had met in the spring of '90, and we decided to just vigil on our own, independently, and declare ourselves third order. And we did this. And it was about that time, the spring of '92, that I began doing my research into the Druids, which came to fruition in the spring of '93, one year later, when I sent out a questionnaire in February of '93, asking for information from other Druids on the past history. I wanted to try to reconstruct Druidism at that point. Because I saw that Druidism under purely Wiccan interests had fallen flat in the spring of '92. And by the spring of '93, Andrea was about ready to graduate, and the whole thing had gone flat. So I decided to try to essentially bring back old Druidism, see if that might help things. So during '92 to '93, considering myself a third-order, I started getting more involved in Druid activities.

The first ritual that I officially ever held was spring of '92, when I led a Beltane ritual on Mai Fete Island, with Sam Adams, Andrea Davis, Sam Adams, Heather Gurenberg, and Alex Stewart being present. I used part of the liturgy of the old druids at that time, because there was just enough stuff in Issac's Druid Chronicles, and then the Carleton clippings of old newspaper articles for me to get a feel of the old Druids. But it was half-Wiccan, half old Druid at that time. Basically, we went around the lake in quarters. The first quarter was earth, the second quarter was fire, the third was water, and the fourth quarter we swam across to the island and was air. I wasn't being pretty true to the Wiccan four-towers thing, but I was doing it my own way. What really was interesting was not the ritual but what happened there in the night, when I had the great dream. It's written up in the book of the Dead Lake Scrolls, which I wrote. Basically, I had this weird dream where I was back in Scotland on the island of Erin, and there was a big bus group of people moving up this mountain, and it was very slippery and hard to walk on. And everything was in greys, except the rain, which was yellow. The bus stopped, and it was all my friends from Social Mecca [note: the dorm room of Curtis Mitchell & Kareem Kazkaz, a noted social center] and the cloak people, and I got on board there, and went to a place, and got off, and wasn't looking, and a bus hit me, and I slid under the car and banged my head on the universal joint of the car, and when I got up it was still heavily raining and very muddy, and there was this house with a yellow window, glowing against the darkness.

And I went inside, and all the people were there again, had gotten off the bus and were waiting for me, and a man came out who was completely covered in red boar fur, with bristles all over, and he had the same face as one of the druids I met over on the Isle of Arann. He had blue eyes, and he told me "Now you are one of us." And it was about that time that I woke up in the morning. It was a very strange kind of dream. And I kind of considered that my initiation into the Third Order to the full extent, that May of '92. And during my research of '92 - '93, I got enough materials to understand the old Druids, but I still didn't really understand what was different about them from what we were in the renaissance period of Druidism. And the questionnaire was my attempt to find out who were the Druids of the old time. And what I found out in that period radically changed Druidism at Carleton: it gave them a greater sense of history, and changed my complete idea of everything I held religiously. And we'll have to hold on to that until I'm interviewed tomorrow, when we'll do the second part of this interview.

EH: Okay, the date is now August 30th, 1996, and Michael Scharding and Eric Hilleman are continuing with an interview begun three days ago. We were talking about the history of the Carleton Druids during Michael Scharding's tenure at Carleton, and Michael, you had begun talking about how you had begun doing research into the history of Carleton Druidism, and I wanted to ask you about the fruits of that research, why you did it, and what kind of things you learned from it.

MS: Well, my major at Carleton was a History major, and I've always been kind of a person who would join lost causes and try to revive them. And what better group to try to revive than a group that's been dead for twelve or fourteen years? Officially, because by '93...well, maybe not twelve years, but '84 was the real drop in the older ways had happened. The renaissance of Druidism had begun in '86 with a different angle. So I wanted to revive as much as I could the pre-1984 Druidism, and to do that I needed to do research. Basically, I began with the Archives, which had not much more than a copy of Isaac Bonewits' Druid Chronicles Evolved, the original Druid Chronicles, part of the black book, and maybe about a couple dozen letters from the '60s and '70s. And from that I was able to get a bunch of names, and eventually I ran into Richard Shelton and David Frangquist and a couple other people, who were distressed to find out that the blue book of the Archives, which was the book of documents handed down from Archdruid to Archdruid, had disappeared. So they helped me to reconstruct the blue book, essentially, and do my other research.

The reason I did the research for the Druid Archives was to provide primary material for my Comps project, a comprehensive exercise project for the history major. I was going to do a history of the Carleton Druids, a project that caused me no end of trouble. Six or seven major revisions, and I think they just let me go because they were tired of me revising it. But one of the things I found out about the older Druids is that they had a much more lackadaisical attitude toward ritual, which I already did, because I had never really enjoyed the rituals that much, I just enjoyed being with the people. They had a philosophical bent about what the whole purpose of religion was and whether or not ritual was helpful towards religion, a topic that didn't come up too often in the post-'84 Druidism at Carleton, and it was a subject that fascinated me, so... I would say that one of the fascinating elements of researching the Druids would be the aspect of religion as being a method of rebellion. One of the problems that I had with post-'84 Druidism was that they were choosing a religion that was being persecuted, probably on purpose in some ways, but also because they thought it was closest to their heart. But they had already accepted the idea of religion, in some ways, because neo-paganism and Wicca and Native American beliefs are religions, in and of themselves. It had become somber, joyless and too serious. And they had given up the whole debate of "What was religion?" And the whole idea of what separates philosophy and religion for me has always been a very thin line, and I've always kind of straddled it back and forth. And these are the issues that the older Druids were constantly writing about, especially during the Isaac Affairs of the '74-'76 period, when Isaac was becoming extremely serious in his Druidism and trying to turn it into a religion, versus a mode of outlook upon religion.

Basically, when I finished my studies I introduced a greater amount of silliness, play, and meditation to my services, which I began to hold in the earlier style, on a more frequent basis. They weren't well received by most Druids, but then most Druids don't generally show up too often anyway. Usually two or three would show up for the weekly rituals, which I reintroduced for a while. The vagueness of the rituals was what I liked the best. If you weren't paying close attention, you might not quite understand what happened - it's like you blinked, and suddenly the ritual's over with. And I thought that was kind of a fun thing to do, because if you hold it in a particularly beautiful location, the people who are attending the ritual might be distracted enough by the trees that by the time they came back the ritual was over. I don't know, I kind of liked that. It's there and gone, and you don't have to worry about it. You can get on with looking at the trees and stuff, which I think is more important than the actual speaking of the words. At my rituals I decided to collect more meditations, and I started to write more personal histories of the recent years, like in the Dead Lake Scrolls, and collected books of poetry, and stuff for materials, most of which never were used, but I was just trying to produce more thoughtful material for possible future Archdruids.

I also made the International Druid Archives larger than the Carleton scope, originally because I thought there was a greater connection between the different groups and Carleton's Reformed Druids, until I realized that the Carleton Druids are pretty much unique in the world, and that the Celtic connections are pretty superficial, and that the only thing that connects these groups, besides the name "Druid," is possibly the use of a couple of visual images of Celticness, a tendency towards anarchy and collapse, and possibly also the...any time you have a Druid group, you pretty much have people who are looking for answers, and I figure since we're all looking towards the earth mother, we'll probably get most of the same answers, even if they are taking the ancient Celtic part a little bit too seriously. But several Celtically-oriented pagan groups have spun off from the Reformed Druids, notably Ar nDraiocht Fein and the Henge of Keltria. And since I didn't think they would get any kind of stable archive of their own, and I kind of think of them as grandchildren of the Reform, I decided to include the material into the Druid Archives. Which may prove to be helpful to the Reformed Druids in some way, as an additional reservoir of nature-oriented poetry, meditations and liturgies to work off of in the future. Plus, with the Keltria group, they're up in the Twin Cities, and they can come down and join us, or we can go join them, so I thought it would be useful for them to have access to their records. Just kind of networking groups together.

But it's kind of hard to describe how my Druidism at Carleton changed, because it was a very gradual thing. Some of it is covered in my diary, my seven-year diary that I've had since I lived here, but basically Carleton is a very special time when you can work out a lot of your questions in a relatively supportive environment that you might not have another opportunity of. You have several people who are in a similar stage of their lives, and who are willing to ask the same questions and give you honest answers in a way that, well, perhaps people become more experienced as they get aged, and I don't know that experience can be translated in words...It has to be experienced, I believe. But I know that the 18 -21 age is, religiously speaking, probably the most crucial in deciding one's future religious lifestyle. Either you abandon it, you get more conservative, or you learn more about it then you ever believed possible. There's one proverb I remember, and I was thinking about the difference between religion and philosophy, that a religion destroys evil, but a morality merely covers it. I'll let you think about that one. But I think there's a certain something about religion that's one step above a philosophy, whereas a philosophy might have a logical basis to it, or it's more argument-based. There's an element of faith which does not completely exist within philosophy, and that's why I think Druidism kind of bounces back and forth. Philosophy doesn't have the same amount of ritual that religion does, but it's easier to understand philosophy for the hard-minded mind. But occasionally the mind needs to take a vacation - I think that's where religion comes in. But basically, my '93 - '94 school year was spent having a large number of rituals: the weekly rituals I've already mentioned, the nearly monthly sweat lodges, as much as I could. I got the Druid's Notes Conference up and running again, where people could post notes and talk to each other, outside of the ritual time period. I tried to introduce weekly meetings of meditative readings, and stuff like that. I tried to network with people, give them addresses of different groups, and societies outside of Carleton which they might wish to contact. I essentially tried to do everything to make it easier for people to become Druids, sometimes neglecting my own Druidism by being too busy. My own form of Druidism was essentially talking to people, I think much more than doing rituals. Talking to people, and walking by myself in the Arboretum at night were, I think, the two backbones of my Druidism.

The way I have tried to be remembered for my Carleton Druidism is mostly through literature, which is amusing because I consider myself a little bit anti-dogmatic - I make fun of scriptures as much as I can, and to leave behind a 500-page tome of scriptures seems a little bit hypocritical, in a way. But I've collected this collection called A Reformed Druid Anthology, which I'll be publishing tomorrow. Partly as a scholarly tool, for other researchers. I'm producing 30 copies - about ten will be distributed to libraries across the country, about ten will be distributed to friends, and then I'll hold on to the other copies. This will be downloadable off the Internet, on our website. And I kind of hope that people will decide to write histories on their neo-pagan organizations, to provide useful material for religion majors and other people doing research on the newer religions. Especially in an age where Fundamentalism and other Christian religions seem to be surging ahead, I think it's necessary for more people to be doing research on the fringes of the religious movements, which are often the people who are rebelling against the mainstream religions, in a way. And I kind of hope that my book will encourage other people to research this area of theology. And this collection I've made, it has a study guide, it has the original Druid Chronicles, it has the Apocrypha, which has selected letters over the last 34 years from various Druids, on what Druidism is to them. It has a lot of rituals from the older days, a variety. It has various trivia and customs, it has some books on the Hasidic Druids of St. Louis, who are now extinct, and an increased and enlarged collections of meditations, miscellany, my history comps, and various publications that I've put out over the years. Since I won't be here over the next few years, I've decided to leave this behind as a kind of a very long epistle to future Archdruids and various Druids here at Carleton. My hope is that they will realize that most of it is self-deprecating, and that the underlying message is that 'these are the kind of materials you can collect over the years if you continue your Druidism' and not to use this book as a strict guideline or strict handbook of Druidism, but more of an example of what Druidism has done for me over the years, and that the sheer creativity that it can produce from one Druid might be an example for them on how it can affect their lives. It will also give them a sense of continuity over the years, with the past Druids, which I think is important.

There are lots of alumni who have gone through the same problems that you have, and that Carleton has deeply changed their lifestyles. And you can have a connection with these older Druids - just write letters to them, and ask how, over the last 30 years, your Druidism has changed. And for me, seeing how the Druids have changed after graduation has been perhaps the greatest benefit. Because I've seen how the ritual has fallen away, and how the lifestyle changes that they undertook have been the most lasting contribution of Druidism to them. And Druidism for me has pretty much been synonymous with Carleton's educational basis: the constant asking of questions, the unwillingness to accept simple answers, the continual search for academic and religious truth, seem pretty close in my mind. The need to involve other people in this quest is important, also. The 'no man is an island' concept is important for the Druids, because without the other Druids, I would have never gotten to this stage, and that has to be remembered and respected. It is possible to be quite a good Druid by yourself, but I'm sure other people have gone through the same steps you have and can leave a trail for you to follow, or at least, what kind of tools will be useful in your quest. And I've noticed that many of the Druids over the years have returned to their original religion, but they still have that element of Druidism in their minds, which is comforting to me to know that one can reconcile one's beliefs with Druidism on a stable basis throughout one's life - there's always an opportunity for return.

EH: I was wondering if you wanted to say anything at all about the things that you did to mark the 30th anniversary of the Druids.

MS: Richard Shelton came down for that. Basically, for the 30th anniversary, we held a ritual on the Hill of Three Oaks and the Little Grove. Richard Shelton came down to hold a service. That period - that was May of '93, and April of '93 we had a run-in with some anti-Druids who broke up one of our rituals, but I don't think they understood that we were actually having a service. But thinking back on that period, I don't think I acted as well as I could have for that situation. Instead of being calm and collected, I got nervous and paranoid, which probably affected me more than them. Getting worked up about such things - and it was a trivial thing - was very un-Druidic of me, I would think. But it did kick off a huge surge of interest in my research, sort of a search for validity, which Druidism will never supply. Druidism is not in the habit of giving official credentials, and such. It's too much of a rebellious organization to ever... Well, every time someone searches for validity in their beliefs, they might find a couple people who agree with them. But basically, you have to just be yourself and change what you know to be wrong, and stand by what you believe in. No one else can give that to you. I'm sure you've heard that a hundred times before, but it's true. The 30th Anniversary was my attempt to connect with the past of Druidism, to tell all the other Druids that yes, we've been here a very long time, and other people have done the same things that you have done in your search for religious truth, and you're part of a longer struggle that not only have people in the past helped you, but you also have an obligation to provide the resources and support to future Druids at Carleton. Something that I really think is the basis of the third order.

The third order originated with Frangquist asking David Fisher in 1964 to take over the Druid organization, and Fisher had decided by the spring of '64 that he was going on to the Episcopal seminary. And the group was nearing its objective of getting the chapel requirement removed. Fisher did not really like the idea of it continuing onward, but Frangquist thought that the search for religious truth was too important to the various Druids at Carleton to just let it die and leave people to their own devices. Not that he felt that he was the only one who could help these people, but he was a way, a possibility, an opportunity, and that it was his duty to help other people as much as he could who came to him for help. The Druids have never been a proselytizing organization. Sure we show up at activities fair at the beginning of Fall term and put out a membership list, but when people fall away from the organization, if that's the right term, we accept that, and just go on with the people who decided to continue on with us. I really doubt that anyone can graduate from Carleton without becoming a little bit of a Druid. But Frangquist started of the third order...essentially, it's your duty to provide counseling when asked questions, to provide opportunities of religious introspection for people who don't know how to hold services; to offer tips of meditation to those who need to learn about it - you're essentially becoming a resource for other people to work with, a resource that is without affiliation to any particular religion, a neutral party.

There aren't very many neutral religious organizations. I mean the Unitarians come kinda close, but they're still in the Christian camp. And the people who are just completely wandering around, there needs to be a person they can ask questions to. Of course, one of the problems that the Archdruids have is that they don't really have answers. They just have more questions to give to the person who's asking questions, which can be very disheartening to people seeking a simple, strict organization, a belief to believe in. But if they understand that the religious search is merely an endless stream of questions, then we can provide that service to them. That's pretty much the third order.

EH: Why don't we go now to the period after you graduated and you continued to maintain ongoing contacts with the Druids at Carleton. What's the state of Druidism at Carleton now, and what have your connections with it been?

MS: Well, I ordained Becky Hrobak as my successor, and then she took up Anne Graham and Michelle Curtis as her co-Archdruids in the spring of '94. The '94 - '96 period, they held frequent rituals, mostly of the Wiccan variety, which Becky didn't like that much because she's not into ritual - she's kind of like me in that respect. She's more into the meditative aspect, and her favorite activity was having tea parties where people read poetry and drank tea. Or taking Arb walks. That was one of the things I liked doing a lot. But Anne and Michelle are more into the organized ritual aspects of religious life, and they did a pretty good job of organizing things like that. They're also good about providing access to resources of the neo-pagan genre. I think they did a pretty good job, because you don't have a lot of time at Carleton to devote to activity: there's only so many hours you can do and still get a decent GPA. I usually spent a good eight or ten hours a week, at least, of serious Druidic activity or research, possibly much more than that. My grades suffered as a result. You have to be extremely dedicated to do something like that, day in and day out. And after about two years, they were tired of this.

[Tape 2, Side B]

MS: They didn't have the sheer resources of time that I allowed myself. Considering that, I think they kept the group pretty active. It didn't grow too much, but at least it was maintaining itself. They were sophomores when they came into their Archdruidcy, so they were relatively young. It is my opinion that seniors should not be Archdruids, if it can at all be helped. Because Comps tend to take up too much of their time to be an effective Archdruid. But they did find their successors, which is the important thing for the Archdruid to do. They found Irony Sade and Michelle Hajder, who we ordained in spring of '96 to be next year's Archdruids. I've written about them in the book of Vigils, so you're welcome to read that. They're in the Dead Lake Scrolls. But I think that they are the first Archdruids to be in charge of an official Druid organization. The first 33 years of the Reformed Druid history, we were an unofficial student organization. In the spring of '95 or '96, I don't remember, Becky, Anne, and Michelle got the Druids to become an official student organization, with funding and everything.

Now this is very helpful for financial purposes, but for secrecy purposes it kind of puts a wet blanket upon the Druids, because all our records and membership lists are now available for perusal. And there are some hoops you have to jump through as an official organization, which take up more of the Archdruid's time, which should really be spent with the other Druids as much as possible. Here you've got money, which allows you to do more activities, but here you also have more paperwork, and you have to be more careful that you don't do anything that will offend the college, or you can get your funding revoked. So it hampers the kind of activities you can have, it takes up the Archdruid's time, and it makes you an official part of the college, which affects the whole basis of your organization. If you're constantly on the outside of the group, the group being the college, you can get away with all sorts of stuff and fight against rigidity of beliefs and the status quo and stuff like that, but when you're actually part of it, you have a tendency to support that organization. And while I am very supportive off the college in many ways, I kind of think that the Druids need to be there on the fringes, rather than in the limelight. To correct the organization in ways that only an outsider can really do. I really hope that Michelle and Irony don't get too absorbed in the specifics and legalities and continue to have a thriving organization, meeting in the Arboretum and talking to each other and stuff like that, and don't get wrapped up in college politics too much. But it's kind of nice to see that the group has continued on, after me. Michelle and Irony are my great-grandchildren, in the Reformed sense. Or great grand-brothers and -sisters. I don't know if that works. But it's just nice to see what one has done has lived after one, and I suspect it will continue on for another three or four years before the next major crisis will happen.

EH: Okay, is there anything else you want to say to the Druids?

MS: Good luck!

EH: You've been doing some other interesting things apart from Druidic things. Since your graduation you've been involved in a number of projects - I wondered if you wanted to say something about those.

MS: Well, the Carleton Druids were a religious rebellion of mine, but there were other kinds of things that I was trying to do. Now you mustn't get the idea that I was some kind of wild-eyed revolutionary person running around, picketing places. I prefer to do my kind of Reforming more casually, kind of picking away at the rock versus swinging sledgehammers. One of the other groups that I started at Carleton was the Mystery Science Theater 3000 organization. The Science Fiction Club at Carleton had become more and more quality-oriented and film-watching. The original Science Fiction Club, which started I think in '87, was essentially watching Dr. Who and old Star Trek episodes. And that only took up two hours of your Saturday afternoon, which left you three or four more hours to socialize. That started forming a nucleus which eventually became the Dr. Who club, which became the Science Fiction Alliance. That was a lot of fun. Got lots of people together, talking and discussing various science fiction topics, listening to folk music, like Mark Heiman's singing, which got me into Druidism, and was generally just a good thing. People didn't watch much TV at all back then. For us, watching two hours a week was kind of scandalous, at least in the eyes of the college. And over the last three or four years, there's been an explosion of various science-fiction series on TV, and there's just a glut of viewing activities now being performed by the Science Fiction Alliance at Carleton, to the point where there's so much new stuff on that you have to be quiet so people can hear it for the first time correctly. In the old days, of course, everyone had seen it already two or three times, so it was no big deal if you started talking to your neighbor and making fun of the series or chatting or socializing. Now you have to sit there quietly in a room with sixty other people and then as soon as it's over you have two minutes to talk, and then -boom- there's another series on the TV. It's just not very good for building a community. It's more of a communal... I don't know, it's like being alone in this group of 60 people watching the same program. It's not like the older days. It reminds me a lot of my younger Catholic services, where you sit put and just listen passively.

So three years ago, in the spring of '93, Mark and I founded the Mystery Science Theater 3000 club at Carleton. MST is a business from Minnesota that would take old movies and stick three comedians in the lower right corner of the screen. And they would constantly make fun of these movies that were so abysmally bad that you could hardly bear sitting through them. And somehow by adding humor to it, or just completely destroying them, I think one becomes aware of how many science fiction movies and stuff like that are actually quite good. So we came up with the idea that if we showed really terrible MST movies to the Science Fiction Community here at Carleton, they would stop bitching and moaning about how awful the last Next Generation episode was, and they might actually start appreciating how much better it actually was than 'Manos, the Hands of Fate' or 'Earth vs. the Spider' or these really crappy movies, or that people would take a more positive attitude in their critiques, versus saying 'oh, that wasn't the best thing possible.' Which is, I think, becoming more and more a way that the American public is seeing it as. They have such a fascination with perfection that when something fails to meet it they tear it apart, whereas they don't realize all the good qualities of it. I think by subjecting yourself to what is a really terrible movie, you will appreciate the better qualities of the recent materials that are now available. And appreciating what you have, that's what it's all about. Mark and I also formed the Bagpipe Association at Carleton, where we sneak around in the Arboretum at one o'clock in the morning to serenade the students who are still up working. Bagpiping is very similar to the MST3K concept, in that bagpipe is pretty horrible music to listen to, and it makes you appreciate the quiet tinkly music of classical concerts, and stuff like that. The MST3K society is kind of moribund, it kind of collapsed after two or three successors; there really wasn't anyone who was interested in watching those movies any more than they already had. They'd seen them all, and they didn't want to see them again. And so it's kind of collapsed. It might power up again in a couple of years, but...

Back in the spring of '94, Mark and I started the Half-Dozen Eggs film production company. Similar to the MST concept, we wanted to make a really bad movie, because here we had been criticizing all these really terrible movies in Mystery Science Theater, and yet, we ourselves were guilty of not appreciating how good those movies were, because we said, 'oh, I could make a better movie than that.' That kind of comment comes up. Well, we decided to put our money where our mouth was, and we failed! We made a terrible movie. The first one was called "A Prisoner" which was supposedly a predecessor to the Prisoner series, the British science fiction series where a retiring spy is taken to a prison and they try to drain some information out of him, and he resists, and he tries to escape, every episode, and fails. Kind of a depressing series in that way. It was the first action series where the hero loses every episode. Which we find kind of amusing. So we made a prequel to that film, and it didn't turn out very well; it was not very well made.

But in the Spring of '95, we decided to move from the science fiction genre to the Barbarian fantasy genre, mainly because it's cheaper to make a really good barbarian film than to make a really lousy science fiction film. Because all you need is a bunch of fur and a sword, and you can make a good barbarian movie. And this was called 'Gator,' based on the movie 'Ator the Fighting Eagle,' so ours was 'Gator the Fighting Rabbit.' It was a pastiche of 30 or so barbarian movies that I had seen over that spring. Most of the actors and crew were Druidic sorts of people from Carleton, with that quirky sense of humor. The trick of writing a really good comedy is not to write a comedy, but to try really hard to make it serious, and then to fail. It's kind of like Douglas Adams saying that the way to learn how to fly is to throw yourself really hard at the ground and miss. It's a very similar concept.

I had an underlying idea for these two movies, in that Carleton to me has a kind of mystical, mythological landscape, and I always had one foot on the other side, mythologically speaking, while I was here. Every building had all kinds of stories and legends to me, from the friends I've heard talk about what they did there, and everything like that. But I thought it would be really interesting to try to impose a completely alien idea of the college, Carleton College actually being a science fiction scene or set where people were having their brains wiped, or something like that. Or turn it into a barbarian landscape full of monuments and beautiful maidens and bad action sequences. So I extensively used the features of my beloved Carleton in my movies; kind of making a monument of my love to her.

And the last one we've made is Drake's 7, which is another science fiction series but much higher budgeted, based on the old Flash Gordon serials of ten-minute episodes. And to a degree I think these film projects also filled a gap or a void in the Science Fiction Alliance here at Carleton, because over the years there's been less and less interaction between the members of the Science Fiction Alliance. And so what we did with our movies over the last few years, was since a lot of the Science Fiction people hang around over the summer, we put them into movies. And so when you're on the set for five or six straight hours and you only have to say one line, you tend to try to find something else to do. And this is usually where you start making friendships with people, and building a common experience to work upon. And these film projects are a way of getting the Science Fiction Society involved in the more creative aspect of producing science fiction, and not just watching it. And also hopefully to encourage them to comment and write materials on other forms of science fiction beyond the visual formats.

And like the Druids, I've funded various books and projects for the science fiction library as well, stuff like that. And I feel as an alumnus that rather than giving the college a check to work with as they feel, I'd rather target certain groups that I think are important to the college's welfare and make sure that they have all the money that they need. Well, not all the money that they want, but the money that I think they need for certain projects, and so I've directed my contributions to these groups - the druids, the science fiction society, the MST3K group, and the Bagpipe society. Mark Heiman and I together have pretty much been the backbone of these organizations, behind the scenes. The other organization that I think is really important for me is Pickin' & Grinnin', because this is a group that meets Wednesday nights to do folksinging. And one of the unfortunate side effects of mass-production of music is that instead of ...like in the old days, when you wanted to have a dance, you had to find a band to play for you. Now you can just stick a CD or a tape into there and have a perfect performance for your enjoyment pleasure. This leads to more jaded behavior, 'oh, why should I get this crappy band when I can get this beautiful performance by these world-reknowned people who everybody knows?' This is a lack of creativity on their part, because there are certain things that a live band can do that a canned band cannot do. You can't make requests, you can't ask them to do something special. This is part of an aspect of society that is happy with prepackaged religion, prepackaged music, and all these other things. And Pickin' & Grinnin' is where you make your own music, you make your own harmonies, you pick your own songs, you modify the songs, and you play instruments with them. And this kind of self-sufficient attitude toward entertainment I think is very healthy for a student to go through while at Carleton. To realize that there's very little that they can sell you that you can't do for yourself, if you really wanted to.

And this applies towards religion, and entertainment, education to a great degree, and almost everything. The last two or three years I've been getting into a more Spartan existence, as much as I can, mainly because I realize that if you don't want your possessions, they will eventually take control of your life. And after you're dead, of course, your possessions live on after you, but of course that's not who I am, I'm not my possessions, it's the friendships that I've built and the ideas that I've done. And that's more important than who's the richest person in the cemetery or who has the most stuff to give away when they're dead? Well, I think you should be working on that throughout your life, giving away possessions and stuff like that. I guess that's just the main thing about the Druids and everybody is trying to teach self-sufficiency and self-confidence, self-reliance and innovative ideas and how to do things in ways that other people have not done before and are better suited to the situation. To be adaptive in all aspects of life. To challenge myself even further than this, I am going to Japan in five or six days. I am going to abandon most of my official responsibilities as a Reformed Druid for a couple years.

Well, I take that back. I'll probably get questions about religion, and though they won't know I'm a Druid, I'll probably try to give them good advice. I call this "guerilla Druidism." So I guess I'm not officially abandoning my responsibilities, but I'm not going to be going around, starting a grove or anything, for a couple years. But basically I'm going to try to live as cheaply as possible in Japan, which is not easy to do. I'm going to be learning a new language, a new career, and I'm going to have to learn how to do my own entertainment because I won't understand theirs. I'm essentially trying to learn a new lifestyle, and how to adapt to it. Because most of what I know about the American lifestyle has become second nature. I don't know how I learned it in the first place. And I think to become a better adaptive and creative person, to go through it again as an adult, consciously, as you go through it, I think will be a great way of building up tools and resources for future endeavors of mine. New ways of thinking, new ways of organizing people, new ways of learning, new ways of religion. It's just a massive attempt of mine to learn new tools, I guess new Druidic tools, towards life. They say you grow a new soul when you learn a new language. There's also a little bit of - oh, what do you call it - reliving the past here, because I know that Frangquist went to Japan right before he came back with a really heavy-duty Druidism. I suspect he went through many of the same things that I'm going there for. He probably had to learn all sorts of new adaptive and creative ways of thinking and doing things, and then he brought these back to Druidism. I hope that Japan will do this for me also.

EH: Good luck with that, and is there anything else you wanted to say, or are we wrapped up?

MS: I would recommend to people that every morning when they wake up, realize what a great opportunity they have here at Carleton. I've been here since 1989, off and on, and though there were probably days when I didn't think about it, hardly a day has gone by when I did not appreciate the opportunity I had here to talk with people. Do not pay too much attention to the classes - most people never look at your grades in any individual class. Take classes that you'd never take, maybe just pick one randomly. Everything you've learned here will be useful somewhere along the way. Try not to take classes just purely for credit purposes, to get a good grade because you already know the stuff. There's opportunity for dawdling in life, don't do it now. Spend as much time as you can talking with people, I don't think the term networking is appropriate, but just understanding different people who are working in different fields who come from different backgrounds as possible, join as many organizations as you can, perhaps in succession, one after the other, until you can understand how they work. Because you'll never have this quality of openness and access to different types of groups and organizations that you have now. Everything after this gets much more difficult to break into the cliques in the organizations.

Here you have an opportunity to explore all the different types of groups that later appear in society, in a raw state, where there are fewer things hidden from you than there will be in the other forms that exist outside of Carleton College. And try to use whatever opportunities are available for you. I mean it's nice to do the minimum amount of work here. But do independent studies, if you can, do independent research. Ask for advice from the professors: don't underestimate this resource. These are people who've made it their life's quest to teach people and to offer them tools of learning. And most of them are delighted to have people ask them for advice. And after you graduate make sure that you contribute, as past alumni have contributed, to others academic search. Provide access for people who are looking for jobs, give them tips, provide money for certain projects that you hear about that you like. Provide services if they ask for them, or offer your services for certain projects of theirs, and help recruit people that you think are useful for Carleton's future. And never finish your studies. Don't think that you've learned it all, because you haven't. And I wish you all the best of luck.

EH: Thank you.

Interview with Irony Sade

Subject: Irony Sade [IS]

Interviewer: Eric Hilleman [EH]

Begin Tape I, Side A

EH: This tape is being recorded for the Carleton Oral History Program. The date is May 11th, 1999. The interviewee in this interview is Irony Sade, a Carleton senior currently. And doing the interviewing is Eric Hilleman. Irony, let's talk a bit about first your own background and anything you want to say about yourself prior to coming to Carleton, and then how you got interested in Carleton and came here.

IS: Alright, I was born in up-state New York, 22 years ago, I suppose. My parents, both professors, one of anthropology, the other biology, and lived between a small town in New York and suburban Chicago back and forth till high school and moved to New York permanently. Came to Carleton, umm, not entirely sure why. It sounded like it was more forgiving of uniqueness than many places, and it was a long way from home, both of which I wanted.

EH: Um, did you visit it before?

IS: I did visit it, once. I'm trying to remember if I was already accepted at that point. I applied early admission, and then didn't actually complete applications for anywhere else. I got into a panic towards the beginning of February and started applying to Cornell just in case, but once Carleton accepted me they apparently told Cornell before they even told me. And I got a letter from them saying, "I'm sorry, you've been accepted somewhere else. We can't handle your application." (chuckle)

EH: Okay, you say forgiving of uniqueness, and that was important to you. Why was it important to you?

IS: Because my high school was not forgiving of uniqueness. And while, I was not willing to conform it meant that I had, perhaps, four friends, over the four years I was there. And that was ok because I kept to myself most of the time, but coming to a new place, I also wanted to be able to be more of who I was without that restriction and without that image in the collective mind of who I already was.

EH: Since this tape is going to talk largely about your relationship to the Carleton Druids, I think I want to ask you about your religious background, if any.

IS: Yeah, (chuckle). (pause) My parents wanted us, my brother and I, to make up our own minds about religion. And as such tried to expose us to everything, but not ever...but wouldn't ever say this is the way that things are. 'Till I was about sixteen I really didn't think about it much, I remember in fourth grade once deciding that since nobody else currently believed in the old Norse gods I would, just because they ought to be believed in, or they might die. (chuckle) But that was never anything serious. I went to a Presbyterian church, my grandmother's church for holidays and on occasion when I felt like it. I was in the choir for a while there, but had no real religious thoughts until I was about sixteen, then I suffered an accident that made me think, and from that point on, started really looking into what Religion was, what God might be, what Truth was, who I was. Just asking all the really big religious questions, and then I started seeking out people who seemed to know and talking to them. Found a prayer group in my high school and joined that, clashed greatly with many of the Christians there, but found a lady who's faith was strong enough, that she would really talk, and she would really answer the hard kinda blunt questions I'd ask. And I learned an awful lot from her, so, I didn't have any...I didn't have any religious training or (pause) I don't know. Experience is the wrong word for it, but I didn't have any background, but I did have thoughts and investigations, I don't know. My family's been religious from way back. My grandfather was a Mullah [spelling?] in Kurdistan and he was the first person on that side of the family to become Christian and passed that onto his son perhaps too strongly. My grandfather used to go to church, sit ramrod straight in the front rows, sing through all the choir pieces, and then turn off his hearing aids when the sermon started. My father, himself, never speaks about religion. Mom was raised pseudo-Catholic, I think, but not really. Very little influence from my family that way, except encouragement to make up my own mind.

EH: Ok, um, have you been satisfied with having chosen Carleton?

IS: Yeah, very much. I agree with Michael ['Mec'] Scharding that it should be required that people take a year off between their sophomore and junior years. But I would definitely come back. I'm sorry to be leaving, but it is getting toward time to go.

EH: Well tell me some things, really anything you want about your Carleton experience, but I'm particularly interested in how you got involved with the Druids. Did you know about the Druids before you came to Carleton?

IS: The person who gave the tour that I came on, over the summer of '95 I guess it was that I came here, mentioned something in passing about the cloak people. And so when I had my sort of interview on campus, I think it was with Dean Govoni, and I asked him, "so who are these cloak people?" And he started laughing and got this "Oh dear, how do I explain this" expression and mentioned that there was a druid group and I looked through the Algol at that point and saw who they were. They looked like neat people, and I think, promptly forgot about it during the intervening summer.

I don't really remember how I actually met the group when I got here. I remember that it was very small, and I remember going to one Druid tea, that Michelle Curtis and Annie had. And I remember being a little bit leery of it, and just kinda, "What's this about?" asking them kinda questions. "What do you mean by these orders? You say that they confer different things. Do they confer what, powers, responsibilities?" You know "what is this about?" And not getting very far with the answers, but I also met Michelle Hajder at some point in there and she'd gotten involved with the Druids. But the first memorable experience with them was a sweat lodge in the lower Arb that was mostly alumni. I don't believe Mec was there but Andrea Davis was. Joe (pause) Banks? I think was and Annie and Michelle both were, Michelle Curtis and Hajder for that matter. Umm, I don't remember how I got involved with it, but that was the one that security busted twice (chuckle).

And oh Rodelt [unclear] rode that story out long ago but that was my first intriguing experience and after that knew I was staying, I guess. By that time also Michelle and I had gotten to be friends and had independently come to the conclusion that the Druids were a neat thing. It was really amazing that a religion had actually started here, if they were going to call it a religion. And that as there were only two people left, both of whom were leaving the next year, and neither of us really wanted to see the group die out, so I can't really speak much for her, but I didn't know much about its history or anything about what I was getting into but decided I didn't want to see it die. So volunteered or ran away slowest I guess and said I would try to organize things next year, and it just sort of accumulated from there.

EH: What about the group appealed to you and made you want to not see it die?

IS: Mmm, innate sympathy for the underdog... I liked the things they talk about, I liked the anything-goes attitude towards questioning but I also saw in it potential for some very serious inquiry into nature and knowledge and what life meant. (pause) I was impressed by the people in it, particularly Andrea, and Mec was around at some point during that first year because he was gone by my second, so I did know him then. (Sigh) I don't really know why beyond that. I'd looked into some of the prayer groups here and had found them interesting but sort of exclusive and the Druids were willing to talk about anything and look into anything and that's what I needed at that point.

EH: Exclusive in terms of just a group of friends who wanted to be in an exclusive group of friends or exclusive in terms of religious orientation?

IS: No, not socially exclusive, for the most part. There was a little bit of that, but I think that is just the nature of groups at Carleton because everything's so intense. But there was a Bible-study group I remember where it was literally that, a Bible-study group. And any other opinions, any other texts, any other readings that you brought in were duly and carefully considered, but (pause) made things acutely uncomfortable I suppose. And I remember at one point asking a lady who shall remain nameless some questions about it and she gave this very piercing look and said, "Have you studied philosophy here?" And I said, "No." Cause I hadn't then, and she said, "Oh, good. You're still pure." and went on with whatever she was talking about. But that made me hesitate towards exploring much that way.

EH: So (pause) Well, I want to get into what Druids did, both early on when you were just getting exposed to them and stuff. One, in what ways they're different than that in the sorts of things that they're talking about as well as just sort of the activities describing what goes on when the Druids get together. Tell me, to start with, about the security-busted sweat lodge.

IS: Okay. That was the only major activity that I saw during that first year here, besides the third order vigil that Michelle and I did. Um, the sweat lodge incident... I don't know the name of the island, or peninsula rather, but the sandbar in the lower Arb, this side of the river but sort of north of the stone pilings, there's a sandy spot in a little dell. Joe Banks and I built the sweat lodge there, I volunteered to help for some reason, and we built fire and somebody brought in saplings and we put up the sweat there and he and I just ended up sitting and talking for, must have been two hours, about a lot of Native American religion that he'd been involved with, about magic of different sorts, about what went on at Carleton, just about life mainly. And we talked about plants and different things and he said what he really wanted were some herbs to throw on the rocks and I said, "Well, what about catnip?" He said "Catnip would be great, do you know where some is?" So I ran off around Lyman and found what I had been told was catnip, turned out later it was lemon balm, which does something entirely different, but is still safe. So brought back a handkerchief full of that. Other people kept showing up and got dark and we were just about ready to strip down and head into the sweat when flashlights and security jumped out of the bushes and said, "What is this?! Who are you? Why are you have fires here? Are you camping? Do you have alcohol?" All three of which are illegal in the lower Arb. And we said yes we had a fire and no we're not camping, we're all ex-Carleton students at least and there's no alcohol at a sweat, that would be a very bad thing. And they took down names and asked that we put out the fire. One of them grabbed a bucket full of river water and was about to dash it onto the fire, [I] was trying to explain to him that throwing the bucket of water on red-hot stones was probably not the wisest course of action, and he wasn't listening, and Joe Banks said, "Sir, this is a religious ceremony. Would you let us put out the fire our way please?" And he was instantly, "Oh. Okay. Yeah that's fine." And I really, I don't know, really respected that somehow, a way of problem-solving I hadn't thought of. So Joe raked the rocks out of the fire, and then poured the water all over the coals and the wood and the ashes, and intoned some circle breaking charm and security told us not to do that again and left. Now we all took off our clothes, put the rocks in the lodge and had the sweat. (chuckle) Since we hadn't gotten the rocks wet. I had no idea how long the sweat lasted, but it was really dark and really cold when we came out. And I guess Mec must have been at that one, because he then lead a whole group of people down into the river to cool off for some reason. I was freezing as soon as I got out, so half the folks ran down to the river, and they other half grabbed whatever they could to wear, and I went and poked up the fire again because I was freezing. So the rest of us sort of clustered around the fire and then everybody else came up out of the river and we passed around soft mead and things and just general decompressing after the sweat and then decided it was time to go home. Took apart the lodge, and I started trying to put out the fire, and since there was a river there, I would grab one log, and heave it into the river. And it would spin through the air in flame and go down in hiss and security came running out of the bushes, stormed into the middle of the place, said, "Who has the fireworks?!" And everybody just sort of stared at them, tried to figure out what they meant and they were mad at us again for having the fire a second time and sort of ordered us all to leave, which was okay cause we were done by then. Made sure to put out the rest of the fire less dramatically, but that was definitely memorable. I continually wonder what would have happened if they'd come back either five minutes earlier or later, either of those times found a dozen naked people sitting in a tent. (chuckle) I don't know. (pause) I did learn from that though for any future Druids reading this to make friends with security. Ask them, or at least keep them informed of some of your activities so that they are less likely to break them up.

EH: You mentioned your third order vigil, that was in your first year?

IS: That was my first year. That was um...Belting [?] night. The night of May 1st and of the spring concert and Michelle Hajder and I both vigiled then because... well Mec said that he didn't like third order vigils in the first year. I meant, no, Annie and Michelle Curtis, 'Michelle the Dark' he calls her, were both leaving and he wanted there to be some third orders left. So Michelle and I both vigiled that night, and it rained. Michelle had a fire vigil, and I did, uh, a walking vigil, the first one after Mec's I guess. And it rained all night.

EH: What's a walking vigil?

IS: A walking vigil is just like the fire vigil but you don't stay in one place, you walk out into the Arb after dark and stay awake and stay walking and just listen to world and listen to the woods and see what you learn. See the sorts of things that crawl out of your head, and see the sorts of entities that come out of the woods. And there's something about vigil nights that's just different. I don't know if things come out then that don't normally or it's just that people don't generally sit down and think for ten hours straight, or walk and think for ten hours straight. But, you learn a lot. I haven't, I don't know, I don't know what the fire vigil was like, I didn't do that then. I've done some since, but I think any vigil I do now is colored by the experience of that one.

EH: So it did what it was supposed to do to you, basically marked a watershed.

IS: It does. It marks a beginning, and it tests your commitment and it teaches you a lot. We've since picked up on that aspect and... well, because so much made sense during and immediately after my vigil and Michelle's, that we couldn't remember later and can't express now, because so much was lost in transition with nobody to tell it to, what we've started doing now is after people vigil they come back to the circle and talk, tell people what they've learned, or ask questions so that whatever they've learned is shared and spread and doesn't dissipate so quickly.

EH: So organizationally at that point, the Carleton Druids were down to very few people who were about to leave except for...

IS: except for Michelle and I...

EH: you and Michelle.

IS: Yeah, Michelle Curtis and Graham were the only two active druids still enrolled. Mec and Andrea were still active, but Andrea was in the cities, and I have no idea where Mec was at that point, except that he occasionally showed up. Michelle had become a second order druid sometime earlier in the year. I actually was never a first or second order druid, and they discovered this as they were trying to ordain me third. They went, "Wait!" And did some serious ad-libbing there and figured it would be okay. But organizationally the sweat happened because the alumni organized it, the vigils happened... I don't entirely know why because we wanted it they just happened. Other than that, weekly teas did happen then and (pause) granted I was not as involved with the group then, but I don't remember that anything else happened.

EH: The Tea's held outside somewhere in the natural Druid setting, or were they in a building?

IS: Depending. Um, then, the first one was in Ann's [?] room on third Goodhue. I remember another one being in Goodhue lounge. I remember one being held in the dining hall, but I don't actually remember any being held outdoors then. During my second year we started holding them in the Japanese garden when it was warm enough, and that went over really well, except that people had to keep running back and forth for water.

EH: So what do you do at them besides drink tea?...

IS: Drink tea...

EH: Is there discussion?

IS: There is discussion. Um, the better organized ones actually have discussion topics announced beforehand so people can bring in writings or ideas or whatever. We've done craft workshops where people built dreamcatchers or carved pumpkins or different things, just generally druidic in some sense. The ones I think are best are ones where we've just started with a question and given people a couple of days to think about it and then had them show up and talk about it. And gotten into some of the best conversations I've had at those. Generally the format is there's not a discussion leader, just sort of an organizer, there's a table full of hot water and the tea collection, however much of it happens to be there. And sometimes somebody will bring cookies or bread or whatever and people just sit down and drink tea and talk and some of the discussions are kind of guided and can go on for two, three hours, some of them. People drift in and out, but that's the general format.

EH: Is it the sort of thing that's sponsored by the druid organization but open to anybody who wants to come and therefore you also even, you get a lot of people who don't, aren't identifying themselves as part of the Carleton Druids or is it mostly people who you consider part of the Carleton Druids who come. Or is that...

IS: Mmm, most of the above (chuckle) I lost the logic train in there somewhere, but, um, we've advertised for some of the teas in the NNB and we usually do that more heavily toward the beginning of the year, but after a while it settles down to a core group that come back. And generally after a while, all of those do identify themselves as Druids, even if that's not always the case. Um, for instance, just this past weekend, one lady that's come to just about every tea this year, finally decided that she really was a Druid. The ones to which people outside the Druid group come have been the best and the worse because you get a sudden influx of new personalities and new perspectives, but you also get people who come in and sit there uncomfortably and make the whole group uncomfortable. We had one of those last week. What happens after a while is we generally stop advertising because we forget or get lazy, and every now and then we advertise a new one if there's a especially interesting topic going up. And then some people come, generally if folks don't come in the first two weeks of a term, they're not going to it seems, but people do invite their friends and bring in people from out of town and just interesting characters they've met that they think would be interested. And that continues to happen throughout the term and provides some of the growth in membership. I was going to say something... (pause) Yeah, one of the other things that happens at Tea a lot is just organizational stuff. There's a lot of sitting down, "So, what do you guys want to do this term? We've got two full moons, we've got... Samhain, we've got this... Two people want a sweat lodge, etc." And ideas are generated and dates are marked down and on good days responsibility is delegated and then things happen from there.

EH: Would you typically at a gathering like a Tea have ritual at all?

IS: Not typically, but sometimes yes. Uh, more so in the past I would say. The Druids this year are more social than spiritual on group level. Individually, I would say they were more spiritual than most people I've known in the past, but they are so in such different directions that one led ritual at Tea would generally make somebody uncomfortable. We did a Tea somewhat toward the end of last term, this would be winter, where we talked about some basic magical skills, like raising a circle, grounding, putting a quick personal shield if stuff goes wrong, and passed energy around, and taught people how to do these things, just so that they would know. From that has come the energy experiments, which are apparently a recurring phenomena that crop up every eight years or so according to the some of the people that have been around longer, but are either on a hiatus or on their way out right now, not sure, which where we design experiments regarding what is this energy stuff we keep talking about, if I charged ten marbles out of twenty can you tell me which ones they are? Things like that. And results that we have gotten so far have been statistically ambiguous and, but personally meaningful. Like even if someone looks at the chart of results, and says, "Well, the numbers don't tell me anything." They can still go, "But I really felt something when I picked up this rock, but I didn't when I touched any of the others. So I personally think there's something there, even if the numbers don't show it." Tend to get a lot of that on the individual level, but nothing that you could present to a review board and say, see, there really is something here.

EH: You're saying teaching people some of the basic rudiments of magic, etc. How did anyone in the group learn them?

IS: Different places, and surprisingly different places. We started talking about Grounding at one point - my vocabulary for this tends to come a pseudo-Wiccan background, just because that was the first system I encountered that had a vocabulary for magic. But when we started talking about Grounding and Centering some of the people who had done Aikido before said, "Hey! I've done this, I don't know the words you're using, but this is exactly what we do, what we mean, when talk about Chi flow, when we talk about you know extending toward, extending your energy toward the attacker." Or a person who'd done something in a Quaker circle, understood exactly what was going on, and had a different vocabulary for it. I call it magic, because I haven't really anything else to call it, just like I call, whatever it is, God, because I haven't anything else to call it, but I don't attach to either of those words any of the systems that have been attached to them. I use them because they work and they are there. And making up a new vocabulary for them would only breed confusion, not that this doesn't.

EH: So what was your exposure to Wicca, since that was the vocabulary that you...

IS: Mmm, a couple of books in high school, a couple of people early on here... It's not something I've pursued, but it's something that gave me a very valuable point of reference for the experiences that started happening once I was in Druidism. Once I started doing things with the group and really paying attention to what was going on, I get...

End Tape I, Side A

EH: Ok it's recording

IS: I guess I starting looking into Wicca about the same time I started going to the Christian prayer group because after the accident when I was sixteen I just expanded, I wanted to, I wanted to know. I'd run across a set of questions that I had never of asking before, and every time that I've done that, it's just opened up a domain and a world I didn't know existed, and I looked into it every way I could. I didn't pursue Wicca very far because I didn't find it (pause) I don't find ritual as personally meaningful as I do, unstructured experience and what one might call philosophy. But the vocabulary that surrounds the ritual, becomes very useful for making sense of experience later on. So the vocabulary of Circle-Raising helps me make sense of what it is that I do when I'm uncomfortable or about to do something magical that might attract attention is I raise a circle and that could be the walls of the room I'm in, it could be if I'm in the stone circle it could be that, it just, it's something to provide a sacred space, to provide some element of shelter and protection. The vocabulary of the eternal rebirth of the god in Wicca, as opposed to the eternal existence of the goddess makes wonderful sense of the Celtic holidays, and the cycle of the year, even though Samhain isn't technically in any Celtic sense when the god dies, but if you overlay those two systems it makes both of them much clearer.

EH: Okay... Let's do some basic Carleton organization history here. Umm, at the end of your first year, you and Michelle had been ordained as... consecrated into the third order, whatever the word is...

IS: Yes, consecrated....

EH: Alright, and you were the only ones, essentially that are, there to start it up again next year. What did you do to have a group?

IS: Came back fall term sophomore year and found a package from Mec in my mailbox, that included maps of the Arb, included some of the old rituals. I don't believe yet included the anthology... yes, yes it might have had the anthology at that point. Now it had a note saying, "Go to Mark Heiman's and pick up you a copy of the anthology, which was immensely valuable to me. It also had a note saying, "check out the Hill of Three Oaks, go look behind it." And I went up and looked behind the hill, and oh my! there was a stone circle that hadn't been there before. There was a couple making out in it, so I didn't go and investigate just then, but that became a very special place to us, and to a lot of people. Organizationally, a lot of what happened during that first year was trying to get our feet under us. Michelle and I felt like we'd been dropped into things. We hadn't had the group dropped on us because we had asked for it, but suddenly we were supposed to be in charge of something we didn't understand and felt like we had very little guidance. Mec was gone, Michelle Curtis and Ann were gone, Andrea was around that year and proved invaluable. She would come down from the cities on several occasions, both to Teas and to rituals and that helped a lot. Michelle and I were both living in Faculty Club at the time, so Teas were either in the lounge there or in the Japanese garden. And there was a lot of, "So...what do we do?" There was a lot of philosophy that year. A lot of talking about different things, and a lot of trying different things. And we found somebody who was a Reiki practitioner and asked him to come down and teach us and he did that. We came across Carlos Gonzales, maybe?, used to be on the alumni board, he's a Native American, he's a western doctor, but he's also a Native American, and he works with both systems, so we invited him down and he came and talked with us for a while. That was I think our first main event then was Samhain. [?] We've always celebrated Samhain and Beltane. They've always been the most powerful and the most well attended holidays that we've had. Close to thirty people came to that one, that first year, and we made a talking stick and passed it around. A lot of stories came out. Talking stick...

EH: Tell us.

IS: A talking stick is something Andrea told us about and maybe is a stick of some significance and some inherent power, I guess. We find a stick that volunteers, I found this one in Utah. It was a well traveled talking stick. You decorate it with different things that can provoke stories and memory and then you give it to people. And it's really fun to give it to people without telling them what it is, because what happens is you hold the stick, you stick it in the ground, and it washes stories out of you. I don't ... You can describe it any of a different ways. I've heard it describe that it sucks energy from the Earth, and washes up through you and pulls out of you stories that are already there, pulls out of the Earth stories that are there and makes you speak them, I don't know. But if you give it to somebody and have them stick it in the ground, they'll just start talking. And sometimes it's just silly stories, and sometimes it's profound. It's people coming out for the first time. It's people saying good-bye to family members who've been dead for most of a decade. Just stories associated with that. There was a lot of that at the first Samhain - I'm going to pronounce it seventeen different ways, because I've never gotten it clear. But after that we had a sweat. We had several sweats my sophomore year which was good because at the end of that, the people who know how to lead them were all gone and... Actually at the end of the sophomore year I was gone too, but we'll get to that in a while.

Sophomore year was really... was really good. It was really powerful, and felt like things were on the upswing in terms of where the group was going. During that year, we got a lot of little things figured out, like, where does the mail addressed to the Druids actually end up, and who do you have talk to make sure it ends up in the right place. Where are the different spots in the Arb that it's safe to have fires. How do you do a mailing list. How do you contact folks in the cities. Where are all these bookshelves that people keep talking about. What does it actually mean to hold a ritual. A lot of nuts and bolts things like that, a lot of experiential learning. A lot of, "Shoot. I don't know what I'm doing, what do you want me to... How do you... How am I supposed to lead?" A lot of just getting up and doing it. And discovered much later a fair amount of learning what the elements of ritual were, not in any academic sense, not in any, you know, Redown [?] the Wiccan ritual that has thirteen different elements, all of which have to be there. Not that, but just doing rituals from different places, designing rituals based on other things, seeing what worked and what didn't, and then suddenly realizing that secular weddings have the same format as, you know, pick your random pagan event. And that once people started designing rituals without knowing how rituals worked, if you leave out certain elements, it suddenly doesn't work. That they have to have a beginning and an end. Those don't necessarily have to follow one after the other, but there has to be closure, there has to be purpose. If you do a ritual without a reason behind it, not a rational reason, just “I’m doing this for... or I’m doing this because..” If you’re lacking that it falls apart. If you’re lacking some emotional investment it falls apart. It’s little things like that that I suppose could be studied, but at least in my case, had to be picked up, gradually.

I guess through my second and third year here, I felt mostly like what I was doing with the Druids, was just gathering in, was just stabilizing, was trying to find my own feet and find out how things work, so that then, this year, I could pass on to the next generation of Druids something that they would be able to build on, that they wouldn’t have to start from scratch again. I think, had Mec’s anthology ... had the anthology not come about then, we would have been very lost. Had Andrea not been around, we would have been very lost. And I don’t know what would have happened without those two. Which is very interesting, because they never got along from what I could tell. They had very different approaches and very different perspectives. Grated with each other on more than one occasion.

EH: Has the terminology of having an Archdruid maintained itself at Carleton in recent years or...

IS: Yes, Michelle and I considered the two of us together, the Archdruid, singular. And that worked for a year. I think it’s good to have more than one person, whether you call them Archdruids or whether collectively the people who get things done are the Archdruid, I don’t know if that makes much of a difference. But it’s been a functional thing. The people who organize and made things happen and got things done were the Archdruids or Druid. I guess technically they are supposed to be Third-Order. I don’t know, if you buy the functional definition and that’s not necessary, but I think that, I personally think that some commitment of the person involved is required for a good Archdruid. That if it’s just social and just organization I don’t that it works entirely well. That argues in favor of having them be Third-Order. On the other hand, there’s David Coil, who I consider an honorary Archdruid. He’s been there through the whole past four years, he’s been more reliable than any other single person in the grove. And yet for the longest time, he didn’t consider himself a Druid, he just showed up to help, and to say actually what if you do things this way, this might work better. Or to volunteer to get firewood, things like that. And, yeah, so yes the terminology has maintained itself. Going into next year, it looks like there are five different people, none of whom could or would lead by themselves, but all of which together might make up, the Archdruid?

EH: Ok, is it time to interject your own personal history about your year off?

IS: My year off? Well, I can skim much of that, if you want. I didn’t come back fall of my junior year. I went to Germany, somewhere in the middle of the summer and learned a great deal there, had a lot of very profound Druidic experiences, mostly took the time to sit back and digest and figure out what I had learned at Carleton. Because I knew if I kept piling more on top, I’d start forgetting it all. And I needed to sit still and watch things settle out and figure out what of it was important and what of it was distracting. And one of the things I realized in there was that I needed to get to know my own family, my father and my brothers specifically. But another thing I realized was that the Druids were profoundly important to me, as an existing group, as a historical group, as a personal way of living. That none of those things, were ones that I was willing to give up. I went to England after I left Germany, and tried to find some of the old Druids, which was quite the experience by itself. If you break things down into the Paleo-Druids, the Meso- Druids, and the Neo-Druids, I would say I didn’t find any Paleo-Druids, and I wasn’t looking for Meso-Druids, but I did find Druids as it were. People who exemplified that which Druidism teaches. who did have some profound spiritual connection that I had only grazed, and I learned an immense amount from them.

EH: These people who call themselves Druids? or people that you just recognize as...

IS: People I recognized as Druidic. I could have easily have found people who call themselves Druids, but that wasn’t what I was after. I spent some time in Glastonbury, and something that came very clear there was that there was a difference (pause) that I still have trouble articulating. Glastonbury is a town on several different levels: There are the people who live there. There’s the history of the site itself, which is impressive. And then there’s this sort-of overlay of New-Age-ness, and I hate the term, New-Age, but it describes it better than anything else. And there’s a whole set of people who are there because it’s a New-Age center. And yet it’s also a place that really does have some significance. And coming down off the Tor, I spent the night there. Coming down off the tour, seeing in the eyes of the people who lived there, the same expression regarding me, as that they regarded the people who were there because it was New-Age center. Realized that there was a difference between the way I was searching what I was searching for, then just, “Ohh, crystals. This is neat.” And realized too that that difference wasn’t showing, and that if I was going to maintain there really was a difference, I’d better figure out what it was, and how to make sure it came through. So after that I was not looking for people who called themselves Druids, but I was looking for people who had an integrity and a commitment and a depth that names don’t. And I did find some.

EH: How do you look?

IS: That’s a hard question. [Pause]

EH: How did you find who you found?

IS: By asking questions. By finding...people nets, I guess. I have an aunt in England who’s lived there for, lived in the same house twenty-three years and seems to know everybody and asked her. You know, told her what I was up to and what I was looking for and asked for where would be a good place to look and she said, “Well, go to this commune and go talk to this lady in Glastonbury and see what they say.” Discovered later that, she had said that the commune was a place that one could find real Druids. I misinterpreted that at the time, I thought that meant there were real Druids there and I would find them. What it really meant was that it was a sort of testing ground, and that people would go there and be watched by the people who owned the commune, owned it and ran it, the family that lived there. And then if they decided that these people really were looking, and really were honest about what they were up to and people they wanted to be in the know, then they would talk to you and move you along farther to tell you where real Druids were. I didn’t get that ‘til afterwards. I didn’t, I left a little confused because I’d expected one thing and hadn’t found it and then realized later what had been going on...was quite impressed at how well it worked. The lady in Glastonbury, turned out just was one, that she had known. It was funny. She was very hesitant sending me to her because my aunt herself thought that this person was a witch and not in a good sense, that she had done horrible things to her daughters, not on purpose, just by having a very chaotic persona and energy base. My aunt’s vocabulary is very yogic, which isn’t one I’m familiar with so I'm translating things a little bit here. But going and talking with her I found, and maybe this is part of how you search, I found her one of the most genuinely insightful people I'd ever met. That after talking to her for five minutes, having never met her before, she was able to see things about me that my own parents couldn't. That people I'd known for years had no clue of. She could just look inside and go, "Oh, well, you're doing this." And it wasn't psychologizing and it wasn't mind reading. It was just genuine insight. And it was that, and an honesty about her that I really respected, and it was just a great wealth of experience and personal depth that set her apart from other people I had met who had the talk I guess but their lives didn't bear out the things they spoke of that one fellow I met who did right Chi, who could talk your ear off about healing energy and you know, "Oh, you've got...you've got these great streamers out of your hills and different things" and definitely sounded like he knew what he was talking about and his own life wasn't one in which healing seemed to have happened. And that incongruity made me very uncomfortable working with him. I cannot...I don't know, I'm in no position to judge and I can't say he didn't have anything, he wasn't real, I can't say that. But there was something unsettling....there was something discordant about it that didn't quite fit. [Pause] Anyway, that was part of my travels. Unless you have questions there.

EH: So, when you returned to Carleton, um, this time had helped you bring new things to....back to the Carleton Druids?

IS: It did. Um, after I left England I went home for two or three months and then I went on Sea semester and had a completely different kind of learning there and both of those brought more back to Carleton in my person than I had left with. But I think that they were growing experiences for me rather than the Druid group. When I got back most of the group was gone and Michelle had been in charge during that time and we kept corresponding and at one point she wanted to disband the Druids entirely and I didn't think that was right. I didn't think any one person had the right to disband a group that had been in existence longer than they had because they personally weren't working out with it. Or because people weren't taking it seriously or because it seemed nothing but a joke.

EH: Those were the reasons that...

IS: Those, if I recall, were her reasons for wanting to disband. She talks about fall and winter as the year of amnesia. They had Samhain. It went over pretty well. They did a lot of Tarot reading and stuff. Most of...I don't know, the old Druids, the old guard I guess, disappeared during that time. There were a lot of people who were around my sophomore year who were no longer there when I came back spring of my junior year and they are still at Carleton but they're no longer with the Druids. I don't know why. I don't know what happened at the end and Michelle might be the only person who does. [Pause] I forgot where I was going with that.

EH: Well, you were talking about you and Michelle having communicated and seeing that issue differently.

IS: I don't know how she managed things. Um, Andrea had worried when she heard I was leaving because she said there were three elements that were needed to lead the Druids and those were some very good organizational capabilities, some very good ideas, generations, creativities, and some personal charisma, and that those didn't all need to be embodied in one person, but if you were missing any of them in the people in charge the group would fall apart. And she worried that among the people left, there was not the element of charisma she thought I had. Um, I don't know if that was the case. I don't like to think that [pause] charisma, if I have any, is a motivating factor in the growth of the Druid group. But during the times I've been here it's grown significantly and when I was gone it didn't. That bothers me. [chuckle] I don't, I don't want to have followers that...anyway, came back [sigh] this will be the last spring already. Picked up a lot there um, I started leading sweat lodges at that point for the first time, and that was peculiar. No, that wasn't the first time. I led the spring previous, I forgot about that. But then um....oh, we skipped a whole bunch. We skipped the circle.

EH: Tell me about the circle.

IS: Wanna do that? Ok...

EH: Tell me everything, or whatever you want to.

IS: Yeah, ok. [pause] Whoo. Can I get a glass of water?

EH: Sure. Take a break for a minute.

IS: Yeah, ok. When I got back my sophomore year there was a note in my mailbox telling me to look behind the Hill of Three Oaks. That was when I found the first stone circle and [pause] loved the place. Everyone did. There was a maze in the ground next to it at that point that faded over the rest of the year but...even that next spring, if you looked right at sunset you could still see depressions in the ground where people had walked. We used to have music gatherings out there, there were a couple of harpers, there was a lot of whistle players and singers and we had a drummer or two and we would just show up out there and play. People would do their homework out there, we had dancing, I stayed out there one night to watch a lunar eclipse. Turned cloudy all night but, stayed out there anyway. Was this really really wonderful place. Somewhat toward the end of winter term, was wandering out there one night and came across the circle and found that somebody had thrown the stones down, all the other stones, and was furious, and tried to pick them up but they were frozen to the ground. Running out?

EH: Yeah, we're running out.

IS: Ok.

EH: If you wanna hold your thought right there I will change tapes.

IS: Ok.

[End of Tape 1, Side Two. Start Tape 2, Side One]

IS: We found the, the outer twelve stones down and, which was is furious. Came storming back down to Goodhue to see if anybody knew anything or if anyone would help me put them back and they were having a....I forget who I ran into but they were having a dinner then wouldn't come help and [sigh] so they'd come up in the morning. For some reason I thought it was important to get them back up before the sun rose, so I went to talked to another friend of mine who was visiting and he said he would help in the morning. I don't remember the rest of that night that I got out there, maybe five in the morning and waited and waited and waited and nobody came so finally put the rest of the stones back up myself and paid for it for the next week or two [laugh] but managed. I was just really upset because I hadn't been able to get them up quite right and it wasn't the same after that. Then, somewhat later, maybe it was end of spring term already, Michelle and I were out wandering in the Arb together and came across the circle and found everything down, including the center stone, which hadn't been moved the first time and were furious again and went and talked to some people who were partying on the Hill of Three Oaks and asked them if they knew anything about it and they didn't. So, the two of us together were able to move anything except the center, and neither of us could move that. Both of us together couldn't move that, so we went and found Dave Coil and his roommate and Dave, Jared, and I, together, managed to roll the center stone back into place. I don't think I thought of doing anything about it then. Somebody wrote nasty editorials to the Carletonian about it and uh, everybody was upset but nothing much happened. Then later on, getting toward Beltane we were trying to find a place to hold Beltane because the Spring Concert was happening at the same time and the Hill of Three Oaks and the circle where, we'd wanna get, weren't going to work. So I'd suggested Three Bird Grove, which seemed like a nice place. Some of the older Druids weren't comfortable with that because they'd had bad experiences with that part of the upper Arb. There was...either there was or at least there was a story of something called BOB, which stood for Big Obsidian Ball that I've never encountered and have sought, have looked for but have never run into so I don't know what credit to give this story, but if you want I'll tell it.

EH: Sure.

IS: Ok. The stories I remember. Pagan group in town was anonymously given a black obsidian ball about the size of a small fishbowl which must have cost a fortune, was just given to them anonymously. Well I thought this was really neat, until I started noticing that whoever's house it resided in, that [pause] whoever it was living with would start having random accidents. They would just drop dishes all of a sudden for no particular reason, they would cut themselves on knives, they would twist their ankles on their own stairs, just, I mean, nothing...nothing manifest, just general unpleasantness and bad luck and sort of like they had an anti-browning [?] going around. So they would give it to someone else and they would have the same thing and they would give to someone else and they would have the same thing and finally they decided they'd just better get rid of it. I don't know if they tried magic or exorcisms or anything on it first but eventually, to get rid of it, they went up one night and buried in the Arb. Uh, [laugh] I don't know if that was to ground it or to just make it go away or what but immediately after that several other people, I don't know, sensitive people at Carleton started running into this thing in the Arb that...that just, they would be walking perfectly fine through the path and all of a sudden just get totally terrified and feel and presence and leave. And this happened over and over again, different people, um, Andrea was one, Eric Stewart if I remember, mentioned something about it...that he might, my memory might be wrong there, so, someone would have to ask him. But anyways, Three Bird Grove, where I suggested having Beltane was one of the places where this had been encountered and Andrea at least thought it would be very bad idea to have Beltane there if BOB was around so I said I'd look and went up and spent the night there. Left a candle out and issued an open invitation for whatever was around to come talk to me and waited and waited and waited. I wasn't, somebody got the idea I was going out to duel with BOB and I got very worried. [laugh] I just, I just wanted to talk to find out if there was anything there and if so, what it was up to. Just an offer to be friendly with it. Nothing came, so around, I don't know, one or two, I left and started wandering about and [pause] all the times I've gotten into some other state I haven't realized it until afterwards. But I realized later that I had...that there was something akin to vigiling there where it wasn't just myself walking around for awhile. But I showed up, I came in from behind the hill toward the circle. And everything was fine, except the center stone, and that was down. Found out later everything had been down and Wade Davis had come out and fixed everything he could but he couldn't move the center stone either so, this is the second time it had been down and the third time the circle had been vandalized, not counting broken glass and things, which, was annoying but hey. Wasn't mad anymore, was just profoundly saddened somehow and, without really thinking about it bent down, picked up the center stone, and put it back. And then stood there in shock, wait a minute, I can't lift that. [laugh]

Next morning I skipped class and wrote a letter to Mr. Lewis, the president and, might have the letter somewhere still but, said I don't know if you're aware of it but there's a circle out in the Arb that's a very meaningful place to a lot of folks. It's um, about the closest to a holy site on campus since the chapel's used for classroom sometimes and stuff, and it's just, people have really gotten a lot out of it, and found it important, and it's been vandalized three times in the past ten weeks. And, with your permission, I'd to create something more permanent. Said I'd find the rocks, I'd organize the labor, I'd orchestrate the whole process, all I wanted was his permission, if I could pull it off to build something more lasting along those lines. Well, this got bounced to Dean Govoni, and then it got bounced to...uh...Dennis Easley, and then it got bounced to the chapel, and then it got bounced back to Dean. And the upshot was, this was a very peculiar request, they didn't know what to do with it, but it wasn't against any rules. And if I could find a place with the Arb directors, that they would agree have become a permanent site in the Arb, and if I could find somebody to pay for it and all the other stuff I've mentioned, then yeah, that was ok. I didn't wanna just build it, because I guess I wanted official sanction. This has been a quiet trend through these four years that apparently Max started of getting the Druids more and more official recognition. But I wanted something officially sanctioned so that if it were vandalized, it would be an attack on the College, not just an attack on a random ring of stones. And, the intern chaplain Lisa Ebert, was leaving in four weeks and had a standing budget she could do whatever she wanted with so she said sure, and Dennis found a guy to help move the stones and Mark and Miles said Three Bird Grove was ok and, which is, about two weeks from letter to full circle. It was there, all of a sudden. And, I don't know, I was wandering around, just totally amazed and Michelle and Amanda were both teasing me saying I was acting like a new father or something 'cause I couldn't believe it had happened. I don't know if anybody ever thought it would. I know Michelle didn't. I don't know if I was even asking that question at the time, it was just like, I want this, and, it's just there. We went out and, you know, with sticks and twine and marked out where it could be and picked out what stones we wanted where and set them all into the ground so that they couldn't just be toppled over. It's just all of a sudden there. Transplanted trees to make way for it and cover up some of the tracks. One of the stipulations was that we buried the fire pit so that there wouldn't be any fires there, 'cause they were getting nervous about that. And we did that. There've been two fires that I know of since, but, those have not been officially sanctioned and one of them was interrupted, which is another story. But uh, yeah. That was really peculiar because it, it went up maybe eighth week of my sophomore spring term and then I was gone until the next spring and didn't see it for a year. [laugh]

EH: It's used? It's stayed...it's staying successful? Is it a place of power?

IS: It has accumulated more and more power over the years apparently. We did a charging ritual, we danced a pinnacle dance in the first full moon that it was standing after giving it time to establish itself. When, uh, we first set it up there was a lot of...sort of disconcerted opposition to it, a lot of "How dare the Druids create such a thing without asking us first" from random people. "You know, the old circle is a public spot. You're making a Druidic spot, you can't do that." That was not the intention. It was supposed to be a place of peace and power for anyone who'd respect it and open to everyone. I've tried to make sure it stayed that way. There was some opposition because Three Bird Grove was somebody's favorite sunbathing area, and they thought with, uh, a site there that they wouldn't have that privacy, which I suppose is true, but, I didn't know about that. [laugh]

Very soon after both of their appearances.

EH: Is the old circle still there at all?

IS: No, the old circle...at the site of the old circle was where I wanted to build the new one and at this point even though they hadn't really started publicizing it, plans for the Recreation Center were already underway, and they knew they were going to level that field and said anything that was built there would be very temporary and I wanted something more lasting. I also wanted something farther away from partying sites I guess because, while we never tried to find out who vandalized it, the assumption was that it was random groups of drunken folks who wanted to see if they could push the stones around. The current stones weigh in around two and a quarter tons for the most immediately pushable and are farther away from where people are likely to be so I'm less worried about it here. But, four of the stones from the original circle are incorporated into this one. The current south stone was the old center stone. The three stones supporting the center stone were the three largest of the old ring. I didn't want a new circle, I didn't want to create something new, I just wanted to create something lasting, and wanted as much continuity as possible between the two so that...we brought them. It's interesting seeing the people that it's become important to. I never wanted it to be just Druids and it hasn't been that. I ran into a faculty spouse this past Beltane that solved one minor mystery. For most of this year I've heard from different people that while they've been studying in the circle, this old guy, this old bearded guy, would just show up all of a sudden, walk into the circle, go around slowly touching every stone and leave without saying anything. And someone thought it was Mec, and I said no, he's in Japan, and somebody thought it was Mark Heiman, and I said no, I don't think so. Ran into him, over Beltane and uh, I forget who his wife is, I think she teaches in the art department, but he himself is Greek and for him, there are twelve gods, and there are twelve stones in the circle. And he just found it the neatest thing, that there was this, this shrine he could use, already there, that was non, non-denominational isn't the word, but...open, I guess. And I know there are people from town that come up there, I mean even kids from high school that come up when they're having a bad day, they just come up to sit. To have it be something peaceful. [pause] I'm jumping topics I'm afraid. [laugh] You asked if we charged it, did you, or something? I don't know.

EH: About the circle?

IS: Yeah.

EH: I had just asked if it had become a place of power.

IS: Yeah, definitely. It's full of personality too, which is a little disconcerting. [laugh]

EH: In what ways?

IS: Why? Because if it's developed a personality, I don't know, this is going into either metaphysical or magical speculation, depending. There's a personality now attached to the circle. It could be something that was already at that spot that is now being noticed because there are people there more often or has grown because there's power there now, don't know. It could be something that grew there because the circle is there and people focus energies on it. It could be some other entity that just showed up and....

EH: Wow.

IS: If it's BOB he's not like the BOB I remember hearing about. I don't think it is. Um, were I Christian I would say it's an angel, but I'm not. I've run into it on a number of occasions when I was doing someone's Second Order vigil. I realized at one point that while I was speaking it wasn't me anymore. I wasn't in control of the words, that there was something standing through me, guiding the action and, to the people across from me they say I grew ten feet. It wasn't me at all that they were talking to and it remained something else, someone else until I left the circle and turned human again. Other people have talked to it, have met it, have felt it. There's one girl now who was in the little grove and was just listening. I think Mec and I were talking and suddenly went, "Oh, something from the circle just showed up." That she recognizes it on that level, that it's a distinct personality, it's not just a feeling. But I, I'm curious about it because it'll be here longer than any student at Carleton, than any individual person in the Druid group, and it does interact with people and I just wonder...I feel kind of responsible for it. I don't know if that's kind of silly but I built the circle so [laugh] it made them alive[?] too. I wonder what I've introduced. I wonder what effect it's going to have since it can communicate with people and does. So far it's acted as a sort of comforter and spiritual teacher I guess. It's selected different people out to do different things and it said, you know, have this vigil, clear this path, do this thing. It could guard people, I mean it does, but it could do that on a larger level. It could be a continuous presence. I don't know. The way one person put it, it can manipulate people if it chooses, and it will be here longer than any of you. I've seen no indication that it does or that it will do that, but it's, it's at least in some sense an unknown. [pause] I think it's safe. I've seen only good there so far.

EH: Is there anything else you want to say about um, after you got back from being gone, revived somewhat I take it and things that have happened in that period.

IS: Um, the main growth revival happened this fall, but some significant things did happen last spring. One was that while I was gone the circle was kind of vandalized. It was a much classier vandalism so it wasn't something that produced such a strong reaction. While I was in Germany at one point somebody very carefully stenciled with spray paint a face on the south, on the north stone that is...was either John Lennon, Albert Einstein, or me, depending on who you ask. It was a sharp-nosed, long haired guy with glasses and different people thought it was different folks. Somebody thought I did it, but I told them I was sort of off the continent at the time. Anyway, it was really well done and it stayed there even though people probably could have gotten it off because for some, it was a representation of the god, that it was in the right place, it was just there when they came to the circle. Yeah, it was incongruous but it was okay. A little bit of iconography. So when I came back in the spring I studied and thought about it for awhile and I left it and left it and didn't have an immediate reaction one way or another, is this okay, isn't it, 'til I don't know what finally changed but talking to several other people we decided it might be better off gone, that if we left it we could encourage other graffiti and in itself didn't quite feel right. So, got the college's help again, which is one of the reasons I was...tried to have it be an official place. Got Glen from the paint shop to put together some gunk and spent some quality time with a wire brush getting it off. Couldn't quite manage it by myself but he got, he came back later and finished up with some other stuff.

But then that spring too, were the two times that people have built fires in the circle. They built them on the center stone and left...had a drinking party and left a horrible mess. And the first time I just found it afterwards and cleaned up as best I could. Second time was another one of those peculiar otherworldly things, I guess. Ginger Wild and I were out walking and thought we'd swing by the circle one night to see what was going on and saw that folks had built a fire there. So we walked in and, you have to get Ginger's side of the story too 'cause it's much more elaborate [chuckle]. Went in and asked them what they were up to and explained that fires were not allowed in this part of the Arb, that there were too many fields, it was too close to residential area, danger of it spreading was too great and you'll damage the rock if you put it there [chuckle]. They had it built right on top of the table. Told them if they wanted I would show them where it was okay to have a fire but that we had to put this one out, and asked if there was anybody with shoes around that would help me stomp the thing out, and nobody moved. Nobody had moved since I came in, so I was like, okay, started picking up the logs off the altar, center stone, table, alter, all the same thing, I just don't know what to call it. Picking up the logs off the altar, got all the pieces I could get without burning myself and there still a lot there so I started brushing it off and then started scooping it off and picking up handfuls of coals and saying no, you can't have fires here, dumping it out, nobody moved. Just all sort of squinching back into the stones around the circle so I stomped it out and finally somebody got up to help me. I asked if they wanted me to show them either Little Grove or the Hill where they could build a fire safely and they said no, is it okay if so long as we clean up after ourselves that we stay here and I said yeah, that would be okay and left. And as soon as we were out of earshot Ginger just started laughing and laughing and I was like, what? We had been having this conversation earlier about proper, you know, how magic only seemed to work for the right reasons and how showing off was not one of the right reasons. And, she just looked at me and said, showing off, it doesn't work if your showing off, right, right? What do you explain that with? And I looked down and at my hands and realized they were black and sooty, but I had just picked up a full fire's worth of coal and hadn't gotten burnt. And my feet were fine too. And it was just, aghhhh [laugh] what happened to....? I don't know. It's just...another thing. So....yeah. Other thing that happened that spring was the statue of the lady that used to be in the Arb disappeared. Um, I don't know how much of that's here or in the histories, but...

EH: I know about it but I don't remember what's been recorded. Go ahead and talk about it.

IS: Ok. You might have trace its early history, 'cause I don't know that, but the earliest I can tell of it is that there used to be a New age group that would come to Carleton on occasion and have events here over the summer. Mec says that they built it originally. It was a statue of a lady about six feet high, carved out of a pine log with a chain saw. And she used to stand up by monument hill, years and years ago. Then, according to Mec, Carleton Christian Fellowship took it down and put a cross up, and then somebody else took the cross down and they put another cross up. But the lady meanwhile sort of drifted down the hill and into the weeds. Well, I found her there my first fall at Carleton, stood here up in the woods. I thought it was a log with a nail in it and I picked it up and I was, oh, it's a statue, that's kinda cool. Stood it up in the woods down above the dam on Spring Creek and stayed there through spring of sophomore year. And then Michelle found it down again and set it up back up, she and Amanda, still over by the creek. They said they moved it though so I went to see where it was this time and found it down again with tire marks over it and decided that was enough and picked it up and carried it to what was then Three Bird Grove and grabbed a shovel, skipped class, and set her up sort of off around the corner so you couldn't see her from the path but you could find her if you knew she was there. And she had more visitors than the circle did, early on. Um, she was there when we had Beltane there the first time and people would leave flowers and necklaces and just different things there and I would come by and see people kneeling, talking to her, which is a very, a very beautiful statue, very generic, just a lady with her hands together, head bowed with something like a halo on. I thought she was the virgin Mary, I don't know what she might have been but people just called her the lady. Um, sometime around that second fire at the circle um, she disappeared, she vanished again. She wasn't knocked over, she was buried about two feet into the ground, but somebody could have broken her off fairly easily. Instead they actually dug her up out of the ground and carried her off. There were no drag marks, there was no, no burned logs, searched around a good bit but never found her. The hole is still there and you can still see the path to it but she's gone. I was kind of sad about that. I don't know what the New age group was or if there's any intervening stuff between when she was on the Hill and when I found her four years ago. Somebody else might know.

EH: Group that used to meet her old time [?] was called Spiritual Frontiers, but I don't know anything about the lady, before it was in Three Bird Grove, actually, is where I first saw it.

IS: Mark Heiman says that carved into the base there were two initials and a date. I don't recall that but if she shows up, that could be useful for figuring out where she's from. [pause] One year left?

EH: Sure.

IS: [laugh] [sigh] During last spring Michelle started having less and less to do with the Druids. Michelle had her...um, she herself turned toward Discordianism [?] and was still there last I knew but started having less actively to do with organizing things and running teas. [pause] This fall I started really worrying about next year because I didn't, I knew I was gone and we had one Third Order besides Michelle and I and she wasn't terribly active, and I didn't know what was going to happen, and I didn't want all the work we'd done to have to be repeated. I wanted to be able to pass something on, I wanted there to be people to pass it on to. So I tried picking the next Archdruid. That doesn't work. [chuckle] This was pointed out to me from any number of directions. Um, the circle apparently considered the person I'd picked, didn't like her, and gave her a mosquito curse so that whenever she walked into the circle mosquitoes would descend on her and wherever she sat down ants would swarm out of the ground and eat her and she won't go back now. [Eric chuckles] She still won't go there by herself. Um, Andrea kindly wrote from Seattle saying, no, you can't do that. You can't pick the person - they'll show up when it's time. So there was some grand confusion before I figured that out. But, I brought, I didn't bring them back. Two people that I knew outside of Carleton applied and came to Carleton this year, Chrissy Phelps and Mary Beth Weber and both of them were interested in the Druid group. Chrissy was a person I had actually picked to lead it and that was a mistake. For one thing she felt pressured into it and when she later found her own interest diverging didn't know how to back out. Um, we figured that out too, eventually. Mary was not interested in doing anything with the Druids. I mean, she would do stuff with them because I was there but she explicitly didn't want to have anything to do with leadership. She was very Christian herself. When she showed up the circle started talking to her and scared her badly but told her this was something she had to do and so she did, for as long as she was here. But, because I came back with them, I was here during New Student Week and during that time, during that week and a half where people haven't gotten sucked into classes and sort of fossilized into which activities they're going to do, met most of the current proper Druids. There are perhaps three people left over from past years, but just about everybody else is a freshman that we met during New Student Week. Highly recommended, anybody in the future. [pause] Where am I going with it, I don't know. I guess since then I've been just trying to show how things work and what we've been doing, trying to pass on what I've learned without teaching. Trying to share but not say, this is how to do things, because that'll, that'll kill the group faster than anything. We had Samhain again and it was kinda disastrous because we tried to...people that were in charge of some of the things at Samhain also wanted to go to the ball that was happening at the same time, the Halloween dance and...it didn't work. Doing one or the other would have been fine. We had several sweats, um, we had a procession across campus for Samhain carrying lit candles down through the library. Yeah...[Eric laughs] I hoped we weren't going to get arrested for that but managed to get out ok. Walked up through Sayles, through the libe, down past Olin and up through Goodhue singing, it was a lot of fun. And, mostly I've been trying to show people what's going on and introduce them to all the resources, show 'em all the new, the groundwork and get other people to start leading. Something that's happened every four years more or less for the past sixteen so far as I can tell is that when there was a turnover, there was in the next generation a strong reaction against what the people before them had done. That, uh, they would react violently against it and go one way and then the next group would find that too extreme and go the other and I...I feel like because Michelle and I didn't have anything to react against we might have escaped that trend, but...to be extra careful I guess I've been trying to get the people currently involved to do more and more of the organization and more and more of the planning and ideas and things so that there's not a sudden power vacuum. [pause] One of the things they wanna do for instance is to create a, a sort of tri-monthly or quarterly newsletter that comes out. And we've got people now with the background to do that, both with the writing, writing skills we've got four or five people, all of whom write, we got one person who did a magazine in high school and knows all about the editing and the layout and stuff so I think now it can finally happen if they choose to do that. We rediscovered the web page and set up a caucus conference this year. Did a lot of um, a lot of more official stuff, a lot things during New Student Week with prospective students, just tabling and stuff. Working with the chaplain on different things. We started getting letters from prison inmates addressed to the chaplain's office saying I understand you have, from the prison chaplain to the Carleton chaplain, to us saying that I understand you have a Druid group there. I've got someone here who's looking for that kind of spiritual guidance. Could you do something about it? And, never quite know what to do with those but, we're working on it.

EH: I get those too, I'd love to pass them on to you frankly. [laugh]

IS: Ok. That'll work.

EH: Yeah.

IS: One thing I've wanted to do is make up, for all the letters that say, send us all your information, I just wanted to make up a form letter saying we don't have any, look at this website. But, haven't done that for some reason. But I started to, actually, because it's more fun to answer them in person, is, once or twice a term getting all the letters that have come in like that and just passing them out at Tea. Saying hey, take one. It's too much for any one person to do but if everybody writes one letter every five weeks we can do it. The more serious letters, like the ones from prisoners, I try to answer. And I feel really weird doing that because I don't feel like I'm a spiritual anything. I'm just a guy. Just...ran away too slow, responsibility jumped in. [pause] So this year's been smoother and less eventful than any of the previous, I guess. Lots has happened but nothing, nothing as monumental building the circle or as...suddenly trying to run the group. I think it's been the most, paradoxically I think it's been the most productive year on an individual basis. Not for me, but for people in the group. People have started coming to it not just because it sounded neat. People have always come to it for that, but now people have come to it for...great variety of reasons. To have somewhere to express their irreverent silliness that either gets them in trouble or just looked at strangely anywhere else. One guy loves to make up games and stories and masks and put on impromptu plays. He's doing that now, here, but couldn't find an outlet for that before. We've got die hard scientists who at the same time feel there's something more there and wanna look into it, but aren't religious. We've got a couple of them. We've got people who are profoundly religious, but who have suddenly asked themselves, wait a minute, I think Christ is a great guy but I'm not sure I'm Christian anymore. What am I supposed to do with this? And...feel lost in their churches and start just exploring this way, going well, maybe, maybe there are other ways of looking at time, maybe there are other ways of looking at life, you know, what does this mean. I don't, I wish people had written more in the past about personal experience as well as personal history because there's been a lot of magic this year and these past four years. People have had visions in sweat lodges and have talked about them and have gotten very scared sometimes because they don't know what sort of precedent they have, or what they might mean and since, at least, these years the Druids haven't had a teaching, a cosmology, we've never been in a position to say, oh, you saw this in the sweat, well, that means x. It's just, well, I don't know what it means. You have to figure that out. I can show you these books, I can tell you what I've seen, but I don't, I don't know. There's been a lot of visions. There's been a lot of...lot of tory [?] hallucinations, I don't know. People talking to and getting responses from things in the Arb, in the circle, God, whatever you want to call it and, part of it is that those are very intensely personal experiences and I don't know if they'll ever want them written down. But I feel like if they're, if it's not acknowledged that they happened, that element of the group will be lost. I know that way back in the beginning, someone at the first Samhain ritual started speaking in tongues and scared everybody else to death. But I know it's happened, I know that the Druids as a group have always had some peculiar influence on the weather. Andrea talks about the Winter Carnival people approaching the group when she was in charge. Week before Winter Carnival with no snow on the ground and asking if they could do something and they did a modified rain dance on Farmhouse lawn and day before the festival, just Rice County got hit with a snowstorm. [Eric chuckles] We've done things where we needed it sunny for Beltane and it got cloudier and cloudier and cloudier and cloudier and we finally said wait, come on, could you just be sunny, please? And it would get cloudy right up to that night and then go clear, against all weather maps and stuff. It was just...none of it's impossible but it's too reliable to...comfortably call coincidence. Even had one night where we asked, Amanda and I asked that, we're having a sweat, ok. Told everybody, make sure we have nice weather for the sweat. We didn't specify beyond that. One person thought nice meant sunny.

One person thought it meant windy. One person thought it meant cold so there would be no mosquitoes. It hailed. It did everything at once. [Both laugh] It just got utterly chaotic, so we cancelled the sweat. We moved inside to the sauna in the ladies locker room and uh, said ok, we'll have the sweat next Saturday. Everybody think warm, dry, and clear, ok? [laugh] None of this ambiguous stuff. And it was. It's just, it's unnervingly reliable. But I know that whether stuff has been attached to the Druid group all the way back to Dave Fisher but...if it doesn't get talked about I wonder if that'll get lost.

EH: Well, this tape will be record of some of that for later people maybe. I ran into the story from that first year uh, as well as one of the women having a vision that, of uh, I've forgotten the details of, room with a, something draped with a flag or something and uh, just before Kennedy's assassination so that was the interpretation of that later.

IS: Yeah, she saw three black rocks that she thought were three graves and the flag I think. [pause] Martin Luther King, John F. Kennedy, and somebody else were assassinated in quick order.

EH: Well, there's five years between Kennedy and King and Robert Kennedy.

IS: Yeah.

EH: But, well, anyway. That's beyond our...[both laugh] Is there still, is there still overlap um, with cloak-wearing?

IS: Oh, yeah. We tried to dispel the Druid stereotypes. We did not have orgies, we did not have drinking parties in the Arb, and we do not all wear cloaks. These are the three main myths...you know.

EH: I've had it explained to me before that the cloak people and the Druids were not the same group although there was a lot of overlap. This was a previous generation of...

IS: Yeah. There are two main groups that...tend to accrue cloaks. So the Druids and the Society of Creative Anachronisms. Those two have a lot of overlap. There are also a few people unassociated with either who wear cloaks just because they like cloaks. So...David's been one of our best apologists for this has always said, you know, not all those who wear cloaks are Druids and not all Druids wear cloaks. The problem is, currently most of the Druids do wear cloaks, at least sometimes. And, all the people who wear cloaks visibly on campus tend to be Druids so we've, we've tried to dispel it but it creeps in. The orgies, there's never been an officially sanctioned Druid orgy. Members of the Druids have been involved in things that could be called orgies, and until Nick's last visit there were no alcohol drinking parties with the Druids, but that was a tradition from his time I wasn't comfortable giving to the group as a whole, passing on that way but, on an individual basis, thought it was ok to humor him with. Yeah. No drinking parties with Mec. [both laugh] Dangerous thing.

EH: Well, let me ask what you foresee for yourself in terms of future Druidism. Will you be involved in another group? Will your Druidism become almost entirely an individual thing? Will you have continuing contacts with the Carleton group? What's your best guess?

IS: A lot of questions there. My Druidism can't be a purely individual thing anymore. The way we understand orders now has something to do with that. First Order, the way we've been describing it, is you consider yourself a Druid, plain and simple. Second, you consider yourself a Druid and find something, you agree with the basic tenets, that's also First Order. You agree with basic tenets, you find something valuable in the search itself and on a personal level you'll continue that search for the rest of your life. Maybe not with the Druid group, maybe not with any religion at all but just that kind of thinking, that kind of prayerful and rational consideration that makes one a Druid whether they use the name or not. That you're personally committed to that for the rest of your life. Third Order is all that plus a conviction to share. Not necessarily to teach, but to share what you've learned, and to share that way of thinking with the people around you. And I've come to that understanding after I came to Third Order, but it's something that imposes itself. I've watched other people go through the orders now and it's always been something that becomes exactly as serious as you take it. And, if you take it as either a lifelong commitment or as a commitment to share and teach in some sense, then it becomes that. So whatever I do, Druidism will come with me and I'll share the fruits of it and whatever I can of it with those around me. I do think I will always have connections with the Carleton grove, as long as there is one. Um, I don't know how sporadic that will be. I know folks at Carleton now and I will for the next four years. I myself will be in the Pacific for the next four years so I probably won't show up on campus during that time.

EH: That'd be hard. [both laugh]

IS: Yeah. There has been a grove started now in my hometown by one of the ladies that came to Carleton from there and then went back and I'm sure I'll be connected with that. I don't know if I'll be in a position of leadership again. I hope that I won't anytime soon because I've been doing it for too long and I don't think I'm qualified. And I want to do more learning without, without the pressure of being in charge and without the distance of being in charge that when I lead a ritual or a sweat or a celebration, it's very difficult to get into it and get the full effect of it because I'm orchestrating it. I'm being a stage director in some sense, and I'm making sure in the sweat that people are doing okay, that it's not too cold, that we have enough water, that things happen in the right order, and I can't just sink into it and disappear and appreciate the experience while I'm doing that. And I've been doing that for too long so....Wherever I am next I hope it's not as a leader. [pause] I had a dream while I was at sea that has made me think a lot about my future relationship with this grove. And that was that I was walking down Second Street toward the Arb years and years from now, and there was a war going on. Not anything official or national, just lots of people killing each other and doing it in the name of Druidism, and in my name. And...somebody who'd just killed somebody under a bush was talking to me, telling me about this prophet Irony from years back who'd told them all these things and they were doing this for him and all this stuff and ran off and didn't recognize me at all. And I, I walked out to the circle and found that they had very carefully destroyed the entire outer ring but left the center, but done that through some perversion of something I'd once said and heard a voice inside me just saying let it go, let it go. [pause] I was quite serious when I said I don't want followers. I know I've affected the group here and I know I've changed the way it's going to be in some sense, but I've tried very hard never to have the things I've done become Scripture. To have people do things because I did them and on a certain level, I would be very fearful if that were ever to happen. I don't think it will. I think the people here now are sensible enough that it won't, but I...I...I don't know. I never want it to.

EH: I'm thinking that might be a good place to stop. Thank you, Irony.

IS: Thank you.

Interview with Merribeth Weber

Carleton AD from about 1998 to 2003, an extraordinarily long period of time overlapping with the departing of Irony Sade and Ehren Vaughn.

MS: ...Michael Scharding, class of '94 interviewing Merri, class of 03.

MW: Yep.

MS: And today is May 2nd, Friday, 2003, Common Era. We're going to do an interview with Merri about her last four or five or six years here at Carleton and what she's done with the Carleton Druids and other groups that she's been with while she's been here. Why don't we start off by having Merri tell us a little bit about where she grew up and some of the influences in her early childhood that are of interest to this interview.

MW: I grew up in Mexico New York, which is in the middle of nowhere in upstate New York, near Lake Ontario. I lived on a back road in the country and spent the majority of my time running around in the woods and the hay fields and scaring the deer. So I think that that's probably the main influence on my Druidism, or having ended being a druid. That and I grew up Seventh Day Adventist, which is kind of a weird bunch of Christian people, sweet people. I eventually decided that it wasn't quite for me; hence going the Druid route instead of still being Seventh Day Adventist. They're big on being natural, sort of natural foods and that sort of thing. We always used to go for long walks on Sabbath. Nature walks were a big thing, going for hikes, spending time camping. I think that was a big influence...we'd do this thing where'd go for a nature walk on a Saturday after having been to church in the morning and there'd be a big group of people, lots of kids and whatever, and we'd walk along and all the kids were told to look for a Sabbath surprise. It was a special thing for it being the holy day, that there would be some special thing out in nature that we would find.

MS: Like...?

MW: Like Robin's eggs in a bush or special flowers hidden somewhere that we just happened to notice. It was this whole kind of thing of nature is part of God and I got a lot of that at an early age so...that probably has an influence.

MS: What about your parents, do they have any interests that they were keen to teach you besides Seventh Day Adventism?

MW: As far as spirituality?

MS: Yeah.

MW: I don't know. They taught me to have common sense and be level headed about religion. They raised me with an idea of religion and this is how you do things. The whole idea of don't be mean to other people because of religion and don't just assume people are wrong because they're not the same as you. A lot of things like that that I think is very good and that other people that grew up in the same religion may not have had...because my parents were very much... they're very open.

MS: Were there any individuals, people that in your childhood who were spiritual teachers of any type, individually. Pastor or...?

MW: Yeah, probably Pastor Sadie. Pastor Sadie was the Pastor when I was 8 to 12 or something around there. He was a little unorthodox...he had a tendency to where a leather jacket and ride a Harley. And I thought he was the best Pastor in the world, he was just super cool...and he was just a really great guy all around and was known for giving sermons that were half an hour longer than they were supposed to be...not the greatest thing, but he was into it. He was big on spreading the word of God in his thing that he was doing. But at the same time he was very down to earth and just a normal human being which I think spoke really well to me as a little kid because...you know, I could relate to somebody that read a motorcycle because my brothers rode motorcycles. But at the same time he was a holy man, he was a Pastor, and he was very spiritual. And he was perfectly willing to talk to me even though I was a small child; lots of people just ignore children, so to me, I was like wow...he must be the greatest guy in the world.

MS: I think that's probably because people are afraid of the kinds of questions kids might ask. [laugh]

MW: That's entirely possible.

MS: They haven't learned to keep the deep important questions to themselves yet. When you were looking for colleges, what were you looking for?

MW: I didn't really know...was part of the problem. I knew I was going to go to college because I was smart and smart people went to college...was basically my reasoning. I figured my family would be disappointed in me if I didn't go to college and what in the world would I do if I didn't...I'd probably live on the streets somewhere and be a loser and I don't want that so I'd better go to college. I don't think I worked it all out particularly well...I just figured that was the next step so I was looking for a place that had an atmosphere that I would like because I didn't really like my high school much.

MS: What was wrong with your high school?

MW: One...I was bored out of my mind. Two...the people just didn't make any sense to me, they were just, they cared about being popular and wearing the right color lipstick and which boys they should date or shouldn't and...I wasn't so much into that. I liked to sit in the corner and read books and ride horses and run track. And occasionally do theater...I guess that that sums up my time in high school.

MS: That sounds like the solitary route, actually.

MW: Yeah. I didn't like...they seemed so petty. There's nothing, no creature in the world more vicious than teenage girls. Now they were never vicious to me because I just didn't attract attention, but I watched them...I was like, 'This is not a nice place, I don't like it and nobody ever does anything interesting. There aren't people that I can talk to unless I want to talk about make up so, well gee, I want to find a place that's more interesting and has more interesting people in, and has things I can learn.' So I picked Carleton...

MS: Over...?

MW: Over any Adventist schools, I was still Adventist at that point and they have a big education system. So I thought, hey, I could go to some Adventist school in Australia, wouldn't that be great...cause, you know, Australia. There was the local college...I wasn't going to go there, definitely. There were some other places on the East coast, I don't even remember now. But, basically, I got all these brochures in the mail and I read all these brochures and there was the boring pile and then there was the king of interesting pile. There were three in the kind of interesting pile...weren't many at all. Basically I'd heard a lot about Carleton because I knew Irony who was Archdruid before me and he...

MS: Where did you meet Irony?

MW: He went to the same high school as I did.

MS: Oh really?

MW: Yeah. We dated all through my time in high school. We started dating when I was at the end of ninth grade and he was at the end of his senior year...which was this bizarre thing.

MS: Was Irony different back then?

MW: Yeah.

MS: What was different about him?

MW: He was younger. [laughs]

MS: [laughs]

MW: So I knew about Carleton through him. He'd told me lots of stories because of...dating for a long time. So it sounds like just a fascinating place and I knew about the Druids through talking to him because he became Archdruid and I thought, oh my goodness, that's scary, they're Pagans, aren't they. So my initial reaction to the Druids was 'Wow, that sounds scary. Do they do Satanic rituals in the woods, or something?' He explained that no, that was not what they did, they actually liked trees a lot and that was the main driving force. [laughs] Between all of the fun stories that I heard from him and the fact that I knew it was a good school and the fact that their brochure was one of the few interesting ones and that it was far enough away from home that I would go away from home...because I thought that was a big thing, to move out of my parents and be somewhere else. I applied to Carleton, early decision cause I thought, hey, they're good and if they reject then...I'll apply somewhere else. It was very much...I had senioritis, I didn't want to do anything so they accepted me so I went to Carleton. And then I decided Carleton was really really hard and scary and I didn't know if I wanted to do this whole college thing so then I took a year off.

MS: Was that your sophomore year?

MW: That was actually halfway through my freshman year. Right away I was just like no, no, this is crazy.

MS: You know, back in the early eighties and nineties we used to have a ten day freshman week before you went to classes for orientation and they found out that too many kids were dropping out in the first week...they shortened it down to two days.

MW: Yeah.

MS: It is frightening, a lot of people get home sick when the first workload comes through with two hundred pages for the weekend.

MW: Yeah. That was kind of it. When I first came here I thought I was going to major in linguistics. I didn't really know what linguistics was, I knew it was the study of languages, I loved learning languages, I spent a year in Germany when I was in high school. So I thought, hey, that's the thing to do. And then, my first term I took an upper level German class, Greek, and a freshman seminar on linguistics and I hated it, all of it. It was horrible.

MS: You know what I thought linguistics is like. Everybody likes a good joke, but there are certain people who try to organize and classify jokes, like, this is this kind of humor, this is this kind of humor. [laughs]

MW: [laughs]

MS: That's what linguistics is. People who love the languages but hate to go into the nit-picky details of why this is this and why this is that. I could never take linguistics.

MW: I don't know, it didn't click with me. I got so frustrated with it. So, then when I didn't want to do the major that I thought I wanted to do and hated all my classes my first term and I didn't do very well then I was just like, man college, what was I thinking. So I came back winter term and I talked to a bunch of people and I was like, you know, I really am not enjoying this, can I leave now? They said, well, yeah, I guess you can because you're not doing very well in your classes and you do seem to be quite unhappy here so, sure you just go on and take some time off...come back later.

MS: Where'd you go?

MW: I went home for a while. Then I came back here for a while, just working, random odd jobs. I worked down at More 4, I worked at the dry cleaners. That was interesting. Then I went and took a three month trip to England and Ireland, the whole British Isles thing...hitchhiked around there for a while, it was kind of fun, kind of crazy. Then I came back to home and decided it's time to go back to school now. Came back to Carleton, they wouldn't let me in for winter term, what would've been my sophomore year if I'd gone along with everybody else. So I kind of lived in somebody's room where I wasn't allowed and slept under their bed, quite literally...eventually got back into classes for spring term and then I had a room of my own, it was amazing. Then I was like, 'Hey, Carleton, this is pretty great, 'except you shouldn't have two freshman years...I was a freshman for two years and it was just awful.

MS: I had two sophomore years, it worked out great.

MW: See, sophomore year is pretty good. You can have two sophomore years but you know, having to say you're a freshman for two years, I didn't like that. But the rest of it was great...I really enjoyed it once I came back, and I was ready then. It's like, yeah, ok. College, I still have no idea what I'm going to major in but that's okay because it's liberal arts...I can take whatever I want for a while.

MS: What did you think about the Carleton students in general.

MW: They're all kind of crazy. I really like Carleton. The Carleton students...there's been a change, see, it's different now. When I came here as a freshman, basically it was just sort of this school for really smart odd balls...which was great, that was what I looking for. I wanted a school for smart people who were weird because that would suit me because I'm smart and I'm kind of weird. So I came here and there's just all these crazy people everywhere and they do all sorts of crazy things and they're stressed all the time. And, you know, I just made a lot of friends and I thought wow is just the greatest, best, place I could possibly have come. I think that's true. And then I hit my junior year and suddenly started taking organic chemistry...oh my goodness, I'm gonna die, this is just way too stressful. You know, but I was enjoying it at the same time that it was slowly eating my soul. But the thing is that the last couple of classes of freshman that have come in have been different than that. They're all...I mean they're all very smart, as expected, and they're a little odd, but they're a lot more mainstream than any of the people that...you know, the balance has shifted. It used to be that the majority of people were a little off kilter from the mainstream popular culture folks that you run into a lot in high school. It's shifted now, and there was a small contingent of people that were still in that mainstream sect, but now it's shifted so that it seems like the majority of the underclassmen are now kind of mainstream and you know there's a few odd balls out of those freshman and sophomore classes and there's all of us upperclassmen who are sitting here going, 'Why is everyone wearing Abercrombie and Fitch and they've all got cell phones, what's going on'...I have a cell phone, I'm sad to admit this but...I can't bash the cell phones too much.

MS: Friends of mine back in '89 were deploring to me, back in '85 when they put telephones into every dorm room it completely changed everything [dramatic]. No more hall phones and people yelling down trying to find people. And then when I was '94 I was telling other people the same thing you told me and so I'm wondering if this is golden age mentality or is it really changing.

MW: Well, it does change. I mean you really...I think I see it even more because of being here five years instead of just the four. It's not big changes, it's not bad...I mean I'm friends with a lot of sophomores and freshman that are great people. It's just slightly different from the way it was when I first got here. It's funny to see that. And it's funny to look around and look at all of the things that have changed on campus too. Just...where I used to eat my meals, everyday for my first two years here. There's a wall there, I can't go to that place anymore. It's gone, it's a storage room. [laughs] They walled up the pit in Burton. It's gone. White walls you can't walk in there, no pit.

MS: No one eats at Burton anymore?

MW: There's Burton, but there are sections of the dinning hall that they've walled off and you can't go in there anymore. I think it's something to do with the basement having problems and they had to store things other places so they walled off sections and made it storage rooms.

MS: Yeah, I don't like it when they tamper with my campus. Come back every year or two and something...there's a new building or there's a new field or...something's always changing. Guess they have a purpose to it. So, Irony introduced you to the Carleton Druids?

MW: Yeah.

MS: But, were there any other clubs that you were interested in when you first came to Carleton?

MW: What did I get involved in? Long time ago. There's folk dancing. I did start off going to that a little bit. I haven't gone to folk dancing I think in two or three years now but when I first came that was one of them. Think I went to Pickin' 'n' Grinnin' for a while. These are sort of a lot of overlapping things. Anime society. I'd never seen Anime before, I was kind of confused by that. I know I went to that for a little while. Got into Film society. I don't remember at what point...but...for a while I went to film society every Wednesday. There was one term that we termed the Malko-term. It was John Malkovich movies the entire term. Film society was so so strange. That was a long time ago.

MS: You staying...currently in any other groups now, besides Druids.

MW: Yep. Interestingly enough, I'm head of two groups on campus and I can't put either of them on my resume because one of them is the Druids which people don't take kindly to...it's a little weird...and the other is the Assassin Guild.

MS: Woman after my own heart.

MW: Yeah, [laughs]

MS: And my head. [laughs]

MW: Yeah, I ended up with the Assassin Guild by accident. Ehren Vaughn ran it last year and at the end of the year he couldn't find anybody to take it and I said 'Well, if you can't find anybody, I'll do it, but you know I've already got other stuff to do so look around for other people first...' he couldn't find anybody. So I ended up with that too.

MS: Not good for getting rid of that stress of your senior year, isn't it.

MW: Well, it's fun, it's really fun, I like running the Assassins. Because, you know, I deploy people to kill other people with little plastic guns...it's really, it's cathartic. And sometimes I go around with my big foam axe. That's pretty great. But I'm also involved in Aikido. Been doing that for a couple of years now. I've done dance off and on. I've danced Ebony...I didn't this term. They've gotten very sleazy. I mean...Ebony's always been sleazy. It's getting sleazier...I'm amazed. Still just as much fun as ever. Yeah, I think that's about it as far as extracurricular activities.

MS: So, what is your actual major here at Carleton?

MW: I'm a neuroscience Major.

MS: Neuroscience?

MW: Yes. It's a special major

MS: What's that?

MW: Um, brains.

MS: Brains?

MW: Yeah.

MS: How they work?

MW: Yeah. Basically. It's a combination of the biology department, the psychology department and the chemistry department, basically. More biology than anything else and not so much on the chemistry but I did have to take organic chemistry.

MS: Is this a field that you intend to work?

MW: Oh, beats me. I considered grad school or medical school, decided I really don't want to go to medical school, maybe grad school but not right away. Truthfully the plan at the moment is to move to Ann Arbor and live with a couple of friends and have a job for next year.

MS: I hear there's an ADF grove over in Ann Arbor.

MW: IS there?

MS: Yes. One of the biggest ones. Might have to spy on them a little bit.

MW: I better look them up. You should give me contact information.

MS: We used to have a RDNA grove with Shelton back then, back in the '70s too. Quite the happening Druid's spot.

MW: That's great. It's also the big Aikido Mecca.

MS: There's got to be a connection.

MW: I think there is. There are lots of Druids that have done Aikido and lots of Aikido that do...One of the senior students right now in Aikido is one of my co-Archdruids, that's Steve-o, Steve Crimmins. Yeah, lots of people migrate there, it's sort of, it's a Carleton place to go. Used to be Seattle and now, these days it seems to be Ann Arbor, at least for the circle of people I know.

MS: When I was in St. Cloud we had an Aikido club mixed in with the druids. At MSUA we had an Aikido club mixed in with the Druids. So I'm starting to see a pattern running through here.

MW: Yeah, there seems to be, Aikido seems to be an overlap, folk dancing, and folk music.

MS: Sometimes theater.

MW: Sometimes theater, yeah. We haven't had too many overlaps with theater recently although I've done some theater at Carleton but I'm not really a theater person.

MS: See I'm a complete, I'm probably the worst actor in history.

MW: [laughs]

MS: My movies well show that. Andrea Davis back in the '90s brought in a lot of theater majors. That's why we had so much back in the '90s. Moving on to the next phase. You were a little apprehensive about the Druids before you came to Carleton. What was your impression of them, or how did you first...well Irony probably took you to the first service.

MW: Well, actually what happened is he'd gotten that circle built out in the Arb and the very first day that we got here, Chrissie Phelps, who also was Arch Druid for a little while then she went off her own little way, she's actually living in Fish house now which is sort of funny, it's the Christian house. She didn't start off as Christian here, she went the opposite way. I came in as Christian, went Druid, she came in as Druid and went Christian.

MS: Kind of a crossing place, cross roads.

MW: We got here the first day, all three of us because we're all three from the same home town and had gone to high school together and been friends and Irony took us out to the circle and I walked into the circle and the place was just buzzing. I was like wow, this is really cool, I've never experienced anything quite like this before. I think basically that's, I decided ok, this is a good thing. I didn't know what I would think of the Druids until I walked into the circle and as soon as I walked in it was just like, 'Ok, this is something good and I think this is something I'll be involved in.' That was it. Already before the first service, which I think we had a full moon celebration still during new student week. Already by then I was recruiting other people rather than being a freshman being recruited myself. That's where a lot of the main people, that's where a lot of that group came from was that night during New Student Week, Irony was like, 'Hey, there's a full moon, we'll have a full moon service right away when it's just still all freshman, we'll get people to come. Why don't you ask some of your friends that you've been meeting.' I was like, 'Oh, yeah, sure, sounds like fun.' So, I ran off and Ehren was in my New Student Week group, Chris Middleton lived a floor above me, Chrissie of course came, a bunch of other random people, John Parejko, fiddler John, the guy with the fiddle at every Beltane playing Mairi's Wedding and all that and grabbed all them. The only way that we got John to come was, somebody...he'd set his fiddle down next him, they picked up the fiddle and ran with it and he raced after them just screaming 'give me back my fiddle.' Then we managed to get him to descend to come for a couple of minutes, then I think he had to go play fiddle somewhere. A lot of the crowd that came in with my class came from that new student week thing where we were all friends, we were milling around. I was like, 'You don't want to go to this particular whatever they were taking us to, you know,' how to find the swimming pool at Carleton, you know, those meetings they have. 'You don't want to do that, we should all go do this,' and then they told their friends and they told their friends and we got a bunch of people right away. It was really neat. And then everybody stuck, kept coming to tea...

MS: Were there many old timers back then?

MW: There were a few, there was Dave Coil, and there was Simon with the three or four last names [laughs], a guy that always played the drums, he played several different instruments. There was Michelle Hadjer, was still around, she was sort of peripheral but she came to some things. Amanda Bradley. She was also a Neuroscience major. I don't know, maybe there's an overlap there to because Dan Brewer is graduating with me this year and he's also a neuroscience major, he comes to a lot of Druid thing...he was raised semi-pagan. I don't know who all there was in those days.

MS: Was the group doing pretty well before you came along?

MW: Yeah, it was doing pretty well. I know Irony had done a lot of work legitimizing the Druids...

MS: Legitimizing?

MW: Yeah, he did a lot of, you know, he made friends with the chaplain, and he started, he made friends with all the Arb people and he started making all of the druid events non-alcoholic on general principle because well, it made funding easier. And then it turned out that a lot of people that came in were a lot of people that didn't drink period so it just sort of stayed that way.

MS: I haven't noticed many heavy boozers in all the druids over the years except for maybe myself.

MW: Well, I just know that before Irony came along there was, you still used whiskey for waters of life and things like that and he made some minor changes of that, of just like... 'Well, in general we'll be non alcoholic because the college likes us better that way and none of us really drinks any how. Then we'll have water instead of whiskey.' A few little things. I think it made a bit of a difference with the administration. He made friends with security and the Arb guys like Myles Bakke and all them. Which I think helped because when they ran into us naked in the Arb they'd be like, 'Oh right,' you guys instead of beating us with their flashlights or whatever. I know that was a lot of stuff that I heard about. A lot of it was before I came. Then when I showed up...Irony had actually planned on training Chrissie in as a new Archdruid. What ended up happening was that Chrissie was, you know, she came to stuff and she did stuff but she wasn't quite as into it as I ended up being so I started jumping into Archdruid stuff immediately, as soon as I got here...foolish freshman that I was and then look what I got stuck with.

MS: There is an old saying that the person that runs away from responsibility the slowest becomes the Archdruid.

MW: And that's really true. That's what's happened.

MS: You might be necessarily gifted or not, you just ran the slowest.

MW: That's about how it goes. Just whoever is foolish enough to take on responsibility...they end up with it.

MS: All of it.

MW: Yep.

MS: Have you found over the years that most of the work is done by a small number or is it shared pretty equally?

MW: Well, back in the day it was shared pretty evenly...oh my roommate too...Chloe Flynn was in on things for a long time there. Because there was a big group of us that were all friends and all involved in the Druids. We split up stuff amongst ourselves really well but as the years went on various members of that group sort of schismed off and didn't come to Druid things quite so much and went on to whatever else they did and at the point it became more difficult and it became fewer and fewer of us doing more and more of the work because as people came in they'd do bits and pieces but they'd sort of come and go. It's sort of an anomaly to have had that big group all in one class and all a huge group of friends go through together like that. I think, I haven't seen it happen since. We'll get a few new people every year but they'll be from all different groups and they'll be kind of friendly but, I don't know.

MS: I'm kind of wondering if leaders appear in a vacuum. When there's already strong leadership I think that people tend to follow but when people come in and they notice that there's no one in charge they tend to take on responsibilities they wouldn't normally do. If you already have a very strong, well organized Archdruid, you probably won't get anyone in one in the next class who'll do anything. That's what I'm wondering.

MW: Possibly. I don't know, I know when we all showed up Irony was in charge of everything and he was actually quite organized, planned a lot of stuff. I think what happened is that I jumped in and started doing Archdruidy stuff with him right and then there were...who was, I think it was Ehren, Chris Middleton, and Chloe at the end of that year...see I was not in classes so I was not...I'm like I'm leaving, I don't know when I'm coming back, maybe I never will, I'm heading for Africa or something. I didn't know what I was doing. So Irony decided we should have new people come in, who wants to do it. So the three of them said we'll do it. So they took over as Archdruids. Then I was gone for fall term and then I came back winter term and jumped right back in doing stuff so it was four of us that were in charge of things and that worked out quite well, for a while

MS: Four is quite nice.

MW: It was a quite nice number. Eventually it got harder because we all changed a little as we went along and eventually there was a little bit of friction between some of us. That made it a little more difficult for delegating responsibility and sharing things but by that time we started to have some people coming along behind us and so we could shunt off work there and it still worked out quite well. Then it got down to where it's only me and Steve-o and Corwin. We're the only ones left, it's a very small group at this point.

MS: In the past most Archdruids have only gone for one year as Archdruid, usually their senior year. Usually a junior is usually following behind. But you had almost three or four years as Archdruid. You think that's a better plan... because I know a lot of Archdruids, like Irony and Michelle and Ann were, they all started off in their freshman year doing work. Does it make a difference.

MW: That's what I did as well. I'm very tired at this point. I think it's better to come in as at least a sophomore or junior and start doing it because, at this point I've been doing it for nearly five years and I've gotten very tired and very frustrated with it because it's, it's a big time commitment. You have to keep the events happening, you have to try and get people in. It's very hard to delegate work to people. People are very resistant.

MS: Especially very busy people.

MW: Yeah, I mean, at Carleton it's just so hard. Now somewhere else where people weren't stressed and writing papers all the time, they might be more willing to volunteer for stuff. But it's tough and you don't want to scare away newbies by saying, 'Hey, you gotta do work now.' Because they're like, 'Hey, if this is work I'm not going to do.' So it's the people who'd been around a while that are doing the work. Well, I've been around the longest so I'm still doing the work. And I've enjoyed it. But I think it would be better, for my leadership of the group, if I hadn't been doing it so long because I know I'm frustrated at this point. Especially because it's my senior year and I just want to play and I have six weeks before I graduate...

MS: Last chance for freedom.

MW: I just need to play. I'll do what I need to do but 'Steve-o, Corwin, you guys do it.' The two of them are like, 'Oh, but we've got so much work. I can't do that. Oh no, no, you please.' 'I'm working on comps, do it, do it.' So all three of us are just sitting around going 'Well I've got a paper,' 'Well, I've got comps,' 'Well, I've got to do this thing,' you know? 'You do it,' and passing it around like playing hot potato all the time about who's going to do what. But it's worked out pretty well because we're always trying to shove it off on somebody else but when it comes down to things needing to get done, you know, we do it.

MS: What kinds of activities did you guys do, perhaps in your first years, and has that changed over the four years, have new things been added. Or removed.

MW: Well, let's see, We started off with full moon celebrations as often as we can manage to remember to do them. We had the fall equinox celebration.

MS: Usually the biggee...

MW: Yeah. And sweat lodges, and Imbolc, Spring Equinox if people are around for it, it usually ends up falling in midterm break, or the spring break, rather. Tea every week, that's been consistent. At tea we do discussions or arts and crafts or Arb walks. There's all sorts of activities that take place in that. And then there's the big Beltane bash every spring, that's our biggest thing, and sort of some more sweat lodges in the spring. It started off like one in the fall and one in the spring and it's gotten up to two in the fall, two in the spring a lot of the time. We were going to try and do three this term...

MS: Sweatlodges?

MW: Yeah, but we got rained out a week or two ago and where we were going to do. What else do we do. I think a lot of that has stayed pretty consistent. There are some random traditions that got started up some where along the line that kept right on going, like the donut tree. For a while there was marshmallowing which was sort of like therapy, get a bunch of marshmallows, you choose some one, it was...instead of a stoning there'd be a marshmallowing and you be like, this marshmallow is for this particular sin and you'd say what the sin is and throw it at them. Now you can make stuff up, it doesn't have to be stuff they ever actually did and at any point in time you can stop and say 'Stop the marshmallowing, explain this sin to me' to the poor person getting marshmallowed and whatever it was, it didn't matter if they did it or not, they've got to explain. It's really a lot of fun, it's kind of a story telling thing...we haven't done that in quite a while but we had several of those during the first couple of years. Traying, Druid traying was always a big thing...stealing trays, going out to Evan's hill, that resulted in several injuries... [laughs]

MS: We did [unintelligible] at the Nude Olympics in '92.

MW: Ah, the Nude Olympics, bah.

MS: I won the luge. But some of the other people, it rained the two previous nights and frozen into a solid sheet of ice but there was a warm rain which pock marked the surface of the ice and then it froze again and so it was like a giant cheese grater. [laughs]

MW: [laughs]

MS: It was a very bad choice of location but we did stick out through the end. Pretty nasty.

MW: I can imagine.

MS: That was Wade Davis, he was also an Aikido person, he organized it.

MW: Yeah, I know Wade. He's actually...Liz McDowell is one of the Druids that came through and she's now with Wade in Ann Arbor. She was my roommate for a year. Yeah, I know Wade pretty well. He's crazy.

MS: He got in so much trouble during Carleton.

MW: Yeah.

MS: He stole the bug. You know he did that?

MW: No.

MS: There used to be a giant centipede in the library lounge about twenty-five meters long, about two thousand pounds. He dismantled it one night, when no one was looking, took it out and reassembled it in the chapel.

MW: That's great.

MS: He got in trouble for that. He almost got kicked out.

MW: Wow.

MS: Oh yeah. He was behind most of the pranks back then. Now that we've talked a little bit about some of the activities, what do you think the reasoning behind all these activities is. Why do people want to go to Druid activities.

MW: We had a big discussion about this at one point. We were trying to classify the types of Druids. What we came up with...there are the spiritual Druids...the religious Druids. How about this way, we've got the religious Druids and that's the select few for whom Druidism is a religion that's there sole religion. Really don't have anything else. There aren't many of those. I'm one of the few. Irony was one. I think Ehren was one. And I don't know, in my time if there have been any others. And then there are the spiritual druids, which are slightly different. They may have other religions. Unitarians or Christians or Buddhists or whatever they might be. And they come in because of their interest in spirituality and wanting to take part in it but not wanting it to be there driving religion. So that would be the next layer of druids. Then we've got the social druids. They come for the social group because they like the people, they like the activities, because it's fun. So that's what they come for. And then there are the Druids that come for free food. [laughs]

MS: [laughs]

MW: And they tend to show up at larger events, and they're sort of the sight seeing, food eating Druids. And they're all great and it's fun to watch because everybody's got their own level of involvement. There are the some of them that are there because that's what they believe, they've got this reason behind it and then there are the people that are there because they're very fascinated by it all because of the spiritual interactions that are going on and the activities relating to spirituality and other people are just like fun fun fun and then there are people with the free food. So it's, it's really great. And people will fluctuate between those, two. Sometimes the social ones will become the free food ones and go back to being social and then some times even step up to being spiritual. And it's very fluid.

MS: How would you describe Druidism to someone who doesn't know much about it?

MW: Oh, I've done it on so many occasions.

MS: What's your spiel?

MW: My spiel, all right...the Druids are a nature loving spiritual group, basically. And the only two things that I've been able to determine that they, as a whole, hold to be true, and even then they argue over them, are the two tenets; that being that the search for spiritual truth is an important and a life long search and the second one being that through a familiarity and closeness with natures, that's one way to further your search. If you believe those two things then you can call yourself a Druid, you're a Druid of the first order. Basically that's it. At Carleton at least, that's what it's been. And everyone comes in with their own take on things and it's not a religion unless you decide to make it so. But it's not not a religion. We had this, oh, there was an argument a while back between me and Chloe because my statement was 'Druidism is not a religion.' She said no that's not true. 'Well you can't just call it a religion because it's not a religion for everybody'. She's like 'But it's a religion.' So we can't really decide if we are a religion or a philosophy...I think that we're a spiritual group that likes nature. [laughs] And some times it's a religion.

MS: But if you think about it, most mainstream sects, I think you can probably find those kind of divisions in it too.

MW: Yeah.

MS: There are the people who really truly believe the doctrines of that church and there are some people who are just there because they have pot lunch afterwards.

MW: Yeah. It's true.

MS: Or because they think it's good for their job. There's a lot of reasons...

MW: Yeah.

MS: Motivations I think, people do attend the services. Is there anything beyond that for you?

MW: For me, yes. Druidism has become my religion. People ask me what my religion is, I say, well, I'm a Druid. Because I was Christian for a very long time but it just didn't mesh for me. Finally came to the conclusion that well, this is a whole thing with Christianity that they're right and that everybody else is wrong and should be converted and apparently...I've discovered that there are many Christian groups these days that don't hold that to be necessarily true and they don't feel like they have to convert everybody and that everybody else is wrong and going to hell if they're not Christian. But it's such a pervasive thing and there are so many things that you have to, you're expected to hold as definite beliefs that I hold more as, okay, that's fine, that could be true. I decided to leave the Christianity and I respected, I think, a lot of it, I know that the Christian ideals influence a lot of my beliefs and my ways of interacting with people but I decided it just wasn't going to work. So I said, alright, well, what am I going to be? Can't really be Jewish. You know, Islam isn't going to work for me. Buddhism just doesn't quite work either. Taoist, is, well, confusing, and... I went through, I was like I don't think I can just convert to another religion but I've got this Druid thing and the whole idea with the Druidism is...I'm searching for some sort of spiritual truth. I sat down one day and said well, that's what I'm doing. Must be, that's my religion. Because I've always spent time looking around and wanting to figure out how things work, why does this happen? What is behind this? Why do things interact in this way. Why, why, why, why, why... And ended up coming to the conclusion that I don't know and I'm never going to know but it doesn't matter that I don't know. At that point I wanted to just decide what works for because what works for everyone else is up to them. But what works for me is up to me. That was my goal. And when people found a religion that helped them to better themselves and put a certain amount of structure into their lives, that was a very important thing, very meaningful and I didn't think it mattered which particular way they chose to do it. Or even if they chose it...I mean if you don't choose a religion that doesn't mean that you're a bad person and it doesn't mean you're not going to be able to organize your life. You just might have a different system of working, or you might just be really confused [cracking up], and disorganized and have no idea what you're doing. I mean, it can go either way. There are plenty of people that have chosen a religion that are confused and disorganized and have no idea what they are doing and they're mean and they knock at people and they try to drive them off the road, and the road rage...I mean it's so much a personal thing is what I decided. I picked Druid because it allowed me that freedom to make it personal. I have my path and other people have theirs...and we can interact. But it doesn't mean that everybody else has to follow my path, nor do I have to follow any one else's.

MS: You've spoken a lot about the spirituality of it. Is there something more material in your Druidism?

MW: Well, I am a recycling Nazi. There are a lot of things along those lines that have become very...it's sort of the material manifestation of my Druidness is this idea of having respect for the earth. This idea of needing to find a balance amongst each individual when everything else is going around them. What that comes down to is...I recycle my cans and bottles and paper. I drive a car that has decent gas mileage. I walk when I can. I try to take care of the planet...pick up the litter when I'm walking around. It's just strange little things like that. That and yelling at my friends when they throw away plastic bottles. I blame that on my religion. There are definitely material things to it. When I am troubled I go to the circle or I go find a tree. Where some people would go to church, they would go talk to their pastor, I go talk to the trees. It works for me, it works for me better. People are confusing...trees make sense. And the trees tend to give me better answers than people do. So...that works for me. There are also small ritualistic things, saying hello to the moon when I see it. Paying attention to the changes in the seasons. I get very frustrated at Carleton because I get so busy and so sleep deprived that I don't see things...I miss full moons completely. I sit there going, 'Oh we should have a full moon celebration this term,' except that the full moon was a week ago. I missed it, and there's not going to be another one until break

MS: [laughs] Yeah, I think that's one of the ideas behind awareness that sometime pops up in Druid literature. Just opening up and realizing what is there and your place and your relation with it and often we get tracked onto these plans and stuff that absorbs everything, all our attention and concentration and we miss a lot of things along the way that really should've been appreciated. What happens to Druids after Carleton? Are you at all worried about this?

MW: What happens to Druids when they leave Carleton?

MS: I see Carleton as being a very nurturing place for Druidism, don't you?

MW: Yes and no. Yes because it's open to that kind of thing and you can say 'I'm a Druid, I'm going to do my Druid thing,' and people are like, 'Really? You spend lots of time in the Arb, aren't you afraid you're going to get lost.' But it's a pretty open place to be something weird like a Druid. But at the same it's so intense and everyone's so busy all the time that you have this whole awareness problem and it's hard to go to tea every week when you have to finish your homework for the next day... In that way I'm really looking forward to leaving Carleton and having time to just sit and watch the flowers grow and think about what are my exact beliefs on this particular subject. Or read about other religions...I want to reread the Tao Te Ching, I haven't read it in ages. There's are things like that...I feel like, for me at least, my religion, my spiritual journey has come to sort of this stagnation because I've been so busy for so long, just spinning my wheels that I haven't had that time to grow myself personally and have my faith, or whatever you want to call it, grow. Because that requires work and contemplation and quiet time.

MS: New vistas, new people to interact with, new environments to brave...?

MW: That could also help but, for me...even just a month of not having to do much other than read books and walk in the woods, I think, would do amazing things for me. [laugh]

MS: I think you're talking about sabbatical, aren't you.

MW: Yeah, but, not a sabbatical of 'I'm going to go live in a cabin on top of a mountain for a while,' but, just stopping the frenzy that you get into at Carleton because you're a student, you're here to learn and once you get past your freshman and sophomore years you get into your major and your major requirements and your upper level classes and a lot of hard things. And you start having to look at what you're doing after Carleton and applying to grad schools and applying for jobs and looking for an apartment to live in. It's a whole big thing. You don't really have time for all that in between all the trying to turn in your assignments and trying to get enough sleep so you don't die and attempting to get your exercise and usually you've got at least three extracurricular activities that you're involved in. That's just hard. If I were a religion major maybe I'd have more time for thinking about these things because it would be along with my school work to some extent. I do have some things that apply in my field. Science is a religion in itself. A fascinating one. I run into all sorts of things that I want to sit and ponder with the classes that I take but it's harder because the things that I want to sit and ponder aren't things that I can really apply to the actual school work. I can apply them to my life in all sorts of interesting ways but I can't put them into the paper, I can't put them into my lab report. 'Gee, this has an interesting corollary to this fascinating spiritual book that I read once,' you know, as a foot note and it's just not really going to work so well. So I think that Carleton is a good place for the Druids. I think that the group is small right now but I think it waxes and wanes. I think it'll get big again.

MS: One of the problems I've noticed, I've talked to many Druids after they've graduated over the years...they've always told me that the greatest problem with continuing the Druidic formula/system of operations is that no place is like Carleton, people are different. It's like starting over from scratch. You spend more time explaining what Druidism isn't than explaining what it is. Once you leave the communal atmosphere of Carleton which is basically like a monastery and you go to Grad school and you see somebody once a week for two hours and you're not living with them, you're not eating with them, you're not going to Folk dance with them, you can't get the level of intimacy you can find at Carleton. You'll see this not just with Carleton alumni but across the board, the college years are a very special period of time when you can build that [side ends]

MS:...this interview with a few more things. So, you're not at all worried about a period of loneliness at all, or perhaps never being able to have this kind of experience again.

MW: See, the thing is that the people that I was close to and developed those relationship with graduated last spring for the most part. So for me, this has been my transition, this year has been my lonely period. This was my year to sit there and go, 'Oh my goodness, my friends have all left. Who do I talk to, what do I do now.' I still have the Druids but they're all younger than me now. They're people that I know and I'm friendly with but they're not my...I'm not close to them in the way that I was close to the people that have gone away. So for me graduating is actually going to be... a liberation from that seclusion that I've been in for this year because I'll be going to a place where a lot of my friends live and I'll be having that community again...not the same way, but more so actually than I've been having it here. I am going to be sad to leave behind this place because it is a very special place and there's a lot that is going to change. There's not going to be so many nights of sitting up late, eating pizza, discussing philosophy. Because that just doesn't happen so much when people have jobs. But I've had five years of that. I've enjoyed it, I've savored it and I think it's ok that that period in my life is coming to an end. I think having this year has given me time to think about that. Like, 'Well, okay, this is the way life progresses.' We're having a lot of people who maybe didn't have this strange intermediate year that I've had... I know my friends that all graduated last year...they were upset, they were sad, everyone was leaving but for me, I'm sort of late and I'm following everybody. I'm way behind yelling 'Hey, wait for me, I'm coming.' So...no, I'm not too worried about it. I'm really looking forward to it because I think it's time for me to not be at Carleton anymore because a lot of the people here, I don't relate to them in the same way anymore, I'm not at that level of...you know, it's almost like I'm one foot out of the community already cause there is this whole community of monks or whatever it is here... I've started taking off my monk's robes already. It's actually harder for me to sit and have these experiences with the people that are still in that mind set than it is for me to have experiences with people that have already moved out of it. So when I go off I think that the fact that the Druid thing has already become very personal for me...I think that'll be alright that I'm not going to have the little Druid community.

MS: You have a little portable version in you now?

MW: I think I've got a portable version at this point. I've been working on it for a long time and I've got...it's contained, it's good. So I think that I may find some church of some sort, I don't know...pick a religion and find a friendly group of people that are interested in things that I'm interested in and maybe I'll hang with them for a while and see what I can learn from them. As well as getting reacquainted with some of the friends that I haven't spent time with in a long time. And then just the quiet time with just me.

MS: Quiet time, yes, quiet time.

MW: It's good.

MS: Talk about outside. What kinds of...were there any outside influences on the Druids during your last four or five years. Any people who popped in or people or outside events that really changed or effected the Druid community at all.

MW: We've had a few townies, as far as outsiders, there was Rob for a while, and there's Doug, these days. And Julianne has been in and out. They're just kind of visitors. They're fun. They kind of pop in and are like, hey, what are you guys up to now. Spend our time together. Outside events...hmm...

MS: Thinks that [unintelligible] riled them up or...

MW: There was the loss of our north stone. That kind of riled us up. It just disappeared one day...somebody stole. We got it back so quickly that it was kind of confusing. We just...it took a while to adjust to the fact that that was actually a different stone.

MS: Have you had much difficulty with some of the Christian groups on campus or anything like that.

MW We really haven't.

MS: Because I know you went through the millennium period...

MW [laughs] Yeah, year two thousand, Y2K. No, I don't remember any difficulties there. We're on pretty good terms with all the other religious groups on campus. Not so much this year but last year we would occasionally try to get things happening with the Unitarians and the Druids simultaneously.

MS: I always called the Unitarians the indoor Druids.

MW: Yeah, they call us the outdoor Unitarians. [laughs]

MS: [laughs]

MW: That always amuses me. Actually there's been a little bit of difficulty with CRU, the Council for Religious Understanding because we've had Druids on that for, I don't even know how long.

MS: [unintelligible] '84, I think. Off and on.

MW: And there's actually no Druid on the Council at the moment. It was...well, Irony was on it back when I first got here. When he and I went for a little while then. When he graduated and I had to leave it was Ehren that took over. Chloe and Ehren both...they were in it for quite a while. Then Chloe left and I started going. So we had two Druids for quite some time. What ended up happening was that it got very frustrating for us and I think it got frustrating for a lot of the non-theistic, or non specifically theistic...basically for anyone that wasn't Judeo-Christian. It got very frustrating in a lot of ways to continue going to CRU. It started off being a really fascinating and great thing to me but then we hit a certain barrier where we'd...the topics of conversation could only go so far and then we'd run into things of...they'd just start bringing in these topics of conversation that, I was slowly realizing...these have no application to the Druids, and then I'd start talking to the Unitarians...oh...there's no application for the Unitarians either. Or the Quakers. And the Hindu's are just kind of confused. A lot of little things where...it's really a wonderful thing to have, CRU, but it's difficult because it is started from this sort of Judeo-Christian perspective and, although they mean very well it gets hard because what they see as important and want to discuss, we can't quite relate to, but at the same time we have a very difficult time explaining to them that, 'Well, this just doesn't apply, this just isn't something that's useful for us. We're fine to talk about it as it applies to you but we can't talk about how it applies to us because it doesn't. That just got sort of difficult. I keep meaning to go in and talk to Carolyn about this, the Chaplain, because she's a wonderful lady and I think she likes the Druids, she sounds quite fascinated by us. I know that she's really...she very much wants to foster understanding amongst all of the groups on the campus. I think that she probably just hasn't realized that...where these difficulties come in. We had a progression of people. One of our people was Will. He's a philosophy major. He was actually there for the Buddhists rather than for us because he was in the Zen Meditation group. He ended up getting asked to leave because he was not communicating in a helpful way or something...the thing is that I was there and what we were hitting was this barrier of him saying that, well that doesn't mean anything to me, that doesn't apply to my life or my spirituality and trying to explain it and I think he came off as confrontational. He was not trying to be...I was present for some of what was happening and it was a matter of one person trying to explain, 'This means nothing to me' and the other person saying 'How, does it not mean anything to you?' 'There's nothing here to be discussed,' and then the frustration on both sides of 'We're not communicating here' and I felt bad because I could see, very much I could see where he was coming from and I could see where none of this was malicious on the other side. So we lost...Will was no longer able to be on CRU, I was very sick of being on CRU because we kept repeating topics and I'd been on it a long time. So I had left but we wanted to have somebody so we sent Corwin. Corwin went very dutifully and after a term emailed me and said 'You know, I really don't like this, it doesn't apply to us, I don't understand how we're supposed to communicate.'

We hit that a lot...trying to explain to people what we are and what we do and, no, that doesn't apply to us. They don't always understand. And we're almost as marginalized as the Christians on this campus sometimes because this campus is much cooler to be Jewish or Atheist or something that's not Christian. If you're Christian they're like, 'Oh, you're Christian,' [dismissive voice] But the Druids they kind of go to the other side. You're too far to the other end. You're strange and what you do isn't legitimate. I got very upset, actually, this fall because they were going to have a Tarot workshop in the Rec Center and it was supposed to be this fun thing, they were having somebody come in and they were going to tell how to do Tarot readings and do some readings and they canceled it at the last minute, the administration did, I'm not sure who was in charge. I never could figure out why. They said that it was because of the advertising, and it was something along the lines of that the advertising made it seem like it could give you more concrete answers than it really could and that that wasn't something that Carleton should support. But I just found myself very insulted. I was like, 'Now, if you had been having...' they have so many discussions on various Christian ideals and various...oh, they had the evolution guy come in at one point and talk about how, he was the creationist guy and he was saying how Evolution was bull-honkey. They had him come in and nobody complained about that even though, how is a guy coming into say how God created the world and all of it's inhabitants anymore scientific and concrete than somebody coming in and explaining how to do Tarot readings and the history of it and the ideas of what it can accomplish. I don't see any difference there. To me, Tarot has played a part in my spirituality. It's something that means something to me. For me it's a ritual to do and it helps me order my thoughts. It's like prayer would be for some people or saying a rosary would be for a Catholic. Basically they said 'Oh, this is something that's just not legitimate and we can't have that' and got rid of it with no notice what so ever. I was just like, wow...if I were an actual organized religion I could make such a stink about this. But I can't really...and I'm not sure what to do. A lot of us talked about it amongst ourselves, we never did decide who we should talk to or who we could say anything to about how we were really sort of insulted and wished that they kept that, or something.

MS: When you say organized...you're a funded group on campus, right?

MW: Yes

MS: You've got a charter, a constitution in, hold regular meetings, officers, elections. Was there any kind of communal arrangements made to stay in the same dorms together.

MW: No.

MS: No...

MW: No. We did have second Myers once...had almost all of the Druids on it, but that was just by virtue of all of us being friends and a lot of...I ended up, I lived in Goodhue that year. But, there were two of the three Archdruids lived on second Myers that year and a lot of the people. But as far as like a Druid house or anything of that sort...no, we've never done anything of that sort. No we've never done that.

MS: Too organized?

MW: People always have different goals of where they want to live, what kind of living arrangements they want and...besides, I think if we spent all of our time together we'd hate each other.

MS: Quite possibly.

MW: That's my take, I don't know.

MS: There's pretty amazing things that happened over at Farmhouse back in the eighties, clothing optional house was, I think, the official name. There was a lot roommate changes over a period of a couple years.

MW: There was Religious Diversity house, that one year, and that kind of went up in smoke.

MS: Yep...

MW: Religious animosity house, is what we tend to recall... refer to it these days.

MS: Time to wrap up with a couple questions like...now that you're departing and have only six weeks left, what would the key pieces of advice you would leave behind to bequeath your wisdom onto the next generation.

MW: Recruit, recruit, recruit at the beginning of the year. You got to get freshman interested before everybody else gets them interested. I think the main reason we're so small this year is because we fell down in the recruiting this fall. I was recruiting for Assassins and left the two new guys to recruit. They didn't recruit hard enough because they'd never done it before. That would be number one because otherwise you lose the numbers and then it's really hard to do things. Number two would be...stay friendly with all the administration. The best and easiest way to get things done. If they see you as a responsible organized group of people they will respond to you so much better than if they think you're a bunch of crazy freaks that are just going to leave messes everywhere. I think...be friendly and open is the main thing...if you're in charge of things. Pay attention to who comes to things, try to remember names...be aware of what's going on because the best way to insure that the Druids are going to do well and have people that keep coming is if they see you as a friendly and welcoming group. That kind of falls to the leaders to go up and say, 'Why hi Bob, I'm glad you came again, how are you doing.' Whenever they show up. If you fall down on that and you're all just talking amongst yourselves when new people come in and they sit there and they're like 'Oh, I don't know anybody and I'm bored,' they leave and then they don't come back again. But if they come and your nice and you talk to them and you ask them, hey, so what's your major... [laughs] then they feel like, 'Ok, that was fun, I liked that, I'll bring my other friend next time. Then you get more people and the more people it is the more fun it is. The more the merrier, that's the way it goes. I love when we have a huge group of people somewhere. It spreads out the workload, it gives you tons of new people to talk to and it's just fun, and you can plan more things.

MS: Anything to avoid?

MW: Don't do Morris dances that involve sticks in the dark. We made that mistake once. I don't think anybody got hurt. That'd be the main one.

MS: So you're final [unintelligible] next couple of years for the Druids, stay on course, steady as usual...

MW: Yeah, I think they're doing ok. Steve-o and Corwin know what they're doing. They just need to be assertive about grabbing people and bringing them in. They're on top of things. They've been there and helping with all of the events since their freshman years. Corwin's a sophomore and Steve-o's a junior. They know, they've been there. Corwin is setting up a sweatlodge for the first time himself, tonight, or being in charge of setting it up.

MS: Who's going to lead it?

MW: That's a good question. Steve-o probably, I've been teaching him how to go about leading things, I think he led one this fall and did fine. I would lead one but I'm sick and I don't think I'm going to be sweating tonight. If Ehren sweats he may lead one. I don't know if he will though because we're going out for dinner tonight. Sweating on a full stomach is going to be interesting.

MS: Alright, that seems to be about all the questions I can think of right now so I think we're going to close the interview officially now and thank you very much for listening, we appreciate it.

Interview with David Fisher '65 Founder of Reformed Druidism

August 27, 2004.

Speaker Phone.

DF = David Fisher

MS = Mike Scharding

Michael Scharding: Question number one. Introduce yourself, tell us who you are and where you're from and what it was like when you were growing up

David Fisher: I'm David Fisher. I was born in San Bernadino, California, but raised in a suburb of St. Louis, Missouri, called Webster Groves. Webster Groves was a typical middle class American, Midwestern suburb. I attended grade school there and then attended high school at the St. Louis country day school before going to Carleton College.

MS: What would you say your parents backgrounds are?

DF: You mean background in terms of what, education?

MS: Education, religion, or cultural interests?

DF: My father was raised on a farm in a small town called Foley Missouri and went to Westminster College in Fulton where he graduated in sociology. He spent his career as, mostly, manufactures representative although he had also auto management as a purchasing agent and the director of a small company. My mother was born in Cape Toronto, Missouri. She went to Sweet Burner College but did not complete college. She majored in Latin and in English. Both of them were interested in current events; my mother more than my father. My father enjoyed classical music a great deal. They were both active in the Presbyterian church, of which they were active members. Both were deacons in that church. My father became an elder later in his life.

MS: So you'd say that your parents were, perhaps, future role models for you?

DF: I think so. They both stressed the value of higher education. My grandfather was also a role model. My grandfather Dearthmont. He was an attorney and became chief council in Missouri Pacific Railroad and eventually president of that railroad. He was very interested in discussing current events and issues and when we went to his house for dinner on Sundays we would typically have such discussions.

MS: So you were always being introduced to new ideas and kept fresh with the changing of the times?

DF: Yes that's true.

MS: As a child did you have any tendency towards pranks or have a sense of humor in your family?

DF: Oh, no more than usual I suppose. My brother and I both enjoyed a good laugh and so forth. I can't remember anything specific.

MS: Ok. What kinds of clubs and activities were you involved in when you were in high school?

DF: I was involved in the debate club, eventually became vice-president of that, also involved in singing, glee club I believe. I was a manager of the cross country team in high school. For a while I was active in the Order of DeMolay but that was only for about two years.

MS: Is that like Freemasonry?

DF: Yes, Freemasonry. My father was an active freemason and encouraged me to do that, so I did.

MS: I'm not very familiar with Freemasonry, how would you describe that.

DF: I think it's a combination of social service and boys gathering to bond with each other, engage in some rather harmless rituals. To be honest with you it's been so long I can't really remember much. It tells you the impression it made that it only lasted a year. I decided not to go on for the higher whatever. It was too silly.

MS: So, how did you come around to picking Carleton? What were you looking for in a college?

DF: I was looking for a good education. My parents strongly encouraged me to look at Carleton. I had applied and been accepted at Kenyon College. Both my parents said, 'look, you've been to an all boys' high school, we think you should go to a co-ed college.' I think that was a good decision.

MS: So did you visit Carleton before you applied?

DF: Yes I did.

MS: You did. Was there anything that cinched it for you?

DF: I really can't remember. I'd been accepted at Kenyon, as I said, and at Westminster, my fathers alma mater. I was on the waiting list at Harvard. I eventually did get in but decided I didn't want to go to a big school, that I would rather be at a small school and that's why I went to Carleton.

MS: What were your early memories of Carleton, like the transition from home, your clubs, I believe you were a member of the radio station and such?

DF: Yes, I was very active in K-A-R-L; I think it would be fair to say that was my primary activity, secondary activity was players, the theater group. Both of those were very important to me at Carleton. The first year, like many freshman, I tried to find my way. I remember feeling a bit lost at the beginning. But I also remember finding an activity I could relate to in the radio station and in theater. Both which were, as I say, important to me.

MS: Would you say the radio activity was an outgrowth of your interest in current events?

DF: Yes...yes. I was always interested in current events and public speaking, debate. I'd been to the debate club in high school so this was a chance to continue those interests.

MS: Any of the other future Druid members also in the KARL club.

DF: Neither of the two co-founders, Norman Nelson and Robert Larson, neither of them were, I think, active in KARL. I think Norman, from my vague memory, and Bob may have both been on the fringe of players but it's been a long time.

MS: How would you describe the early '60s?

DF: Time of transition. I think it would be fair to say that most of us at Carleton had no doubt at all that we would eventually find a place, a job as good or better than our parents. We had confidence, which is not the case now. What we were concerned about was finding meaningful work, something that we would find not only enjoyable but worthwhile. And when the war began to preoccupy us all, and the civil rights struggle, for many us this became a focus of our energy and attention.

MS: Ok. You mentioned the civil rights act and the cold war, how much apart of that was daily life at Carleton?

DF: At the beginning, not much. There was a chapter of STF and there was a chapter of the civil rights group. Both of those constantly encouraged the rest of us to be more active. I suppose, partly because I was involved in radio and was doing a lot of news broadcasting I decided not to get involved, but to be an observer, although I was sympathetic to both causes. There was also a fair play for Cuba committee. People like Ben Starr. And others were certainly active leaders in those movements. But you ask was it part of our daily fare? No, no it wasn't. We were taking classes and involved in activities and Carleton was a fairly all consuming activity.

MS: What would you say your favorite classes at Carleton were?

DF: Oh, that's hard. I think I really valued my history classes with Catherine Boyd. Medieval history, Russian history, Byzantine History. I enjoyed the classes with Carlton Qualey (sp?) although I didn't find American history then as fascinating as European history. Ironically, although I now teach philosophy, I didn't find the philosophy courses all that stimulating. Martin Eschelmann (sp?) was about the most boring teacher I've ever had. A good man, but a rigid analytic thinker and Kantian. Philosophy at Carleton at the time was analytic, not continental and therefore from my point of view, boring. So I took the classes, minored in Philosophy but, at the time didn't make much impression on me.

MS: What was your major?

DF: History.

MS: Do you remember your comps project?

DF: Yes I do, it was a philosophy of history project. I compared Crochet (Sp?) and Collingwood on philosophy of history, and I actually still have the thing somewhere floating around. Although I have not taught philosophy of history professionally more than once or twice it remains an interest.

MS: I guess one topic that was current at Carleton at the time was the en loco parentis rules. How were those changing and what events led up to the Druids taking on one of those rules?

DF: Very interesting time. I think Carleton suffered from the blessings of being liberal. John Nason, bless his heart, was a sincere philosophically inclined Quaker. A decent guy, a little uptight. Not inclined to suffer fools gladly and he hated the idea of being repressive. Of course, you can't be totally without any kind of rules and students, especially some of the more radically students pushed the envelope wherever they could in things like personal dress or even personal hygiene.

There were protests about many things, but among them protests about the religious requirement. Sure enough, eventually, of course, as you know, it was dealt with by a responsible group of students who met and endlessly discussed it until it eventually became a non issue. We, at the time, had a choice of a Sunday evening program, which was basically culture, or going to college chapel service; that was actually pretty good, David Maitland is a fine preacher and the choir was excellent.

MS: I've done an interview with Maitland before.

DF: Yea, very bright. Very powerful preacher. Or you could go to town, one of the churches in town, but you had to do one of those things and many people thought that was too much. So the way the Druids got started, I've tried to tell this to other people who've called me and listened to me over the years; it's really very simple, one night Norman Nelson, Howard Cherniack, and myself were having one drink too many and were trying to figure out what we could do to deal with this requirement which we all thought was fairly silly and we decided, because I'd been reading something in one of my history classes about the ancient druids, why don't we start a group called the Reformed Druids of North America. What we tried to set up was essentially a Hobson's choice. If the college gave us credit for attending these ridiculous services we would expose them for the farce they certainly were. If they didn't give us credit we would protest about religious oppression and lack of decency. That is how it began. It was a bunch of guys sitting around, having a drink, having a joke. It was not due to any kind of mystical experience, any kind of transcendental moment. All the things that people keep saying must have been the case just were not the case.

MS: Do you think this is how some other religions have started?

DF: Oh, I wouldn't presume to know. I have no idea. But certainly, I think, it would be fair to say that the Druids, at least in terms of the founders, Howard, Norman, and myself were not meant as a serious alternative to religion. We just didn't think of it that way. We thought of having a good time, we sort of dreamed a piece up here and a piece up there, improvising as we went along the way people I suppose sometimes do. That's how it started.

MS: Ok, lets talk about a couple of those pieces here. I've interviewed about fifteen previous Arch Druids at Carleton and they all have the same questions.

DF: Yes?

MS: One of the things, where did you find/come up with the idea of the druid sigil.

DF: I believe I had read texts such as Jessie Weston, and also Frazer. I'd taken Intro Religion and Intro World Religions and had more than a passing interest in English history and knew something about the Arthurian material. It's very hard to reconstruct all this time later what precise texts I may have read at the time. But that was the general kind of the material. I think, if I were going to be very accurate I would say that there were essentially two foundings of the druids at Carleton. There was the one that was started by Norman, Howard, and myself je n'ai spree (sp?), which, you know, became more than a je n'ai spree because, if you do something week after week its hard to maintain a farce. We began to be a little more reflective and meditative; brought in some poetry, some song. Peter Basquin composed a very nice chant. That continued through my time at Carleton. Then when I was on the way to a graduation, David Frangquist came and expressed a strong interest in moving from mere casual participation to leadership. And, my memory is that David went on a vigil and had some kind of either visionary experience or at least deeply meaningful personal experience. Something transpired that moved him, whether his heart was strangely warmed or his mind was strangely expanded, I don't know. What I do know is that when we went through a ceremony of ordination David became the next Arch Druid. I think it would be fair to say that he refounded the Druids.

MS: I would agree with that.

DF: He essentially took what had been a protest against religion requirement and an occasional exercise in panentheistic speculation and turned it into, if not a religion, something like a religion. And, when I've gotten letters and emails from successor Arch Druids I've always said the same thing: if you have a question about the meaning of this ask David.

MS: David's very charismatic.

DF: Because, yeah, I think it served a need for him in a way that it may not have some of the rest of us. That's the best of my recollection but I've tried to get these...it's been very embarrassing actually over the years to get these strange messages from these people who take it quite seriously and who ask me for guidance when I have absolutely no interest in continuing to guide anything. I mean I'm happy that they're happy and I don't want them be depressed or anything but neither do I feel called upon to lead the Reformed Druids or guide the Reformed Druids.

MS: I understand that. Usually when each succeeding Arch Druid, there's about forty of them now...

DF: Oh my lord.

MS: Yeah, it's a long series, I was number thirty. When one Arch Druid leaves it's pretty much an unspoken rule that you disappear for a few years and let the next Arch Druid do their own thing, start over from scratch, so to speak.

DF: Yeah, I've heard reports over the years that it's, they've told me that it's changed from year to year.

MS: Yeah.

DF: It's been different things for different peoples.

MS: Yeah, some people go on a Native American angle, so people go Zen. A couple of the groups over in California, spin-offs from Larson's, have pretty much found it sufficient for its own purposes and just stayed with it and so they've gone on a Celtic angle and stayed with it for many years. So it's pretty much systematized and become permanent. But, Carleton has always been such a rotational kind of grove that nothing stays for more than two or three years. Just the spirit gets passed on, not much of the customs.

DF: Hm. I also remember John Messenger being fascinated as an anthropologist in this local phenomenon on his own campus and trying to study it, interviewing some of us, and I remember, oh goodness, it must have been twenty years ago, running into Carlton Qualey (Sp?) at some meeting and him asking me, David, didn't study about Joseph Smith? The implication being, I suppose, that one should've thought ahead. And at the time neither three of us really thought ahead. I think Howard, if I remember correctly, ended up being a lawyer, practicing in Canada, probably took it the least serious.

MS: Right. He seemed more interested in the protest.

DF: Yes, that was Howard. Norman, I think, was ambivalent. Like myself, Anglican, Episcopal. I don't that Norman went on and entered the ministry or not.

MS: He's now a deacon.

DF: He's a deacon. Which does not surprise me. A permanent deacon?

MS: Yes.

DF: Yeah, and I'm a priest. I suppose those ritual impulses took that course. And that's where it is. It's been, on the one hand, interesting to watch something that one started take on a life of its own utterly beyond any extent that any of us could have ever imagined. None of us imagined this thing would last more than four or five years. And as I say I think its largely through David's charisma and David's dedication in refounding it.

MS: Yeah, cause it's collapsed a couple times along the way.

DF: Yeah, I've heard that. I've heard that David has had some role or other in assisting it.

MS: Well, yeah. Usually there's three or four old Arch Druids who look after the group.

DF: Yeah.

MS: And they check in every couple years and if its not there they show up and find a couple interested students and then they leave again.

DF: Huh.

MS: And the group just... It's kind of liking shocking a battery in a car.

DF: Yeah, yeah, yeah.

MS: You've just got to shock it once in a while.

DF: Well, I suppose, given people's need for alternative spiritualities, the Druids are like a template on a word processor that can be filled in with a number of contents and I suppose that's a good thing. At least I'm not sad for it, I just want good news some times and I get letters addressed 'Dear Reverend Brother in the Mother.' But that's life.

MS: Going back to one of the earlier origin points. So you're not quite sure where the symbol came from?

DF: No, I'm really not. I'm not sure whether that was Howard or Norman or myself. It just seemed the closing of the circle with two lines through it meant something.

MS: Kind of resembles a greek letter.

DF: Yes, yes it did.

MS: I think it's phi.

DF: Yes, it does indeed. I was learning a little bit of Greek then. It could have been the idea of Sola Sofia mother wisdom.

MS: Oh, that makes sense.

DF: It could have been that. It also had, for some people, affinities to the peace sign. The idea of closing the circle is certainly a major notion of world mythology so it could be that. To be honest with you I just don't know. I don't think Norman or Howard would know. We all used it, it made perfect sense to us at the time and danged if I could figure out how it happened, it just happened, like everything else.

MS: We've gone through a couple books of symbols and no one else has ever used it before; something so simple.

DF: Maybe it's just the creativity of, I guess I must've dreamed it up but I don't know where it came from.

MS: One of the other mysteries is the origins of Dalon Ap Landu.

DF: That, I think, was a phrase discovered by Norman, or by someone else, a member of the Druids, in their research, as a phrase meaning lord of the groves. And we adapted it. I can't honestly remember who it was that dug that up.

MS: That's another one that kind of went like a snark quest. A couple people have gone through books of dictionaries and books of mythology and of course they're never able to find it.

DF: Nope. Someone dug it up but, you know, I can't remember which Druid it was that may have done that or not. I just remember someone came up with it and we all thought it was a good idea so we add it.

MS: Actually its kind of fun because, since there is no origin for it, it's also very flexible for usage.

DF: Yep. Like everything else.

MS: You mention before that you were studying Norse and Celtic mythology. Before expounding it and I believe Frangquist also did some research.

DF: Yes. I believe David probably did more because, as I say, he got very serious about it and, having decided he wanted to be part of this he'd better find out more about the implications and off he went. But I don't know what David read because we haven't been in contact for years.

MS: I'm pretty sure of what he read because when I was doing my own research I found his name in all the books I was reading.

DF: Well, I wouldn't doubt it. That would make sense.

MS: Also, one of the things that happened when they were making the Green Book, of Meditations...

DF: Yep.

MS: We have noticed that most of the selections that you contributed were actually from the Hindu texts.

DF: Yes. I did have a copy of hymns and Rig Veda, arguably one of the oldest texts of Religious tradition in the world. And so yes, I used that.

MS: I think the other David was more interested in Zen.

DF: Yes, that's true.

MS: Which was actually quite popular at the time.

DF: Yeah, yeah. Very much so. The Carleton in Japan program, Bardwell Smith teaching in comparative religion was an influence, I think, on many people.

MS: The concept of vigiling...was that taken from medieval literature?

DF: I think that was either, I can't remember whether it was I or Norman, the idea that one had a vigil before one would enter into some serious calling, like knighthood. One of us came up with that idea. All I remember is, no one really being very excited about it except David. He really wanted to try it out and indeed that's what he did.

MS: We were also thinking, is it the Catholic priesthood they vigil before their ordination?

DF: Yeah, that's true.

MS: That's where we figured that came from.

DF: Yeah, I think probably either Norman or I, both of us interested in medieval literature and medieval history would have remembered that. But again, I didn't take notes at the time because, obviously, I didn't think I was founding something for thirty, forty years.

MS: One of the things that happened in the first year is that you, they set up ten orders, or they tried to.

DF: Tried to.

MS: Tried to. I think they got as far as seven before they got tired.

DF: Yep.

MS: I believe that's the same number of orders that's in Scottish masonry.

DF: You know, ten just seemed like a good number.

MS: Ten's always a good...but

DF: Laughing. I'm sorry to be disillusioning but it just...it seemed like a good number. I suppose we were fascinated with the ideas of levels, of hierarchies. In the literature of science fantasy, things like Tolkienn and others there's the idea of levels of adeptness and wisdom. I must admit we were all readers of science fiction or science fantasy so that must have had some impact on us. But again, I don't know because we didn't go about annotating what we were doing.

MS: David during his first year put together the Chronicles...

DF: Yes.

MS: What did you think of that.

DF: I thought it was pretty fun.

MS: Yeah, I thought so too.

DF: I mean, it'd be the mock old English and the laying it out in columns like biblical texts was funny. The level of imaginative reconstruction, shall we say, was high. So I thought it was a pretty good piece of work, it was funny. It was funny for me at least to read. I don't know how Norman reacted to it, but I thought it was pretty funny.

MS: Let's see here, early missionary activities. Norman, I think, set up the first out of Carleton Grove.

DF: I remember hearing that, yeah.

MS: David also did one.

DF: Yep.

MS: And I think you set up something in New York for a while.

DF: Oh, I thought about it. It really never got off the ground. I think the Basquins, Peter and Katie, tried to do that. But they were busy establishing themselves professionally. I was busy and so it never really took off.

MS: From that activity the idea of forming a council developed.

DF: Yes. I suppose at that time I felt somewhat responsible having started the ball rolling down the hill to offer what helpful observations I could. So I didn't disagree with the council and, early on at least, continued to try to exercise some benign influence on it.

MS: One of the fun things about the council is that nothing has really been done with it since '71 after the priestess issue was finished.

DF: Yep, I heard that.

MS: Mainly because no ones been able to find everybody, or able to get a unanimity on the issues.

DF: Not surprising.

MS: People were afraid that...like during the '70s that if it could become a majority one then it might actually become functional. And the more it said the less it would be Druidical. As you said before, sometimes less is more in the way of organization.

DF: Where two Druids are gathered together there are at least three opinions.

MS: I think that's now pretty much a legend actually. Everyone has said that at least once so far in their interviews. So, it was set up and groves started to spring up around the country, and disappeared almost as frequently.

DF: Yep.

MS: How would you describe the other founders in character? Like, for example Larson, or Nelson.

DF: Oh gosh, that's a hard question. I really wouldn't want to presume. I think of all of us, Howard certainly, from the very beginning, I think, saw this as a vehicle for social protest and as it became obvious that people were taking it seriously...I don't think he was so much irritated as just bemused. Sort of as in, 'what on earth is happening? Don't these people understand how this started? Are they all insane?' And we explained to Howard, 'no, people are not insane; they're just taking it a different direction.' Norman, I think, found it more significant, very early on. I'm not quite sure how. And I certainly found myself moved by the way in which something that had started as a good natured way of trying to challenge authority had become a source for some people, at least, of meaning and significance. And I felt responsible for that. If people were finding something of meaning it, even if I personally didn't, it seemed to me inappropriate to do anything that would undermine those individual's quest for value and meaning.

MS: I can understand that.

DF: Although it was often to pummel me, something as amorphous and as non-defined would do that. I mean Zen, after all, which you mentioned, and Hinduism are both traditions that have long histories and considerable literature and a very very strong discipline of practice. Certainly in Zen that's true. And it's true in Hinduism in terms of ritual. The Druids never made those kinds of demands on people. So it always is puzzling to me that something which made so little demand on anyone would fill the needs of someone, but apparently it did. So, there we are. I don't have much more than that to add about my cofounders except that I'm sorry to hear about Bob.

MS: How would you say that your observations of early spread of Druidism ties in with your understanding of Christianity started.

DF: Well, the only similarity I can think of is that Christianity emerged in the Hellenistic period and a syncretistic environment in which there was a mixing of many different religious ideas. And certainly our culture, in the '60s and '70s was highly syncretistic. Not multi-cultural in the contemporary sense but syncretistic in the sense there was an interest in overlooking traditional boundaries and finding something meaningful that would not necessarily be as constraining. There were a lot of things going on, so to the extent that the cultures were similar, I think that's the link. I don't think it's the link in terms of the rather highly evangelical character of the first Christian missionaries. And the first urban Christians simply were not, from what I can read about them, that much like the first Reformed Druids.

MS: For me I think the Druids have pretty much been there and people came to them.

DF: Yep.

MS: And people left just as quickly.

DF: Yep.

MS: So, in that sense I think that they're different, they don't have a driving mission to make more Druids.

DF: No.

MS: Though like you said, if they show up you feel obligated.

DF: It is true. I think the druids have met a need for a lot of people.

MS: We've got about ten questions left.

DF: I think the Druids essentially fill the need for people looking for meaning who are not ready at that particular point in their life to make the kind of commitment that most institutional religion demands. That's what they do. They offer a placeholder that may be filled later by something that's more sustaining, more involving, more definitive. I think that's good. That's the Druids at their best.

MS: Yeah, I've always described it as being a way station along the road.

DF: Yep, that's what it is.

MS: Also, I've seen it more as Norman describes. He describes it more as a supplement rather than a supplanting.

DF: That's something he, I remember early on, said that. I think the only danger with something like the Druids is that, for some people, it becomes an excuse for staying in spiritual kindergarten the rest of their life. It was never meant, by any of the founders, certainly—I don't even think David—it was never meant to be a genuine alternative world religion. We didn't set it up that way. It has no doctrine to speak of except a vague kind of pantheistic matron theology. It has very little ethical importance, except sort of benign concern for nature and ecology. Perhaps some pacifism. It has no notion of divinity other than a pantheistic one, or panentheistic one. So it wasn't meant to be a replacement for religion. I think meant at its best to help people on their way find something, but then they should move on. If someone stayed a Druid all his or her life that would be unfortunate from my point of view.

MS: I've only known a couple people, mostly in California, who pretty much stayed only in Druidry. Most people go on to find another religion and usually with a renewed appreciation for nature.

DF: Which is great. If the Druids do that then they've done their job.

MS: That's what I think.

DF: And frankly if that's what the Druids are then I don't feel so bad about what happened. You know, I've said to many Arch Druids before, it's a weird thing that something that you start take on such a life of its own. But I guess in some ways, really, what I said to you earlier really remains true. It was restarted by David and so whatever it is now, it's as much his work as it is mine.

MS: I have a couple question for you now.

DF: Ok.

MS: At the end of Carleton, you were starting to feel a greater certainty of vocation.

DF: Yep.

MS: How would you describe how that developed and how you made the transition to seminary?

DF: I was given the Rockefeller fellowship, called trial year ministry. It was meant for people like me, at the time, who thought they might be interested in the ordained ministry but weren't sure. I discovered in union was that, at the time at least, I was not ready to commit myself to full time ordained ministry. I was ready to commit to teaching. And then I got the call to England, frontier in terms of missionary duty. It became even clearer that I was called to teach, although I didn't ask for work in England as a lay person. I mean the question was what, a whole year of philosophy at St. Louis U. was not the life I'd hoped as it would be and I went to Vanderbilt. It was only while doing a PhD at Vanderbilt in the department of religion, systematic philosophical theology, that I really decided that I also wanted to seek ordination. I was working then in the student chapel, with the Reverend John Hatcher, who was a philosophical complex, very good, person. At one point he said, 'David, if you're gonna play the shaman's role you might as well wear the shaman's rank. You might as well do the process (hard to hear next piece).'' But it didn't happen over night. After many conversations with John I found, yeah, that was something with a meaning to me and it has been for the rest of my professional career.

MS: What do you define as a vocation?

DF: Vocation is a direction towards which one feels pulled or sometimes I supposed is pushed. It centers one's life and gives purpose.

MS: Here's a broad question for you; what is the role of religion in life.

DF: You know, I think it's as fundamental, as Tillich said, as the depth dimension of culture. Religion in a culture is what expresses what is spirit in that culture. And at the same time is institution. I think religion helps people direct themselves toward that energy and transform it. What I mean by that is that while there may well be mysterious spiritual depth working in any culture, it takes an active institution with a tradition, a text, a discipline to turn that amorphous spirituality into practical action, into moral imperatives, into concerns for peace and justice, for tolerance and understanding. That's the kind of thing, I think, that at is best, religion does. It transforms what is vague and morphous and unspecific into something that is quite specific with very clear implications for how people live their life.

MS: And when does religion go wrong?

DF: I think religion goes wrong when it thinks, or its leaders think, I admit, or adherents think that they have the final absolute answer to all questions and ought to impose those answers on other people. Certainty is a fine thing. Thinking that gives you license to impose your certainty on someone else is a bad idea because if it doesn't grow from within it's not your own. Everything I know about religion says that you can offer, you can entice, you can lead, you can suggest, and almost (????) in words, but you can't make someone else have whatever you find significant. They have to find it themselves.

MS: What is the role of nature in religion as you understand it?

DF: Well it's something that, at least in Christianity, is seen as an expression of creative love and requiring creative care. That's the simplest way I can describe it. What has been created and given in love ought to be cared for with love, fostered, nurtured, not harmed. And that's about as clear as I can make it. I know there's a lot of talk about creationist spirituality from Eraneus (sp?) to the present and I think that's a good dimension of our spiritual heritage. But in general I think that's what it is. Nature is after all the vehicle through which the spirit moves and expresses itself.

MS: Do you think that people in bygone ages had a better understanding or appreciation than they do now?

DF: No. I just think that probably people have less mediated lives. The culture we live in is a highly mediate one. We interact through electronic means, through a very abstract symbolic language, and through very complex institutions. And people like me spend most of their lives interacting in that world of secondary or tertiary or even quaternary symbolism. No, I don't think we are any better or worse than our ancestors. We are certainly less driven, but every now and then we get reminded, from hurricanes or from plagues that nature remains a force that is not totally mastered for our disposal. But no, the difference is we're mediated in more ways than I think our ancestors were. At least the mediation has more layers, that's a better way of saying it.

MS: And I think that's one thing that Druidry tries to do is bring you to a primary experience.

DF: Yep. Best regarded religion. Every religion I know insists that there is the difference between the thinking about the experience and the institution organization for the experience and the texts recording the experience, and the experience. And whether it's in worship or meditation or reading or prayer...yeah, the plan of the whole apparatus is to nurture and sustain that experience.

MS: Ok. Well after you were ordained, where did you go onto?

DF: Oh, the rest of my story is fairly boring. I was ordained and for the last thirty years I have always combined serving as an interim pastor, assistant, a long term supply priest while I've been teach. So, I've had two parallel careers. One as a teacher and one as a...mostly interim pastor. I'm now out of that business as they say. I am now working as an assistant in a parish, very happy to do that. At this point in life I do not fill drawn to solving the kind of problems that come with interim ministry. I've more than enough to do with my teaching and my other vocational interests.

MS: What's interim ministry?

DF: Interim ministry mean's you're the person in charge of the parish between a full time pastor. It mean's you're the one who provides services, does some ministration, some counseling. And while I could do that with, I think, some grace when I was twenty or thirty or forty, even fifty, I'm now sixty, and I simply don't have the energy or the drive to do that on a full time other job. It's a lot of work and it's a lot of not just showing up and going through the motions. People ask you lots of questions. They need to express this stuff. Sometimes they'd been hurt, sometimes they'd been confused, sometimes they feel abandoned. What you have to do as the interim is find all that anxiety. It's a very interesting and creative challenge but I've done thirteen of them in my life and that's enough.

MS: How have your other Carleton clubs or experiences continued over the years also.

DF: Really not at all. I went to one alumni reunion with my wife who's also Carleton. It was ok. We talked about going this year, decided not to. I think next year's my fortieth and I'm thinking about going next year. But I have very little contact at all with anyone from Carleton. Just have drifted out of contact. And while I find the campus beautiful and attractive I know enough, having been in higher education all my life, to know that, whatever they say, you can't go home again. If I went back I would be with a bunch of strangers who I wouldn't recognize whose lives may have been interesting but certainly with whom I've not been in touch. And I don't know if I'll go back or not; I'm thinking about that. If I do and if there's still a Druid there maybe we could talk. We'll see. At this point I've been teaching overseas in the summer the last two years, I may do a third year, so...

MS: How does religion change as you grow older?

DF: Yes it does. You find less need to cross certain bows, the minor things and to qualify and footnote. It becomes more a matter of direction, focus. It really is true that less is more. That's not just a Zen notion; it's true I think in all religions. You reach a certain point in your life when you no longer feel as obsessed with, as you did, what turn out to be very minor differences in theory or practice, you are more interested in the bigger picture and that is where I am.

MS: As the years go on and we start to lose more and more Druids, how would you like to be remembered?

DF: Oh, I hope I've some degree of affection. If nothing else, appreciation for having started something that others have made their own. I've not maintained an active tie with Druidism because sometimes the leadership has seemed very strange to me. I'm not a Neopagan and I find that very strange. And I find sometimes the intensity has been a little overwhelming, sometimes it's been confusing. You want to say, well, what's going on here. It's sort of a feeling I suppose Howard would have felt all those years ago. I'm grateful that it's been meaningful to people and as long as that's remembered that's perhaps enough. I certainly don't think of myself as worthy of a plaque or an obelisk or anything of the kind. If anyone deserves that it's David.

MS: Over at the Monument Hill there's an obelisk there. Three sides talk about the first baptism, first church service and the first marriage in Minnesota and the fourth side is completely blank. I believe you remember Richard Shelton...

DF: Yeah.

MS: He's always told me that the fourth side describes Druidism.

DF: That's a good monument. I would say and often said si monumentum quies perspicere: if you seek my monument look around you. Look at the oak tree. We chose that because there were oaks there. We knew, even with the little research as we had done, we knew there was always a link between the Druids and the oaks and we built that first altar which was torn down by a bunch of rather angry, inebriated, I think intervarsity types, and I understand that it's been rebuilt and rebuilt and so forth a number of times since. But yeah, the oaks really were the grove, it wasn't the physical stones, that was nice, but the stones weren't as important as the trees. Makes some sense.

MS: Ah, trees are a symbol of movement, of growth, of change, not of permanence.

DF: Yeah, that's true.

MS: A couple of final questions.

DF: Ok. This is good because I have to get going to pack, leaving for England on Wednesday.

MS: Ok. During the 1960s and early '70s the Druids had to decide on the priestess issue and this was also during the period of the sexual revolution...

DF: Yes.

MS: And I think the Episcopal church was also starting to think about ordination of women.

DF: That's true.

MS: What are your thoughts on the whole issue.

DF: Oh, makes perfect sense. It never seemed to me at the time that there was anything wrong with women being able to function on her own; human nature is not confined to one gender. I mean, it's a matter of tradition, preference, that's all it is. If the majority of people are finding it helpful to include both genders than I thought it's a good idea.

MS: Alright. A last question for you then. What are your long term hopes for Carleton and the Reformed Druids?

DF: Well for Carleton I hope it continues to be the kind of place that stimulates creative, aspiring minds in a consumerist and profession driven culture. That is being what a good liberal arts college ought to be as to what unfortunately many colleges becomes. And for the Druids, well, as long as people find whatever the Druids are meaningful and valuable as a placeholder in their journey toward whatever place they find, I hope the Druids prosper and flourish too.

MS: Ok. Well I think those are the major questions I had to ask.

Part Eleven NRDNA Druid Magazines

2003 Preface Only

The newsletter tradition is a great legacy of the NRDNA to Reformed Druidism. Carleton Druids were networked by their alumni ties and bi-polar correspondence tradition, but the other Druids worked in a nodal format and needed something to build community, a way to share information and reach out as a recruiting tool. It details the shifting Berkeley historic politics.

Bonewits' 2 year stint editing Gnostica magazine, writing of Real Magic and Druid Chronicles (Evolved), plus his wide-ranging Neo-Pagan contacts, gave Isaac the skills to be publish the Druid Chronicler magazine. After a few years, he launched the Pentalpha organization to build a more organized Druid organization along with the Pentalpha Journal. Divorce & unemployment forced him to suspend the elaborate PJ, and the Druid Chronicler briefly returned. After Isaac left, the Live Oak Grove under Emmon Bodfish published their local "A Druid Missal-Any", which networked the scattered grove until it also faded away. Not long after Emmon's death in 1999, Stacey resumed the Missal-Any and it became the on-line voice of Reformed Druidism.

I suspect that this will be least popular section of ARDA2. because few people like to read old newspapers. Although most of the interesting articles have been lifted from those 27 years of magazines, you might still wish to watch how Druidism changes over time in a slow chronological manner, to put the articles in the context of their times. Reformatted for publication, they are a treasure to cherish and pretty much speak for themselves.

So please brush off the dust of ages past, so that your browsing might reveal insight into your future. Enjoy.

Part Twelve Conclusion

2003 Conclusion

I hope you have remembered in the beginning when I told you that nothing printed in this volume was actually very important for being a Druid. I repeat this sentiment again and again through out the book, and I'm not just doing lip service to the ideal. If you want to be a Druid you'll eventually have to stop finding excuses for not going out in the woods, fields, or even just looking out the window when you have a free moment. You'll be surprised what you discover.

I am not certain, but fate willing, I will put out another collection in 2013 for the Golden Anniversary of the RDNA. Well in advance of that time, if you feel inspired to add something to this collection, be sure to send it to me at mikerdna@hotmail.com If it is half-decent, it'll probably make it in, but in the meantime, enjoy it all. Please remember that yesterday is history, today is treasure, tomorrow is mystery; so let us treat them as such.

Part Thirteen: DVD of "Gatorr: The Fighting Rabbit"

2004 Introduction

The 2 hour barbarian movie, Gatorr, DVD was added to ARDA 2's Magazine Volume as an afterthought because it so captures the spirit of Carleton Druidism in 1995, although it was not strictly intended as a Druidic movie. Mark Heiman '02 and I had ample contacts with members of heavily overlapping Carleton groups like; Carleton Druids, the Folk Music Society, The Folk Dance society, Science Fiction Alliance, Society for Creative Anachronism and the Mystery Science Theatre 3000 club. Armed with only a shoestring budget of $2000, three long summer months, piles of fake fur & beards, and 6 months of hotly debated scripts, we set out to make Carleton College's first full-length student film, and to briefly turn the amazing foliage and structures of Carleton & Olaf into the mythical wonderland that it is in my heart.

Intentionally awful as it is, Gatorr has a graceful lilt and it is emblematic of the way how Druids fully throw themselves into their projects, with every ounce of their skill, determination and free time. As the script developed, the introduction of several pseudo-religious lines and plot elements began to mature. As all films, it is a self-portrait of the inner workings of the creator. The cynical post-modernist hero is evident, perhaps giving the underlying message that society remolds the less-than-stellar reality of heroic figures to match its needs. From a sheltered, comfortable world, he undertakes new mystical challenges and is sent on a quest to right wrongs, understand himself. Gatorr's a good natured, bumbling fool pushed by circumstances much beyond his control into a leading position some pretensions towards heroism, hindered by his ineptitude. Barbarian is a relative term used by civilized people for others who are mutually not understandable and at a state of lower technological or apparent complexity.

Much of the movie is about walking, as life of even adventurers is mostly spent in travel and commonplace activities, punctuated by decisive moments. And the film shows that in excruciating details to reveal the subtler nature of heroes. Many elements of the movie (e.g. the Slainte & shoes) are purposely obscure in reason and origins, as is much of life's driving forces. There are several wizards and sages in the movie, some benevolent, others driven by deep seated grudges and fears. The element of reconciliation exists, but sadly wasn't developed fully in the movie.

By the time the final book of ARDA 2 comes out, Part Thirteen will have a copy of Gatorr's script, a map of where all the scenes took place, and details about the various actors, most of whom are Druids. If anyone would like a copy of the DVD, send $10 to cover shipping costs to me, ask for the address at mikerdna@hotmail.com Enjoy.

Part Fourteen: ARDA Files CD

To ensure the survival of records of the Reformed Druids in case the main archives collapses, I pass on, and other inevitable developments, I am enclosing a copy of all the ARDA 1 and ARDA 2 files, collections of Druid communications, and other files to all people receiving a copy of the Magazine Volume.

Please save a copy on your computer, and share a copy to be saved on the computers of other responsible Druids. Distribute copies of the files to researchers and new Druids who have trouble locating or downloading on-line files, for whatever reason.

Suggested Catalogue Description of the Collection:

"A uniquely rare encyclopedic anthology of 40 years worth of literature by the Reformed Druids of North America, which is the ancestor of the modern Druidism in America. This collection was primarily produced by the Berkeley Grove and the Carleton College Grove. Contents include a history, study guides, meditations, poetry, songs, jokes, theological debates, rules, customs, liturgies, magic charms, statistics, and recommended reading lists. Their various works of literature draw upon Buddhism, Christian traditions, ecology ideals, the Feminist movement, very ancient Jewish practices, Earth-centered mysticism, New Age beliefs, Neopaganism, Hinduism, the Occult, the Celts, Tao, Wicca, and lots of Zen."

Printed in Times New Roman font.

Acknowledgments

A detailed list of the various authors can be found in Part Four: "Credits, Founders and Known Innovators" but I would like to thank a few very special people for their help in putting this collection together.

Stacey Weinberger has proven of inestimable assistance in acquiring and understanding material from the 1980s at the Live Oak Grove. I have assisted her in the on-line publication of the newer Druid Missal-any for five years, and we have a fine working relationship. My greatest regret is that I was unable to draw further from her experience.

Without Mark Heiman's professional layout experience in the first ARDA project, these volumes would not look as fine and polished. His style and influence continues in the 2nd Edition. He also has kindly given advice and assistance on maintaining the on-line version of these files.

Steve Crimmins contributed enormous energies to provide photos and transcriptions and typing up last minute articles to fill up this 2nd Edition. I would like to thank Eric Hillemann for providing space at the Carleton Archives for the Carleton Druid Archival Project, for conducting many oral interviews with past Druids, and offering helpful hints in collecting and organizing a mountain of materials.

I would like to thank my parents, my friends, roommates, fellow Carleton Druid grove members, Ar nDraiocht Fein, The Henge of Keltria, all the other groves of the Reform, and the authors of the First Amendment.

In order to be true to all my friends, I should boldly state the following about Druidism:

The Entire RDNA Dogma is Contained in the Two Basic Tenets of Reformed Druidism (Law 4-6):

1. The object of the search for religious truth, which is a universal and a never-ending search, may be found through the Earth-Mother, which is Nature; but this is one way, yea, one way among many.

2. And great is the importance, which is of a spiritual importance, of Nature, which is the Earth-Mother; for it is one of the objects of Creation, and with it men do live, yea, even as they do struggle through life are they come face to face with it.

No more, no less, but these are often traditionally abbreviated into:

1. Nature is good.
2. Likewise, Nature is good.

Alternate Constitutional Version (1963):

North American Reformed Druids believe that one of the many ways in which the object of man's search for religious truth can be found is through Nature, the Earth-Mother.

North American Reformed Druids believe that Nature, being one of the primary concerns in man's life and struggle, and being one of the Objects of Creation, is important to man's spiritual quests.

Ten Important Notices

1. Nearly all of this material in the magazine volume are likely of the still copyright by the authors. Nothing in here is considered "oath-bound" material. Please acknowledge the authors, use it only for non-malicious purposes, such as study, and not for personal gain (without recompense to the authors). If you produce a book, article, or report that makes significant use of these materials; please send us a complementary copy in care of the Drynemetum Press (see above).
2. Please, do not take this stuff too seriously. Most of us certainly do not!
3. Materials represent only the individual opinions of their authors and no one else.
4. We do not have official group dogma. We merely have our individual opinions, and we bicker frequently.
5. Just because it was printed, doesn't mean the authors haven't changed their minds since they wrote the materials.
6. Most Druids get along just fine without ever reading ANY of these unofficial materials. Many (if not most) Druids thrive better without this literature!!
7. In general... most of us consider Reformed Druidism to be a perspective, not a religion. Do not be fooled by all the external trappings, whistles, and bells.
8. Membership in Druidism is considered very compatible with all religions by many members and the term "Druid" is usually considered to be gender neutral. Or, at least, we tend to think so.
9. Technically speaking, those who do not have the Apostolic Succession descending from Fisher are not permitted to perform most of the traditional liturgies.
10. Within reason, all documents have been presented here in their original historical forms (i.e. after spell-checking and versical numbering).

PREFACE

SECOND EDITION

IT SEEMED LIKE THE RIGHT THING TO DO AT THE TIME...

A LONG, LONG, TIME AGO,

IN A GROVE FAR, FAR AWAY...

I edited and published a small newsletter from around 1976 c.e. called The Druid Chronicler, which eventually turned into Pentalpha Journal and Druid Chronicler, disappearing (like so many small publications do) in 1981. While age and illness have wiped large portions of my wetware, I have been able to snag a few memories while reading through these old issues.

Originally my goal was have a way of announcing the events sponsored by my NRDNA grove in Berkeley and to network with other groves in the Reform. I can't remember if I had in mind a replacement mechanism for the Council of Dalon ap Landu, which appeared then (as now) to be defunct as an organizational system, but I at least had the idea of keeping the Druids of the Reform in regular contact.

Then I thought of how nice it would be to have a Neopagan newsletter that would print accurate historical, botanical, and other materials instead of the fluffy pseudo-historical, pseudo-scholarly nonsense that most other Neopagan pubs of the time were putting out. I had managed to do this with Gnostica for Llewellyn Publishing for a couple of years and I missed doing it. Moreover, I had always felt that the Ancient Druids had been the scholars of their times, so that a modern Druidic publication ought to at least attempt to have high standards. Then I started sending copies to other Druid groves, both inside the Reform and outside, based on my belief that more contacts with like-minded folks were better than fewer. (Remember, all this was very much pre-Internet.)

When I married my second (official) wife, Selene, we created an organization called Pentalpha: the Association for the Advancement of Aquarian Age Awareness, abbreviated as AAAAA. Five A's interlocked into a star shape are called a "pentalpha," hence the name and the logo. This was obviously more of a "new age" group than a specifically Druidic one. It also needed a newsletter, but I knew we couldn't manage to put out two high quality publications, so we combined a new Pentalpha Journal with the older Druid Chronicler. We started covering various New Age and non-Druidic Pagan topics, and put out several rather nice issues.

Then Selene and I separated, Pentalpha folded, and PJ&DC became the plain old Druid Chronicler again. In 1981, I married again, to Sally Eaton, and we decided upon some sweeping changes to how we wanted to experience Druidism. Some of the thinking that was going to go into my eventual creation of Ár nDraíocht Féin: A Druid Fellowship first appeared in the pages of Volume 5, #1 of the Druid Chronicler, which folded shortly thereafter.

I hope that those reading these pages more than twenty-five years later will find them of interest, or at least amusement. Remember what old Bilbo used to say about how dangerous it is to step outside your house—you never know where the road is going to take you.

Bright blessings,
Isaac Bonewits

Foreword

When Brother Mike asked me to write the introduction to the Missal-Any section of ARDA and told me I would be in essence I would be writing proxy for Emmon Bodfish, its original editor, I thought, my god, how to fill those shoes and do them justice. Emmon began the Missal-Any at Oimele 1982 along with Joan Carruth and I believe Chris Sherbak, when the Druid Chronicler ceased publication. It started out as a venue to publish news of the RDNA groves, dates of the High Days and regular services but became so much more. Within the same initial year, Emmon was already writing lead articles that covered an aspect of the particular High Day that were well-researched. Celtic scholars such as Tom Cross and Professor Jim Duran would submit articles. But what made the Missal-Any stand out from other Druid publications was Emmon's unique stamp upon it. Let me clarify. The Missal-Any wasn't self-serving or a product of Emmon's ego. It was a way to get the information "out there" on the High Days, news of what the groves were up to, Celtic history, language, folklore, mythology, and contemporary druid culture that the readership might not otherwise have access to. The lead articles were thought provoking, not mere regurgitation of material from books, and could be used as a springboard for further research by the more ambitious readers. As far as I know no other druid group's newsletter publishes news of their groves.

And there was Emmon's sense of humor. He had a wry wit that appeared in the sorts of cartoons he would add, clips from newspapers and ads which bespoke his observations on the world. They too would make you think, and laugh, and make you look at things in a way you hadn't considered before.

After nine years A Druid Missal-Any ceased publication with the Oimele 1991 issue. Due to health reasons Emmon needed to devote his energy to finding a place to live where the air was cleaner, leaving the editorship open. Another nine years later (note the trend of the sacred druidic number!), the publishing mantel was once again assumed, this time by me, his student.

Now I had been the proofreader for several years. When Emmon started to consider moving away he offered me the editorship. I in no way felt I had the wisdom or knowledge to be able to take it on, and so the Missal-Any remained on hiatus. Then in 1999 Emmon died. In his will he left me his entire Celtic studies library as well as his Canon copier. Was this to be taken as "a sign" to start up the Missal-Any again? In consulting the AD at the time of my grove he said it was a question of the ownership. The fictitious business statement had certainly lapsed by this time. It was then not long after this discussion that I found in Emmon's effects a letter from me turning the editorship down. Bingo. I could run but I couldn't hide any more. A Druid Missal-Any was reborn.

Samhain 2000 was the first issue of the new edition, mere weeks after my Third Order ordination, following the same format as before, and still produced as a labor of love. The new Missal-Any grew from one and a half pages its first issue to an average of over twenty. It is available by mail as well as by modern technology through email, and thanks to Brother Mike, on its own web site. Emmon's presence is still felt in the occasional reprinting of his lead and "see-and-do" articles. And he remains an inspiration to me still, to do good research, to come up with interesting topics, and to interject humor where possible. Tapadh leat, mo charaid.

Introduction

By Michael Scharding, DC Grove

Welcome to the third and final volume of the 2nd Edition of A Reformed Druid Anthology. No other modern Druid organization has produced and released a collection as long and complete as the RDNA. I hope that other Druid groups will follow our example and take steps to preserve and compile their past publications and re-release them for later generations to enjoy and study. A group without a past may have trouble finding its future.

This essay will greatly assist you in fully appreciating the contents of this enormous volume, which is largely free of commentary or exegesis. Although most of the interesting articles have been lifted from those 27 years of magazines and included in the Main Volume and Green Books, you might still wish to watch how Druidism changes over time in a slow chronological manner, to put the articles in the context of their times. Reformatted for publication, they are a treasure to cherish and pretty much speak for themselves.

So please brush off the dust of ages past, so that your browsing might reveal insight into your future. Please read it carefully and enjoy.

Division of the Magazine Volume

The Magazine Volume is actually a multi-media volume of four "Parts", as you can tell from a brief skim of the Table of Contents. Go ahead take a look! Part 11 consists of newsletters that form the bulk of the volume. Part 12 has the short conclusion to the ARDA 2 project. Part 13 is the Druidic movie on a DVD. Part 14 is the Druid Disk copy of nearly all the RDNA records on CD ROM disk.

Part 11 is also sub-divided into four "sections", based primarily on the different publishing runs of the materials. Section One consists of 19 issues of Isaac Bonewits' Druid Chronicler and Pentalpha Journals in the late 1970s. Section Two has the 69 issues of Emmon Bodfish's A Druid Missal-Any throughout the 1980s. Section Three has 34 issues of the current A Druid Missal-Any by Stacey Weinberger in the 2000s, with further updates released annually on the internet. Section Four has the 8 issues of OMS' "The Druid's Egg", being published here as a courtesy; MOCC's "Free Voice" was also intended, but was unavailable in time for the publishing deadline.

History of NRDNA Publishing

From 1963-1975, RDNA members sent mostly hand-written missives and a few mimeograph published booklets. From 1976-1991 regular typed and photocopied (and later word-processes and printed) newsletters and magazines were sent by the NRDNA on a national scale. From 1991-2000, intermittent newsletters and books were released during the first archival movement, in addition to slow proliferation of various online conferences since 1988. From 2000-2004, the internet age drastically reduced the cost of newspaper and conferences, leading to a resurgence of RDNA communication.

The newsletter tradition is perhaps the greatest legacy of the NRDNA to Reformed Druidism. Carleton Druids had a solid inward-looking sense of identity and were tightly networked by their alumni ties and internal correspondence tradition, but the other Reformed Druids were widely scattered and worked in a nodal format and needed something fixed and stable on which to build a community, a way to share information and reach out as a recruiting tool. Part 11, in a sense, details the shifting politics of "Californian" Druidism. I should add as a side note, it has become very difficult to distinguish the RDNA & NRDNA.

Bonewits' newsletter publishing was preceded by his initial book "Real Magic" in 1971, his two year stint editing Gnostica magazine from 1973-1975, and publishing Druid Chronicles (Evolved) in 1976. This, plus his wide-ranging Neo-Pagan contacts, gave Isaac the skills to publish the Druid Chronicler magazine in 1977. After a few years in the SDNA, he launched the Pentalpha organization to build a functional framework for more organized Druid organization along with releasing the Pentalpha Journal. In 1980, Division, divorce and unemployment forced him to suspend the elaborate PJ, and the Druid Chronicler struggled afterwards another year. After Isaac left the Berkeley Grove to found ADF Druidism, the nearby Live Oak Grove under Emmon Bodfish published their local "A Druid Missal-Any", which networked the few remaining scattered groves until it also faded away. Not long after Emmon's death in 1999, Stacey resumed the Missal-Any and it became the unofficial on-line voice of Reformed Druidism in the 2000s, and seems likely to continue for a while.

As a side note, it can be estimated that Druid Chroniclers reached perhaps a few dozen people, Pentalpha Journals perhaps a hundred subscribers at the maximum, old Druid Missal-Any in the dozens, and the New Druid Missal-Any reaches about 150-200 folks within 6 months of posting on line, plus e-mailed and print versions. So most Reformed Druids haven't read and still don't read the newsletter, just doing their thing.

Joys of Newsletters

I suspect that the Magazine Volume will be the least popular section of ARDA2 because few people appreciate old newspapers. I am under no pretensions that our publications were the best-written, most inspired or widest distributed after 1983 among Modern Druids, when the stellar ADF and Keltrian publications came out. Yet these newsletters and magazines are permeated with the characteristics of Reformed Druidism. They were cheap (or free), homely, witty, eclectic, straight-talking and non-dogmatic. They are like a treasured family album, complete with strange relatives and embarrassing baby-photos of us.

It is often said, "newspapers are the first draft of history." Indeed, a few frenetic dedicated editors tried to scoop out a bucket or two from the torrential river of events and thoughts that rushed by them. They took great pains, financial hardships and spent their precious leisure time trying to tell us something about ourselves. Yet the reward for their labors often is that these newsletters soon become lost and forgotten after a few weeks. Newspapers are sometimes classified in the publishing world as "instant best-sellers and instant garbage." Indeed, many Druids are conflicted over the place of written records, since the Ancient Druidism eschewed the pen in such matters.

To illuminate, throughout the process of ARDA1 and ARDA 2, I had been torn by two different inclinations; to publish or not to publish. On the one hand, it seems prudent to leave the past buried, so that the possibly stultifying accretion of tradition and dogma would have little chance of holding Druids back from exploring new frontiers. On the other hand, as a historian, I understand that interpolation from past events may shed light on the future course of Druids, perhaps avoiding a devastating crisis or two in the future. In the end, I decided to re-release the material and trust the Druids to make the wisest choices in their usage as possible tools.

In my experience, Reformed Druids have four primary sources of wisdom and knowledge (in rough order) to nurture their Awareness; Nature, personal reflection, consultation with friends, and musing over written records. In the last case, newsletters and books are the most physical "fossils" or detritus left behind by a group. They are only a pale hazy reflection of the vitality of the the original living groves (with their inexpressible foibles, the deep conversations, interaction, the sights, smells, the personalities, etc.). Add to this, that most Reformed Druids have been solitary, and an endless stream stories have remained untold. Thus sadly, for those of us who weren't there, it's all we have to draw upon to recreate and imagine those times, and it is indeed a very meager and unsatisfactory substitute.

Yes, amidst the grove events and calendars are some very interesting articles. True, most of the sizeable or time-enduring articles have already been extracted from the newsletters and put into appropriate categories in the Main Volume (liturgy, apocrypha, organizational) or Green Book (poems, songs, seasonal essay, histories). The materials are presented here as-they-were, scattered willy-nilly, with almost no commentary, so it would be very difficult to use this book to answer a question on a specific topic, due to it's unfocused nature.

The strongest reason to read this book is that it gives you glimpses of how groves have changed over time. Taken as a whole, the Magazine Volume offers you an overview of what topics and events mattered to them, at what time, and for how long. You might glean several clever ideas for your own grove's events, and learn from the mistakes of past groves. You will also see how those articles first-appeared, nestled in hard-to-find corners of magazines, popping up at odd times, much like Life's wisdom and Awareness.

I would recommend to any Grove leader to start a newsletter or to motivate their members to contribute to an existing one. As I mentioned before, newsletters build a sense of community, plus give an outlet for shy members to present their thoughts and works in a slow and lengthy manner, conducive to deeper reflection, in contrast to the discursive witty banter and small talk that occurs at meetings. Perhaps this volume will also give you ideas on the contents of your future productions? There are so many possibilities and tools lurking in this simple publication for those who have eyes to see.

Assembly of the Magazine Volume

Unlike the Green Books and Main Volume, the Magazine Volume posed special challenges and problems that greatly delayed the compilation and publishing.

When I first published ARDA 1 in 1996, there were only a measly handful of collected Pentalpha Journals, Druid Chroniclers and four Druid Missal-Anies in the Druid Archives at Carleton College, hardly 80 pages worth at most. Thus, out of neglect or disinterest, I didn't even bother to include them. However, over the years, the amassed page-load has grown 12-fold due to an increasing realization of the magnitude and importance of unknown publishing efforts over the years and improved access to previously hidden collections. Along with "Druid Chronicles (Evolved)", the newsletters are invaluable for understanding the rich diversity of the non-Carleton faction of Reformed Druidism, above and beyond Isaac Bonewits' more famous exploits.

I can take little credit for the contents of the Magazine Volume, as my chief contribution was endless monotonous hours of merely re-typing the fine-crafted, creative work of my predecessors, carefully formatting them in easy-to-read ways, and scanning and tweaking their pictures, trying to faithfully reproduce the contents and style of the originals, knowing that it was both impossible but imperative to try my best. It has left me with a profound sense of respect and empathy for their labors during a less-sophisticated technical age.

But they also had several freedoms, as in Emmon's case, where he would paste in articles at odd angles, tack on clipped cartoons, photocopy in actual plants, scribble in the margins and other hands-on embellishments; much like an artist choosing different paints for his canvas. In contrast, our rendition of his work in neat orderly columns, stable spacing, rigidly squared – it is so much more lifeless and bland, bereft of his artistry. Similarly, in the case of the new Missal-Anies, the original on-line versions were a riotous splash of color, with text snaking its way around the embedded pictures of small and enormous size. Due to memory overload, many unnecessary graphics have been removed from the new Missal-Anies. Each Grove had a "logo" for its news reports, and there were distinctive icons for the section divisions. I recommend that the artistic readers someday go see the originals and see them as the works of art they are, beyond the textual documents that are emphasized here. It should be noted that PJ & DC Vol. 2.5, 2.6., 3.1, Missal-any Vol. 20 and OMS Vol. 1-3 in here were not available for compiling the earlier Main Volume and Green Books collections. Take a look.

Final Thoughts

I would like to thank all the people who assisted me over the years by giving me copies of back issues, explaining the importance of various articles, and assisting me in the production and review of this volume. I am eternally grateful to them, as should we all.

As I now turn again my focus away from European matters and leave for life in Korea and Asian Affairs, I bequeath to you a very solid 40-year foundation of hard-to-find works that Reformed Druids can draw upon, if they wish. It is uncertain at this point whether it will be I or another who produces further collections. Whoever it will be, I hope they will draw deeply upon the Earth-Mother and her fellow Druids for inspiration.

I wish you well in your daily endeavors and hope that the blessings and lessons of Nature will be ever apparent unto you.

Yours with love, in the Earth-Mother,

Mike the FoOI

HIC LIBER IN MEMORIAM

EMMONIS DEDICATUS.

This edition's volume is dedicated to Emmon Bodfish, who died in 1999, prompting the revived enthusiasm in newsletter publication. May he rest with peace and frolic in the Land of the Young forevermore.

Editor's Blessing upon the Reader

May the blessings of the Earth-Mother be apparent unto you in every day of your life. May you live as long as you wish, make and keep good friends, profit in your just undertakings, gain respect from your peers for your good deeds, and avoid ill-health.

As For Written Tradition...

“They are said to commit to memory a great number of verses. And they remain some 20 years in training. Nor do they judge it to be allowed to entrust these things to writing although in nearly the rest of their affairs, and public and private transactions, Greek letters are used. It seems to me there are two reasons this has been established: neither do they wish the common people to pride themselves in the training nor those who learn to rely less on memory, since it happens to a large extent that individuals give up diligence in memory and thorough learning through the help of writing.”

Julius Caesar 44 b.c.e.

Midwinter

When the wind blows cold on the Hill of Three Oaks
the hearth fire is warm.

Richard Smiley, 1964

The Inheritance

What shall I leave as
A keepsake after I die?
In spring, flowers;
Summer, cuckoos;
Fall, red maple leaves;
Winter, snow.

Ryokan's deathbed poem, 1831

The Druid Chronicler

The Schismatic Druids of North America Volume 1 Number 1 Mean Geimredh, 16y.r. 9 Dec 77 to 6 Jan 78 c.e.

THE DRUID CHRONICLER is edited by Adr. Isaac Bonewits. Funds for this issue were provided by him, Stephen McCaully, Bill Heidrick and others. Letters should be directed to the publisher listed below. All contents Copyright @ 1977.

A Druid Newsletter!

This is the first issue of THE DRUID CHRONICLER, a highly irregular Druid newsletter to be issued whenever enough money and news is available to do so. It is published by the Mother Grove of the SDNA, but will carry news concerning all the Branches of the Reform. Would-be receivers of this should let us know in writing and kick in a buck or two (cash) to cover printing and postage costs.

Mother Grove Winter Meetings:

The Mother Grove meets every other Sunday night (Aspeneve) from 6:00 to 10:00 pm Pacific Sidhe Time. These are not official Druid worship services, since they take place indoors, currently at the home of Sister Shirine Morton, (DAL) which is at: 2820 San Pablo Avenue, Berkeley, CA 94702. The telephone number is (415) 841-4833. Right now these meetings consist of an hour's Daoist or Tibetan meditation, an hour or so of Hasidic Druid "hairpull" friendly theological arguments, a potluck dinner and a couple of hours of Bardic activities (poetry, new and old songs, music and possibly some music lessons on Celtic instruments).

Dates for these biweekly meets are: Dec. 11 & 25, Jan. 8 & 22, Feb. 5 & 19, Mar. 5 & 19, Apr. 2 & 16 & 30.

Mother Grove Highday services are at 3:00 P.M., PST at John Hinkle Park in North Berkeley (off Arlington, near the Alameda Circle). Winter Solstice will be celebrated December 25th, with all retiring to Shirine's afterwards for more Druish activities and a three-way birthday party. Oimelech will be celebrated on February 5th and Spring Equinox on March 19th.

Hazel Nut Grove Winter Meetings:

Adr. McCaully informs us that his Grove will be meeting with the Mother Grove during this winter and will resume its regular Saturday afternoon meetings next summer.

Tuatha Grove Winter Meetings:

The newest SDNA Grove in San Diego, is holding meetings in the home of the now Archdruidess. Contact her (address appears elsewhere in this issue) for details on times and activities.

Ordinations:

To the Third Order: Shirine Morton (MG77), Patricia O'Neil (MG77), and Christopher Sherbak (MG77). To the Order of Dian Cecht: Joan Carruth (Matriarch), 77.

Grove Mutations in 15 y.r.:

The Berkeley Grove NRDNA and the Mother Grove SDNA met together on Sunday afternoons for all of the winter Highdays and most of the summer. The Hazel Nut Grove NRDNA was formed by Br. Stephen McCaully in August, so that Druids who worked on Sundays could meet on Saturdays instead. Also in August, Br. Bob Larson, AD of the Berkeley Grove, resigned to get ready to go to Ireland and the Grove dissolved, the remnants being absorbed into the Mother & Hazel Nut Groves. During his September trip to Ireland with Cody & Jani Grundy, Bob Larson formed a Grove with Cody called Clan Na Brocheta and he is now the new AD of the Clan Na Brocheta Grove RDNA. Bonewits, AD of the Mother Grove, had resigned last December (76 c.e.) in favor of the Assistant AD, Joan Carruth. She was AD for the rest of the year, until new elections in September when Isaac took up the job again. In November, Isaac went south and ordained Pat O'Neil and Chris Sherbak. Pat is starting the Tuatha Grove SDNA in San Diego, while Chris is going to try to start up a Grove or Protogrove in Los Angeles. Sister Kathleen McQuilling may try and start a Grove in Santa Cruz. Br. Avery Grant is starting up the Acorn Grove SDNA in Minneapolis, since the Twin Cities Grove SDNA seems to have collapsed. No word has been heard from any of the other Groves supposedly existing elsewhere. If they will send us their news we'll print it.

The Archdruid's New Phone Number:

An event of earthshaking surprise has befallen the Mother Grove. Adr. P.E.I., Bonewits actually has a phone number in his very own home!!! Call (415) 547-6697, afternoons and evenings only.

Celtic Library:

Adr. Stephen has a Celtic library of over 400 titles in his home, which is available for use by Bay Area Druids and other Pagans. Many of the texts are quite rare, and microfilming and photocopying is available at slightly above cost.

About the Chronicles

The first printing of THE DRUID CHRONICLES (EVOLVED) has been out of print for several months. Unfortunately, Gnostica magazine has only recently gotten around to printing "What & Why is Reformed Druidism, in the 1970's," complete with obsolete addresses. So your Editor finds himself getting all sorts of orders for the book, with no books left to mail out. So here is what we're going to do.

All the checks sent are being returned. I have opened a new savings account and will run it as a Publication Fund. As soon as we get enough money to reprint TDCE (which may take as much as $1500, since we no longer have free printing) we will reprint and will send copies to all those who have donated $7.50 or more (the new cover price). In the meantime, small amounts of $20-30 may be used from time to time in order to publish this newsletter. If we can find an used printing press, we may just buy it and do our own printing.

Cash, checks and money orders should be sent to: P. E. I., Bonewits, Box 9398, Department PF, Berkeley, CA 94709 and clearly marked as being for the Printing Fund. We can't promise that TDCE will actually get reprinted if you donate five or ten bucks, but we can promise that without some donations from you it really will be impossible to get anything published.

The Druid Calendar for 16 y.r.

The new calendar has been calculated but the artwork and paste-ups are taking forever and printing cash is short. So what we are going to do is make us a two year calendar for 16 & 17 y.r. and get it out by Oimeic. In the meantime, we give you the following data which can be written on your civil calendars. "Ss" means "Sunset,"

The Highdays:

Samhain was Ss Nov. 6, to Ss Nov. 7,
Winter Solstice is Ss Dec. 20 to Ss Dec. 21,
Oimeic is Ss Feb. 3. to Ss Feb 4,
Spring Equinox is Ss Mar. 19, to Ss Mar. 20.

The Months:

Mi na Samhna was Ss Nov. 8 to Ss Dec. 8.
Mean Geimhridh is Ss Dec. 8, to Ss Jan. 6.
Deireadh Geimhridh is Ss Jan. 6, to Ss Feb. 2.
Mi na hOimeic is Ss Feb. 5, to Ss Mar. 6, Mean Earraigh is Ss Mar. 6, to Ss Apr. 5.

The Active Groves

The following are all the active Groves--that your Editor knows for a fact still exist:

Mother Grove SDNA Adr. P. E. I. Bonewits, Box 9398, Berkeley, CA 94709. Phone: 415-547-6697, afternoons and evenings.

Hazel Nut Grove NRDNA, Adr. Stephen W. A. McCauly, 6620 Telegraph Avenues Oakland, CA 94609. Phone. 415-653-1710, afternoons and evenings.

Clan Na Brocheta Grove RDNA, Adr. Robert Larson., c/o Cody Grundy, 820 Circle Courts South San Francisco, CA 94080. Services in Irish Gaelic.

Tuatha Grove SDNA, Adr. Pat O'Neil, 1808 Third Avenue, Apt. 1. San Diego, CA 92101.

Acorn Grove SDNA., Adr. Avery Grant, 3540 South Columbus, Minneapolis, MN 554070

About this Newsletter

This is the second issue of THE DRUID CHRONICLER, a highly irregular Druid newsletter published by the Mother Grove of the SDNA every 6-8 weeks (we hope). It contains news of all the Branches of Reformed Druidism in North America, depending on who sends us reports of local events. The Editor is Isaac Bonewits, Archdruid of the Mother Grove. All contents are Copyright 1978 c.e., by the SDNA; though announcements may be reprinted freely by any Neopagan publication. Would-be receivers should let us know in writing and kick in a buck or two to the Publication Fund.

Ordinations:

To the Third Order: Laurence Gold (CL77), Greg Hoffman (CL77), Thomas Lacki (CL76) and Sue Olin (CL77). Sue was elected the new Archdruid of Carleton last May ('77 c.e.) and Br. Don Morrison is now in the Philosophy Dept. at Princeton.

Mother Grove Spring Equinox Services:

These will be held on Sunday March 19th, at noon, in Golden Gate Park in San Francisco. East Bay members and guests should meet at Sr. Shirine Morton's house (2820 San Pablo Avenue, Berkeley; phone 415-841-4833) by 11:00 A.M. They will drive to San Francisco and meet the West Bay members and guests at the north entrance to the Arboretum (across from the Tea Garden) at noon. Services will be held just to the west of the "Redwood Nature Grove."

After services, the Grove will walk over to the De Young Museum to see the "Irish Treasures" exhibit. Cost will be $1.50 each for adults and the lines will be long. You may want to bring extra money to buy a copy of the beautiful catalogue and/or some of the Celtic jewelry on sale just outside the exhibit.

Mother Grove "Druid-Nights:"

There aren't too many of these left before Beltane, just those on April 2nd, 16th and 30th. The meetings will be moved to the Archdruid's new house just as soon as the moving process is finished. So far, the average meeting has consisted of a Grove business discussion, a potluck dinner, Hasidic Druid "Hairpull" and Bardic activities, and they have been running from 7 P.M. to 10 P.M. or so.

If the weather in April is nice, we may start doing outdoor services again instead of, or in addition to, the Druid Nights. These would use the Order of Common Worship for Geimredh & Earrach. If there is sufficient interest, we will hold the Druid Nights throughout the summer as well

Note on Open Ceremonies:

All Druid ceremonies in every Branch of the Reform, so far, are open to the general public (if well behaved) except for Ordinations to the Third and Higher Orders, and for some of the private rites of the Higher Orders that are restricted to their own members. If you belong to a non-druidic organization and would like to attend regular Druid services you are more than welcome.

Druidic Education:

Br. David Geller, Patriarch of the Order of Oberon, has agreed to begin running weekly Bardic classes for Neopagans in the Bay Area, if enough people show a sincere interest in putting some work into music, poetry and singing practice. The idea would be to improve everyone's Bardic abilities and to develop new materials for use in Druid ceremonies.

Sr. Joan Carruth, Matriarch of the Order of Dian Cecht, says that she will start some classes in Herbal Medicine, First Aid, CPR and Home Procedures this summer. Classes in Ritual Dance, Field Botany and Ceremonial Magic will also be offered by various teachers if sufficient interest develops. Contact the Mother Grove for details.

Keeping Your Copies of the Newsletter:

As can be seen by the three circles on the side of the first page of this issue, the newsletter is designed to be punched and placed into the same notebook that you keep your copy of the CHRONICLES (probably at the end of Part Four). If you don't have a copy of the CHRONICLES yet, it is still a good idea to keep a notebook, otherwise the pages of the newsletter tend to get buried and lost amid the reams of paper we all keep in our homes. Besides, many announcements of importance will be made only in the pages of THE DRUID CHRONICLER.

The British Druids:

Although the Reformed Druid movements have no known connection to the Masonic-Rosicrucian Druids in the British Isles, we have made friendly contact with American and English members of "The Druid Order: An Druidh Uileach Braithrearchas" which is also known as "The British Circle of the Universal Bond." A copy of their Book List can be obtained by writing to them at: 161 Aukland Road, London, SE 19, England. We will shortly be ordering a complete set of their writings for the Mother Grove archives, as soon as we can figure out how to convert the English prices into American currency.

Information Booklets:

"What and Why is Reformed Druidism in the 1970's?" is about to be reprinted by the Mother Grove. This four page booklet of typeset information about the history, customs, beliefs and Branches of the movement is designed to be reprinted by local Druids and has a space for local addresses to be added. Copies will be sent out with the newsletter. If you need extra copies let us know and we'll work out the costs to print as many as you think you'll need.

The booklet takes quite some time to read, so it is not really appropriate for handing out to strangers who stumble upon Druid rites in progress. If anyone would like to try their hand at writing a brief introductory leaflet let us know and we'll see about typesetting and printing it.

Mother Grove Highday Celebrations:

The Mother Grove decided March 5th that future Highday celebrations, at least for the summer, will be held as weekend campouts in various scenic spots around Northern California. Those who can leave early on Friday afternoons may precede the rest of the Grove to the chosen locations and set up camp for the rest who can't leave till later on Fridays. Most of the Grove would stay through Sunday afternoon each time. The campouts would include nature hikes, mushroom hunts, litter cleanups and overnight bonfires where safe and legal. The following locations and dates have been suggested so far:

Beltane: May 5th-7th., in Sequoia National Park, with actual ceremonies to take place around the General Sherman Big Tree (world's largest tree).

Midsummer: June 16th-18th, either (a) on a private ranch in Sonoma County or (b) private land elsewhere in the Napa-Sonoma area, depending upon whether or not the local Neopagan community decides to resurrect their giant Midsummer Festival. If the pagan community does so, the Druids will join Witches and other Neopagans from throughout California for three days of ecumenical celebration.

Lughnasadh: August 4th-6th, at the Harbin Hot Springs in Lake County.

Fall Equinox: September 22nd - 24th, on the Bear River near Colfax, north of Sacramento, in the Sierra foothills.

Samhain will be celebrated the weekend of November 5th and Midwinter the weekend of December 17th, but the exact locations and activities have not been planned yet. The Archdruid would like to go snow-camping, but the Archdruid is known to be a bit odd.

All of these plans are extremely tentative until various authorities have been contacted and miscellaneous permissions obtained. Announcements from the Grove's Camp Director (Arlynde) will appear in future issues of this newsletter, giving such details as driving directions, costs, babysitting arrangements, what to bring in the way of food and clothing, etc.

In the event that the Mother Grove celebrates a Highday out of the easily immediate area, there is a good probability that at least one Third Order priest or priestess will be available to hold services for those who can't leave town.

Ritual Writing Contest:

Because a number of people in various Branches of the Reform have complained that they don't like the "Protestant sounding prayers" in the Druid services now in common use, we are inviting people to send us rewritten versions of current rites, as well as brand new ceremonies for Druid use. The most popular, artistic, interesting and dramatic of these re-rites will be published in this newsletter (and possibly in the new printing of the CHRONICLES as well). Liturgies using music, poetry, song and dance will be favored, but cultural inspiration does not have to be Celtic.

Ritual Vestments for Druid Services

By Isaac Bonewits, 1978?

One of the things that makes a ceremony dramatically effective is the sort of clothing being worn by the participants. Among the Reformed Druids, a white robe for Second and Third Order members has been customary, with the priestesses and priests wearing their red or white ribbons-of-office. The following suggestions have recently been made about vestment customs and local Groves are free to use, change or ignore them as they see fit:

The system used by the Masonic-Rosicrucian Druids in the British Isles could be modified thusly: First Order Druids would wear green robes; Second Order Druids would wear green-and-white robes; Third Order Druids would wear white robes; Bards would wear blue tabards over their regular robes; Guards would wear dark red or brown tabards, etc.

AND/OR everyone not wearing robes could wear Paleopagan styles of clothing, usually of the Celtic or Germanic sort. This would ease some of the trans-temporal clashes so common at Druid rites and would add greatly to the ritual gestalt.

AND/OR special seasonal tabards could be worn by the Archdruid (and other officers?) presiding over ceremonies. Simple rectangles (about 18"x36") of cotton or linen could be carefully embroidered, then sewn together at two corners. These would be worn over the head and belted. Each tabard would have a large tree on the front piece and a large Druid Sigil (II) on the back piece, both in the appropriate seasonal foliage. One set of possibilities runs thusly:

From Samhain to Midwinter: Rowan tree with bare branches, mistletoe and light snow.
From Midwinter to Oimelc: Holly tree with berries/mistletoe and heavy snow.
From Oimelc to Spring: Fir tree with new needles and light snow.
From Spring to Beltane: Fruit tree in bloom, with budding branches.
From Beltane to Midsummer: Oak tree in full green.
From Midsummer to Lughnasadh: Sequoia tree in full green.
From Lughnasadh to Fall: Fruit tree with fruit, some leaves starting to turn.
From Fall to Samhain: Sugar maple tree turning gold and scarlet, dropping.

Los Angeles Protogrove

Br. Chris Sherbak is trying to start an SDNA Grove in the Los Angeles area. He can be reached through: 588 North Lucerne Blvd, Los Angeles, CA 90004; phone: 213-467-5701

News from Yuma, Arizona

Sr. Katheryn Hughes is interested in starting an RDNA Grove in the Yuma area and says that she also "would like to correspond with any garrulous Druids concerning--well, basically the role Druidism plays in one's life-- everything considered confidential if desired (this is for a sociology paper)." Other notes from her: "I've been doing business with a fantastic bookstore in Erin: Clodhanna Teoranta, 6 Sraid Fhearchair, Baile Atha Cliath 2. Eire. You might also want to pass this on: a quarterly publication called "Carn, links between the Celtic nations," with articles in English and all six Celtic languages. $5.50 per year, write to Alan Heusaff, 9 Bothar Cnoc Sion, Baile Atha Cliath 9, Eire."

Other Protogroves

At the moment we have people wanting to start Protogroves in the following areas: Columbia MO, Madison WI, West Palm Beach FL, Tacoma WA and Parkersburg WV. If you would like to help any of these people, just contact the Mother Grove and we'll put you in touch.

SDNA Internal Organization

Groves and Protogroves belonging to the SDNA and its offshoots are reminded that they are supposed to send in monthly activity reports so we can be sure you are still alive and kicking. The Groves that haven't sent in a signed Constitution with a list of elected officers aren't legal yet. We also need notices of any ordinations done by your Third Order members, changes in officers, Special Orders set up, etc. We'd like to print your new songs, poems, rituals, problems and solutions, recruitment techniques, ecology actions and other news.

SDNA Grand Tour:

The Archdruid of the Mother Grove of the SDNA is tentatively planning to spend summer of 17 y.r. (1979 c.e.) making a "Grand Tour" around the United States with his wife Selene. We plan to visit Groves and Protogroves, as well as individual Druids and other Neopagans, in over thirty cities. The primary purpose will be to meet people who have been preparing themselves for ordination and to take them into the Third Order so that they can found legal Groves. If you'd like us to visit your town, be sure to let us know sometime within the next twelve months.

New Developments with the Chronicles:

As mentioned last issue, the first printing of THE DRUID CHRONICLES (EVOLVED) was sold out months ago. A new printing is planned for later this year, as soon as we have enough money in the Printing Fund. We are happy to announce that a source of nearly free printing has been found (a friend has bought a printing press) and that we only need to collect $400-$500 for paper and ink, instead of $1500-$2000, for added labor costs. However, at the moment the Printing Fund contains only about $20 --enough to put out another issue or two of the newsletter, but that's it.

Currently the PF is working this way: checks made out to "A.A.A.A.A." or "Berkeley Drunemeton Press" are being returned to their senders, since it will be months before the next 500 copies are printed. Cash, checks and money orders meant as donations to the Printing Fund should be sent to P. E. I. Bonewits, Box 9398, Dept. PF, Berkeley, CA 94709 and clearly marked as for the PF (otherwise I may spend it on beer and chips). These monies all go into a special savings account and when the CHRONICLES are reprinted, copies will be sent to everyone who has donated $7.50 or more (2 copies for $15, 4 for $30, etc). From time to time, money for the newsletter will also be taken from the PF. It may wind up being August or December, but if we get enough money we will reprint the CHRONICLES.

After we have broken-even on the CHRONICLES, we may start a Druid Magazine if there seems to be enough interest.

Future of The Druid Chronicler:

We've already been sent a good article on California Oaks and Sequoias, and several bards have offered songs and poems for publication. Should we start printing these in the newsletter or stick to plain news? Should we include other Neopagan groups or not? Your Editor is masochistic enough to type the pages, but more pages mean more expense, and that means more subscriptions have to come in. We'll keep the prices as low as we can, but we have to have money for printing and postage. If you haven't already kicked in a buck or two to the printing fund by the time the next issue is ready for mailing, this is the last issue of the Druid Chronicler you will probably receive.

Miscellaneous Neopagan

Activities in the Bay Area:

A Pagan Study Group exists in the Palo Alto/San Jose area. Their newsletter, Bay Leaves, can be gotten for a couple bucks from Randy Millen, 921 Colorado Avenue, Palo Alto, CA 94303.

An Open Sabat for the Spring Equinox will be held from noon March 25th through noon March 26th, at the Greenfield Ranch in Sonoma County, sponsored by the New Reformed Orthodox Order of the Golden Dawn (a collection of Neopagan Witchcraft covens and individuals). Bring your own firewood, hibachi-type-food and hiking boots. For details, call Chandria at 415-731-4220, 6 pm to 9 pm only.

Editorial: Ecology Action!

On February 25th the Mother Grove and the Hazel Nut Grove went to the Japanese Consulate in San Francisco to join various ecologists in protesting the slaughter of thousands of dolphins in Japan during the previous week. Although several of the people from Greenpeace were concerned about the impact of robed Druids on the public image of the protest, friendly arrangements were made for the Druids to form their own distinct demonstration group and for them to refer any curious media people back to the ecologists.

The Druids culminated their participation for the day with a procession at high noon to the front of the Consulate building, where with full ceremony they called down the curse of the Gods and Goddesses of the Sea upon those humans responsible for the slaughter. By the time the rite was nearing its end, several of the ecologists had joined the Druids in their cursing litany. At the climax almost everyone present shouted together "We curse you! We curse you!! We curse you!!!" with a volume that must have easily reached Japan, let alone the tenth floor of the building. Although the rite was good "street theater" and will no doubt have a purely psychological effect on those members of the Consulate who heard it, your Editor can assure you that a significant amount of mana was raised and discharged, and that we fully expect physical results to follow.

Since that time discussions have been held in the Mother Grove and we have decided that we will all start to be more involved in standard ecology action from now on. Druids will be expected to join various groups such as the Sierra Club: Friends of the Earth, Greenpeace, and so on, and to volunteer time and/or money to these groups. An increasing number of field trips and campouts will be held and litter bags will be brought along so that we can clean up the woods as we hike. Druids will join more demonstrations and write more letters and boycott more consumer goods (such as real tuna, or Japanese & Russian products).

These decisions are being made because many Druids feel that it is hypocritical to claim that we love and worship the Earth-Mother if we aren't also trying to do something to stop Her rapists. As with everything else Druidic, the exact form and degree of action is up to each individual Druid, but the Druid organizations are going to start providing specific opportunities for intensive action.

Many ecology organizations may well prefer that Druids joining them be discreet, wearing ordinary clothing and not talking much about religion. After all, the general public often feels that ecology activists are weird enough as it is, without bringing up the topic of "funny religions." Other ecology groups may feel that the Druids are the logical "chaplains" for a movement that is already a religion for many of its members, and be at least as willing to have Druids along as they are to have Roman Catholic or Jewish clergy and laity along wearing their unusual garb. In either event, Druids should cooperate with the policies of whatever ecology organizations they wind up joining. Battles for religious freedom and ecological sanity can be fought separately as well as jointly, with no insult to either.

Spring Equinox

New Reformed Druids of North America

By Bonewits & Larson, c. 1975

Preparatory Details

The following is a Special Order of Worship for the Spring Equinox. The chalice will be filled with the Waters-of-Sleep. The sacrifice should be of budding branches.

The service starts with all participants standing some distance away from the area where the ritual is to take place. If both safe and legal, a fire should be started in or near the altar. The Druid/ess who is presiding (usually, though not always, the Grove's Archdruid/ess) should already have cut the sacrifice and have it tucked into his or her robe (or it may be held in one hand). The presiding Druid/ess may choose to speak the opening Invocation to Be'al alone, or may ask the Preceptor and/or the people (depending on Local grove custom) to join in speaking the bold words of the Invocation.

The Invocation

O Lord, forgive these three errors that are due to our human limitations:

Thou art everywhere, but we worship thee here;

Thou art without form, but we worship thee in these forms;

Thou hast no need of prayers and sacrifices, yet we offer thee these prayers and sacrifices;

O Lord, forgive us these three errors that are due to our human limitations.

O Mother, cleanse our minds and hearts and prepare us for meditations.

The Procession

Here occurs the Procession, often with the Grove singing the hymn from Customs 2:1-3. Upon arrival near the altar, the Preceptor and the Server or any two others designated by the Grove use their staves to mark the Druid Sigil upon the ground in front of the altar (usually on the South side.)

leaving the bottom of the circle incomplete. The Druid/ess steps into Sigil, which is closed by two staves.

The Praise

Here an Incantation, Poem or Hymn of praise is recited or sung by the Druid/ess, the Bard(s) or the entire Grove.

The Sacrifice

The Druid/ess holds up the sacrifice to the sky, while saying:

PR: Our praise has mounted up to thee on the wings of eagles, our voices have been carried up to thee on the shoulders of the winds. Hear now, we pray thee, our Mother, as we offer up this sacrifice of life. Accept it, we pray thee, and cleanse our hearts, granting us thy peace and life.

(Here the Priest places the plant offering upon the 'altar' or the ground if there is no altar. As each of the directions are questioned, the members may turn to face that direction).

PR: Hast thou accepted our sacrifice, O our Mother? I call upon the spirit of the North to give answer... of the South...of the East....and of the West.

The Reply

(The sacrifice is not accepted, except in emergency situations.)

PR: The four winds are silent; the Earth-Mother sleeps.

The Chant

PR: And the God of the Sun did arise from His tomb in the South; and once more did He fare forth to His children in the Northern lands. (Pause) O Belenos, O Thou unchanging God of many names, but one Face, we, Thy children, welcome Thee back to our lands.

Chorus: O Lord of Light, we welcome Thee.

PR: O Belenos, O Lord of Light, long have we awaited Thy return, that the coldness of the Night might be taken from our lands.

Chorus: O God of Sun, We welcome Thee.

PR: The nights were long, the trees had shed,

Chorus: The night had conquered day.

PR: The days were short, and life had fled.

Chorus: The night had conquered day.

PR: The winds were cold, the land seemed dead,

Chorus: The night had conquered day.

PR: But the Sun returns from the Southern lands.

Chorus: Balanced now are we.

PR: Plants spring up on every hand,

Chorus: Balanced now are we.

PR: "Let Life return!" is the Sun's command.

Chorus: Balanced now are we.

PR: The Sun grows stronger every day.

Chorus: The Day will conquer night.

PR: The world grows lush and Life holds sway,

Chorus: The Day will conquer night.

PR: So let us praise Him in all ways.

PR: O Belenos, O Sun, we praise Thee at Thy return to our midst. Welcome art Thou among us.

Chorus: Bless with thy presence, O Lord of Light.

PR: O Belenos, O Lord of Light, bless us with Thy warmth and light, that we may rejoice in Thy sight.

Chorus: Bless us and light our way, O God of the Sun.

The Catechism of Waters-of-Sleep

(The preceptor holds the Waters-of-Sleep while the priest ask the Catechism of the Waters-of-Sleep. The local custom may replace the Preceptor's response with a chorus of the members.)

PR: Of what does the Earth-Mother give that we may know the continual flow and renewal of life?

PREC: THE WATERS-OF-LIFE.

PR: From whence do these Waters flow?

PREC: FROM THE BOSOM OF THE EARTH-MOTHER, THE NEVER CHANGING ALL-MOTHER.

PR: And how do we honor this gift that causes life in us?

PREC: BY PARTAKING OF THE WATERS-OF-LIFE.

PR: Has the Earth-Mother given forth of her bounty?

PREC: SHE HAS NOT! THE WATERS ARE HERE, BUT THE SPIRIT HAS GONE OUT OF THEM.

PR: Of what, then, does Belenos give that we may rejoice on this day of His return.

PREC: THE WARMTH OF THE SUN AND THE WATERS WHERE he SLEEPS.

PR: OF WHAT, THEN, DO WE PARTAKE?

PREC: The Waters of the Sun.

PR: Then give me the Waters of the Sun.

The Consecration

(The Priest/ess takes the chalice from the Server, who fills it if it is not already full. The Priest/ess then consecrates its contents with the following:)

O Belenos, O Lord of Light, descend into these waters and fill them with Thy presence. Give us to know, O Lord, of Thy promise of Life as we take and drink of Thy warmth and light.

Ordinations

No ordinations are normally done in the Winter Half of the Year.

The Communion

The Priest/ess drink from the chalice and blesses the Preceptor with the words, "the Waters-of-Sleep," and the marking of the Druid Sigil in the air.

The Preceptor returns the blessing and receives the chalice from the Priest/ess. The Preceptor drinks, blesses the Server, is blessed in return, and gives the Server the chalice. The Server drinks, then goes around the circle of the Grove (usually clockwise) blessing each person, handing them the chalice, letting them drink, being blessed in return and taking the chalice to the next person. The Server does not drink more than once.

In some Groves, the Priest/ess may merely turn to the left and exchange blessings with the person to that side, letting the chalice be handed around the circle by the members of the Grove.

In either method, the last person in the circle should not finish the contents of the chalice. This is returned to the Priest/ess with a last exchange of blessings. Then the Druid/ess takes the last sip returning the remainder on the altar or fire, saying:

PR: To thee we return this portion of thy bounty, O our Mother, even as we must return to thee.

The Meditation

(Here follows an appropriate reading, from any Nature-oriented scripture that the Priest/ess may choose, read by the Druid/ess or by someone appointed for that purpose. After this comes a few BRIEF words of meditation from the Priest/ess and a period of silence and private mediation (usually two or three minutes in length--though longer with some Groves) by all. Eventually, the Priest/ess signals the end:)

The Benediction

PR: Go forth into the world, secure in the knowledge that our prayers will be answered, that the bounty of life will return to the face of the Earth, and then will the Earth-Mother shower Her blessings upon you:.

Drawing the Sigil in the Air

Peace! Peace! Peace!

The Druid Chronicler

Volume 1, Issue 3,
Whole Number 3
Beltane, 16 y.r.
May 4/5, 78 c.e.

The Druid Chronicler is a highly irregular Druid newsletter published by the Mother Grove of the Schismatic Druids of North America every 6-8 weeks. It contains news of all the Branches of Reformed Druidism, depending upon who sends us reports of local events. The Editor is Adr. Isaac Bonewits. All contents are copyright 1978 c.e. by the SDNA. Announcements may be reprinted freely by any Neopagan publication. Subscriptions are $2+per year, sent to: P. E. I. Bonewits, Box 9398, Berkeley, CA 94709. Cash is preferred.

Bay Area Beltane Rites

As far as purists are concerned, the feast of Beltane starts at sunset May 4th, because the sun hits 16 degrees and 18 minutes of declination at precisely 11:27 am, PDT (Pacific Druid Time) on the morning of May 5th. But most Reformed Druid groups prefer, like other Neopagans, to celebrate the High Days on whatever dates turn out to be most convenient for the majority attending.

The Clann na Brocheta Grove will be celebrating during the afternoon of Saturday May 6th, near the top of Mount Tamalpais in Marin. Services will be in Irish Gaelic, led by Archdruid Robert Larson. The entire Clann will be there from noon to sunset, and the feast is potluck. For details, send your phone number to the Clann's Ri, Cody Grundy (see Grove addresses later in this issue) and he'll call you.

Those who live in the San Jose or Palo Alto areas may want to call Archdruid Steve Savitzky to see when his Grove is celebrating (see Grove addresses).

The Mother Grove and the Hazel Nut Grove will be celebrating on Sunday May 7th, in the Berkeley Rose Garden and in Cordonices Park, across the street from each other in northern Berkeley (see map). Members and friends should assemble in the park by the tunnel entrance before 2:00 pm. The Grove will process through the tunnel into the Rose Garden for the main ceremonies. Afterwards, a potluck picnic will be held in Fireplace Area #2 back over in the park. People are encouraged to bring food, drink, poems, music and garlands in their hair. To get there: by car, go up to the top of University Avenue, turn left (North) on Oxford and go to Cedar. Turn right (East) on Cedar and go 7 blocks to Euclid. Turn left (North) and go about the same distance to the Garden & Park. By bus, first get to the downtown Berkeley BART station and take the Euclid bus, which stops right at the Park.

Label Codes

If your mailing label has a dollar sign in the corner, that means that you are a paid subscriber. "EV means an exchange sub. No sign means you should send us some $$.

Hazel Nut Grove Summer Meetings

The biweekly Saturday services of the Hazel Nut Grove will be held in the same spot formerly used by the Berkeley Grove, in Strawberry Canyon (see map). Archdruid Stephen McCaully is also planning on holding some Celtic Nights at his home. For details on exact times and dates, contact him.

Mother Grove Summer Meetings

The biweekly Sunday services of the Mother Grove will be held in Strawberry Canyon as well, usually around 2:00 pm. Regular Bardic meetings are being held as well, probably at the home of Linda von Brasket, Ob. The next two biweekly services will be on May 21st and June 4th. Exact dates for the Bardic meets haven't been settled on yet. Call Archdruid Isaac Bonewits for details.

Tuatha Grove News

Archdruid Pat O'Neil has moved to a new apartment in the same building, from #1 to #12, so alter your notes accordingly. She says that she's going to be doing at least biweekly services this summer in the San Diego area.

Upcoming articles in The Druid Chronicler

We now have some botanical articles being written, as well as a long and detailed piece by Robert Larson on ancient Celtic calendars, another by him on the roles played by the ancient Druids in Irish society, numerous book reviews, some new music, etc. But in order to print such non-news items we have to have more money to pay for the extra paper and postage costs. So if you haven't kicked in two or three bucks to the Publication Fund for a subscription, please do so now.

Organizational Note

Not only should Groves within the SDNA and HDNA be sending monthly reports of activities (and copies of their Constitutions) to the Mother Grove; but they should also, along with all the other Groves, have their Constitutions on file with and send ordination notices to Archdruidess Sue Olin of Carleton. She is the official chairperson of the entire Council of Dalon ap Landu and should be kept informed.

Pagan Festivals

The Second Annual (Midwest) Pan-Pagan Festival will be held July 14-16, at Lake Holiday, Indiana. The festival is being sponsored by the Midwest Pagan Council, a network of covens, Pagan temples and other magical groups from Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana and elsewhere. A variety of workshops, songfests, ecumenical rites and other activities will be held in the wooded campground. Groups participating include Calumet Pagan Temple, Parthenon West, Epiphanies, Coven of the Sacred Stones, First Church of the Craft of W.I.C.A. and Sanctus Spiritus, Temple of the Pagan Way, Circle and others. Total cost is $10.00 per person. For details, send a stamped, self-addressed envelope to the MPC's publicity coordinator: Selena Fox, c/o CIRCLE, Box 9013, Madison, WI 53715, marked "Attn: MPC festival."

A five day International Pagan Leadership Conference, Seasonal Festival and Workshop Retreat entitled "A Gathering of the Tribes" will be held in the mountains of Northern Georgia on Sunday through Thursday, September 10-14. Many Eastern and Midwest Pagan teachers will be present and there will be numerous activities. The total cost is $45.00 per person, if registered before August 1st. Send an SASE to: Association of Cymmyr Wicca, Box 1514, Smyrna, GA 30081.

A national Pagan convention is now being planned for September 2-4 in Denver, Colorado (though it may be postponed so as to not conflict with the Worldcon science fiction convention) by the Craftcast Farm people. For details, send an SASE to: Mike Meyers, Box 572, Fort Morgan, CO 80701.

Correction

Katheryn Hughes is not a Druid priestess (yet, anyway,) though she is interested in starting a Protogrove of some sort in the Yuma, Arizona area. Your Editor got her mixed up with Sr. Gerre MacInnes in Tucson. But Katheryn's address is: 1329 Ninth Avenue, Yuma, AZ 85364. Write her if you'd like to discuss the meaning of Druidism in your life.

Saving Stonehenge for the Public

We have recently received a letter from the Save Stonehenge Committee (59 Norfolk House Road, London, SW 16, England) informing us that the British government has erected a permanent rope fence around Stonehenge, at a distance of 225 feet from the center. The reason seems to be to protect the monument from vandalism as well as to restrict the hours of access and to charge money to tourists. Unfortunately, the result is to prevent many religious pilgrims from being able to visit the spot when and how they choose. The fence also violates the conditions under which the monument was given to the British government in 1918 by its previous owners. They made their "gift to the nation" expecting "the public to have free access to each and every part." The preservation of Stonehenge as an archeological site, ancient monument, modern religious center and lucrative tourist trap, is a problem of extreme complexity and controversy. Thoughtful letters to the Save Stonehenge Committee, Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher (House of Commons, Westminster) are quite important; especially if any of us are to be able to hold religious pilgrimages there in the future.

The Druid Chronicler

Volume 1, Issue 4,
Whole Number 4
Lughnasadh, 16 y.r.
August 6/7, 78 c.e.

The Druid Chronicler is a highly irregular Druid newsletter published by the Mother Grove of the Schismatic Druids of North America every 6-8 weeks. It contains news of all the Branches of Reformed Druidism, depending upon who sends us reports of local events. The Editor is Adr. Isaac Bonewits. All contents are copyright 1978 c.e. by the SDNA. Announcements may be reprinted freely by any Neopagan publication. Subscriptions are $5.00 per year, sent to: P. E. I. Bonewits, Box 9398, Berkeley, CA 94709. Cash is preferred.

Bay Area Lughnasadh Rites:

Lughnasadh occurs at 4:51 pm, Pacific Druid Time, on the afternoon of Monday August 7th. According to modern Druid custom, most Groves will celebrate this holiday on the Saturday and Sunday before.

The Clanna Brocheta Grove has not contacted us with details, but it is probably safe to assume that they will meet all Saturday afternoon on Mount Tam with a potluck feast and services in Old Irish. Those interested can contact them at the address given elsewhere in this issue.

The Hazel Nut Grove and the Mother Grove will meet jointly on Sunday afternoon in the Redwood Bowl area of Redwood Regional Park in Oakland. Asst. Adr. Joan Carruth (MG) will lead services (using the new Invocation printed below) at 2:00 pm. This will be followed by a wedding ceremony at 3:00 pm.

Those interested in attending services in the San Jose or Palo Alto area should contact Adr. Steve Savitzky of the Southern Shores Grove.

Wedding Celebration:

Adr. Philip Emmons Isaac Bonewits and Deborah Selene Maenka Kumin will be wed on Sunday August 6th, at 3:00 pm, in the Redwood Bowl area of Redwood Regional Park. The ceremonies will be presided over by the Revs. Tim and Morning Glory Zell of the Church of All Worlds. The afternoon and evening will be spent singing, dancing, playing music and eating and drinking a potluck feast. The Neopagan community is cordially invited to attend. Presents are not required and clothing should be comfortable.

About the Midsummer 16 y.r. issue:

There was no Midsummer issue this year because the Editor was busy moving house and nobody else volunteered to put out an issue. This is one of the things we mean when we say that this is "a highly irregular" newsletter.

Hazel Nut Grove News

Adr. McCaully says that the Celtic library now has almost 500 books and microfilms, thanks to recent donations of books and money. Naturally (or supernaturally) he's hoping for more. Classes in Celtic Mythology Tarot and Ceremonial-Magic will be started this September. Stephen is also willing to do research for Neopagans on any Celtic topic (searching out particular Names or types of deities or tales for example) at reasonable rates. The Grove continues to meet every other Saturday afternoon in Strawberry Canyon (see map, last issue)! Contact Stephen for details on all these matters.

Mother Grove News:

The biweekly meetings have been suspended for the time being, though the High Day ceremonies will continue. Bardic activities are being organized by Linda von-Brasket, call her at 843-9326 for details. A.D. Bonewits will be teaching a class in Basic Occult Theory and Practice this September and October. If enough interest develops, a class in herblore and woodcraft may be offered by the Grove Botanist. Call Isaac for details after August 10th.

Ordinations:

To the Third Order: Thomas Schuler (MG78) and Cyndie Schuler (MG78). This September they will be setting up the Evergreen Grove, SDNA in the Olympia, Washington area.

Book Publications:

Authentic Thaumaturgy, by P.E.I. Bonewits, has been published by the CHAOSium, and deals with the magical and religious phenomena that exists in the "real world," with some specific advice on how these can be applied to the playing of various fantasy games (such as "Dungeons & Dragons," "Chivalry & Sorcery," "Emerald Tablet," "Nomad Gods," etc). It can be purchased only at game stores. In the Bay Area, try the Gambit stores in Berkeley and San Francisco, the Outpost in Palo Alto and the Multiversal Trading Company in Concord.

His earlier book, Real Magic, will be reprinted next Spring by Creative Arts Publishing in Berkeley, and should be available in most regular bookstores.

The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) are still awaiting sufficient money (about $500) for reprinting. Since the Publication Fund will only have about $30 left after this issue of the newsletter, the wait may be a long one.

Other Neopagan Publications:

The Sword of Dyrnwyn is the monthly newsletter of the Association of Cymry Wicca (Church of Y Tylwyth Teg,) a Welsh Neopagan Witchcraft group. Subs are $7.50 per year, sent to: Church of Y Tylwyth Teg, P.O. Box 1514, Smyrna, GA 30081.

A related group, Pagan Grove Publishing Company (Box 49285, Atlanta, GA 30359,) has published a Pagan-Occult-New Age Directory with over 400 entries, making it quite possibly the most extensive Pagan directory ever put out. Cost is $3.95. They will also be publishing in August a book about the Ancient Welsh Tradition of Wicca, called The Quest - The Search for the Cauldron of y Rhuddlwm Gawr. The cost will be $7.95.

The Circle Book of Songs is published by Circle (Box 9013, Madison, WI 53715,) an eclectic group of Neopagan groups and individuals. The songbook contains both music and lyrics, many of which are suitable for rituals. They also publish other items of interest to Neopagans of all persuasions, so write to them for details. They are interested in contacting Druidic and semi-druidic sorts in the Madison area.

Northwind News - A Journal for Pagans, is published quarterly by the People of Holy Earth, 6 Cypress Road, #1, Brighton, MA 02135. Subs are $3.00 per year. Lots of interesting articles and frequent printing of good rituals.

Castle Rising Publications (9728 East Colfax Avenue, Aurora, CO 80010) puts out several items: a monthly Pagan Newsletter at $5.00 per year, a quarterly Craft journal called Pagan Renaissance at $6.00 per year, a collection of Incense Formulas for $1.00, etc.

The Temple of the Elder Gods (Box 578, Sunland, CA 91040) puts out a Newsletter and a magazine called The Waxing Moon. Joseph & Joanna Wilson are looking for contributions to both. Write for more data on price, frequency of publication, etc.

The Unicorn is a Craft newsletter put out by Paul Beyerl, Box 8814, Minneapolis, MN 55408.

Stonehenge Viewpoint is a quarterly magazine covering astro-archaeology, ley lines, stone circles, etc. Cost is one British pound (about $2.00) per year, plus postage. Write for details to: Stonehenge Viewpoint, 51 Charminster Avenue, Bournemouth, Dorset, England.

The Unicorn Speaks is a monthly newsletter on various Neopagan and Craft topics. Subs are $4.00 per year to: Box 15357, Chattanooga, TN 37415.

We'll list other Neopagan publications as we hear about them, directly or through various newsletters.

A New Invocation:

The following Invocation was written by Br. David Geller for last Beltane's rites and has proven so popular that we are printing it here for others to use in their Druid ceremonies. If any one else has prayers, songs, rituals, etc., that are suitable for Druidic purposes, send them to us for publication.

"AD" stands for the Archdruid/ess and "P" stands for either the Preceptor or for the People as a whole, depending on local Grove custom.

AD: In the dust of the galaxy swirls the spark of life.

P: And we partake of it, we and all living beings.

AD: In the mighty helix we dance.

P: And in harmony with all of life we sing.

AD: Gods known and unknown, life potential and actual, noisy and silent, seen and unseen, beginning and ending, uniting and dissolving.

P: Be in our awareness, teach us your joy, let us feel your sorrow, extend our limitations.

AD: Knowing that the smallest motion, the softest note, even the energy of thought itself, reverberates infinitely--let this ritual begin!

New Groves:

Tom and Cyndie Schuler will be founding a new SDNA Grove in the Olympia, WA area this fall, to be called the Evergreen Grove. Their emphasis will be on Zen Druidism.

Chris Sherbak in Los Angeles, Pat O'Neil in San Diego, and Avery Grant in Minneapolis are looking for people to join their fledgling Groves. If you know any Neo-pagans who live in those cities, pass the word.

We hear persistent rumors about a new Hasidic Druid Grove in West Virginia. Does anybody have any hard data?

If anyone reading this newsletter is interested in starting a Grove or Protogrove of any Branch of Reformed Druidism, please let us know. We'll publish your name and address so that others in your area can contact you (post office boxes are a good idea, by the by).

Giant Pagan Songbook

Another project that has been suggested for us to do (in our copious free time) of songs being written is to publish a compendium of all (or at least many) of the dozens sung by Pagan groups across the country and around the world. A number of very fine songbooks have been put out in the past, but these have all been small (due to printing costs) and many are now out of print. This isn't anything we can make any promises on, but if people will start sending us songs (with music, authors' names and copyright status please) we will reprint some of them in this newsletter and eventually we may actually be able to print (and keep in print) a fairly sizable songbook. In the meantime, here's a song that a lot of people have wanted the words for:

The Woad Song

Authorship unknown, (but obviously English!)
Sung to the traditional tune of: "Men of Harlech"

What's the use of wearing braces,
Hats and spats and shoes with laces,
Coats and vests you rind in places
Down on Brompton Road?
What's the use of shirts of cotton,
Studs that always get forgotten?
These affairs are simply rotten
Better far is woad.

Woad's the stuff to show men
Woad to scare your foemen!
Boil it to a brilliant blue
And rub it on your chest and your abdomen!
Men of Britain never hit on
Anything as good as woad to fit on
Neck or knee or where you sit on
Tailors, you be blowed!

Romans came across the Channel,
All dressed up in tin and flannel.
Half a pint of woad per man'll
Clothe us more than these.
Saxons, you may save your stitches,
Building beds for bugs in britches;
We have woad to clothe us, which is
Not a nest for fleas!

Romans, keep your armors;
Saxons, your pajamas.
Hairy coats were made for goats,
Gorillas, yaks, retriever dogs and llamas!
March on Snowdon with your woad on
Never mind if you get rained or snowed on
Never need a button sewed on.....
All you need is woad!!

A Quote from the Sierra Club:

"Something will have gone out of us as a people if we ever let the remaining wilderness be destroyed; if we permit the last virgin forests to be turned into comic books and plastic cigarette cases; if we drive the few remaining members of the wild species into zoos or to extinction; if we pollute the last clear air, dirty the last clean streams and push our paved roads through the last of the silence, so that never again will Americans be free in their own country from noise, the exhausts, the stinks of human and automotive waste.

"And so that never again can we have the chance to see ourselves as a single, separate, vertical and individual in the world, part of the environment of trees and rocks and soil, brother (and sister!) to the other animals, part of the natural world and competent to belong in it."

Reflections on Celtic

Time Reckoning

or "Running Around in Cycles"
By Robert Larson, 1978

This article is by Adr. Robert Larson, Archdruid of the Clanna Brochecta Grove, and was originally printed in the Clann's quarterly publication "An Poc Uaine," in the Earrach 1978 issue. Subscriptions to this journal are $4.00-per year and can be sent to: Cody Grundy, Ri Clanna Brochecta, 820 Circle Court, South San Francisco, CA 94080.

I. The basics of Celtic time

There are four logical times to begin the most basic time cycle, the day: midday, midnight, sunrise, and sunset. The use of either of the first two results in an equal day, but they are much more difficult to observe, especially midnight. As a result, early peoples began their days with either sunrise or sunset. The Celts chose sunset, and, instead of days, calculated time in nights, as is attested to by linguistic evidence. This selection also corresponds to the druidic tenet which was simplified by Caesar and Pliny to "the night has precedence over the day." Philosophically, starting the day at sunset makes the statement that things begin in darkness and cold and develop to brightness and warmth--the life from death theme which is recurrent in Celtic myth, and is thus reflective of pagan Celtic religious belief. (The choice of sunrise to begin the day seems to me to make the opposite, and obvious, statement that death comes after life; which is more in keeping with the religious beliefs of the peoples of the Mediterranean and Near Eastern areas, from whom we get our modern method of time reckoning.)

Then, again, perhaps the proto-Celts lived in an area with frequent morning fog, making the choice of sunset natural. However, the choice of sunset does correspond to the other cycle beginnings of Celtic time reckoning, which are symbolic.

The day is divided naturally into halves, light and dark. Though proof is lacking, it is certain that the Celts further divided the day into fore-midnight, after-midnight, forenoon, and afternoon; and I believe it likely that they halved these divisions.

The Celtic year began at Samhain, which was counted as a day between years. The year was divided into quarters by the four holy days of Samhain, Imbolg, Bealtaine, and Lunasa. The dates normally given for these days are, respectively, November 1, February 1, May 1, and August 1—the days of the often thinly-Christianized holidays of Hallowe'en/All Souls', Candlemass/St. Bridget's Day/ St. Groundhog's Day, May Day, and Lammas. As I shall explain later, these dates are only approximate, but they'll do for now.

Though Lunasa and Imbolg were holy days, Samhain and Bealtaine, the most important days of the year, effectively divided the year in two. Samhain, whose name means "summer's end," was the beginning of the winter half of the year, called geimhreadh. Geimhreadh was the dark and cold half of the year, corresponding to the night half of the day. During geimhreadh, the sidhe and other malevolent beings were believed to be most active, and life was at its lowest ebb. On the other hand, it was also the time of reforming and resurrection. During geimhreadh, the old sun reached its nadir and was reborn, the familiar new-sun-god-replacing-old-sun-god theme found in various forms in Celtic myth. Though the last vestiges of old life disappeared under the snows during geimhreadh, in its second half new life appeared, to reach full vigor at Bealtaine.

Bealtaine means the "fires of Beal," who was presumably a Celtic solar/sky deity. Another name for Bealtaine, given on the Coligny calendar, is Giamon, which in Irish would be geimh-fhuin, or "winter's end." Under either name, Bealtaine marked the beginning of samhradh, the bright and warm half of the year, during which the forces of life reached their apex, and the solar deity attained his full manhood. However, the sun god also began to deteriorate during samradh after his solstice battle (the combat of gods myth); and the forces of life, after coming to fruition, slowly gave way as the year decayed to Samhain.

The choice of Samhain and Bealtaine as the turning points of the year was dictated by both druidic belief and the Celtic economic system. Religiously, the "precedence of dark over light" dogma seen in the day is repeated in the division and beginning point of the year. Economically, Bealtaine and Samhain are the times of transhumance, the moving of the herds from winter to summer pasture, and vice versa. By Bealtaine the ground has firmed up enough from the spring thaw to safely drive the livestock to their mountain pastures, and there is enough growth at the higher altitude to support them. Transhumance is a great social occasion among pastoral peoples, as they gather together for the drive. Inevitably, it became an occasion for religious ritual. At Bealtaine the cattle were blessed by driving them between two huge bonfires (probably sacrificial to ensure a good herding and growing season). By the way, a good smoky fire is an excellent method for killing livestock parasites. Judging by peasant May Day practices throughout the British Isles, it was also a time of much merry-making and promiscuity. These customs reflect the symbolic nature of Bealtaine as the time of mating between the sky god and the earth goddess which will bring forth the next year's life during the latter half of geimhreadh, corresponding closely with (and probably inspired by) the nine-month human gestation period. This symbolic connection is, of course, reinforced by the fact that this time of year is also the mating period for many animals, making Bealtaine an appropriate time for phallus-related worship (such as may-poles).

At Samhain, the tribe would again be together after driving the livestock back to the winter pasture in the sheltered valley. Again, ritual inevitably arose about the occasion. With winter come, prayers and sacrifices to protect the tribe and livestock from the depredations of the evil spirits of the dark half of the year were necessary. As the time of change, it was also a time for attempting to divine what lay in store for the tribe during the coming year. Many of our Halloween games probably started as divinatory practices, even if the Gaulish druids did have a weakness for entrails. Even the dressing up in frightening costumes for Hallowe'en probably had its beginnings in Samhain ceremonies to try to scare or, at least, confuse the spirits, which were believed to be especially active during this night. (Well, after all, if you'd been cooped up in a sidhe hill for six months, you'd want to raise a little hell, too.) The Celtic deity most closely associated with Samhain was the Daghdha in his character of god of the otherworld and rebirth, who was able to take the dead, immerse them in his cauldron, and bring them forth alive.

Geimhreadh was divided into halves by Imbolg, which may mean "swelling belly," and which began the sub-season of earrach, "spring." Around Imbolg-tide many animals give birth, and a celebration of this increase was natural. Its association with St. Brigid, the euhemerized goddess Brighid, leads me to believe that it was also a celebration of the hearth, home, and culture, but this is admittedly conjecture. Of actual Imbolg ritual we know nothing. Symbolically, the new life conceived at Bealtaine is brought forth at Imbolg.

Samradh was sub-divided by the festival of Lunasa a name which means the "games of Lugh" and which begins the sub-season of Fomhar, "harvest." Lugh was a god of many attributes and myriad realms of power. Though probably originally a solar deity, Lugh was also a warrior, an artist and poet, and a craftsman, among other capabilities, and in Gaul was the main god of commerce. It is thus appropriate that his name be given to Lu'nasa, the time of the great fairs, at which competitions were held in athletics, crafts, and the arts, legal cases were decided, livestock bought and sold, etc.—a necessary periodic time of truce in inter-tribal relationships, an affirmation of cultural identity, and an opportunity for open and free trade among craftsmen and herders. Another name for Lunasa is Bron Troghain, a difficult name to define, but which has to do with parturition and giving birth. At this time of year, the harvest begins to come in and trees are bearing fruit. The ceremonies of Lunasa were thus probably those of thanks to the gods for a bountiful year, or sacrifices to increase the harvest if the crop looked small.

The Celts also celebrated the solstices. At the summer solstice, ceremonies involved the kindling of large wooden (wicker?) wheels, which were then rolled downhill to symbolize the coming decline of the sun after the solstice. Conversely, at the winter solstice huge fires were lighted to symbolize the rebirth of the sun and its coming return. Evergreens and, on the continent and in England, the mistletoe were given special veneration due to their retaining their life during the time of death. In Ireland the yew supplanted the mistletoe and in Scotland, the rowan. Though we have no direct evidence that the Celts celebrated the equinoxes, I am sure that they did, if only from a desire for neatness in their year. Also, the equinoxes are significant solar times, marking the return and departure of the sun—the god's adolescence and old age.

The Celtic year, then, was divided into eight parts by the holy days and the solstices and equinoxes. It may be best to look upon it as two overlapping years, one having to do with the sun/sky god and the other, the earth goddess. Samhain was the time of dying for the Earth; Imbolg, its rebirth; Bealtaine, its flowering; and Lunasa, its fruition. The winter solstice was the time of death and rebirth for the sun; the vernal equinox, its puberty; the summer solstice, full maturity; and the autumnal equinox, the onset of its old age.

Taking the cycles together, however, we see that the seasons reflect not only the status of the earth-mother, but also the status of the sun god. The period Samhain-Imbolg corresponds with the weakest period of the sun god--extreme age and infancy. The period Imbolg-Bealtaine corresponds with his childhood and adolescence; Bealtaine-Lunasa with his young manhood and early middle age; and Lunasa-Samhain with his late middle age and old age.

The two cycles are thus bound into a syncretic whole. The agent of this binding is the moon. In its monthly period the moon reflects the yearly cycles of the earth and the sun. Because the lunation period closely approximates the female cycle, the moon was most likely personified as a goddess. Now, goddesses are normally connected with either the earth or with water in Celtic mythology. The moon goddess is thus connected to the earth by gender, and this connection is reinforced by the moon's obvious tidal effects. Because of the moon's light-giving capability and its obvious solar connection, the moon goddess was probably thought of as the consort of the sun god. The moon is thus symbolically connected to both the sun and the earth. The Celts used the true lunar month. In keeping with the division of the year and the day, the moon's period was divided into dark and light halves determined naturally by the moon's phases; the dark half consisting of the first and last quarters and the bright half, the second and third quarters. These halves were subdivided by the new and full moons, reflecting the four-fold division of the solar and earth cycles and reinforcing the symbolism.

Finally, I would like to note that many sources have the druids celebrating only one of the holy days per year. I believe this to mean a large scale celebration, with the other holy days having lesser celebrations, probably intra-tribal rather than inter-tribal. The celebration cycle ran retrograde through the holy days thusly: Samhain, Lunasa, Bealtaine, Imbolg. This cycle gives an actual periodicity of three years, which corresponds to the frequency of the great games at Tailtiu; so this ritual cycle is very likely to be basically correct. As we shall see, this ritual cycle was the heart of the Celtic method for calculating time spans of more than a year.

Some Notes on Oaks

By Rachel

This article is by Rachel, the Grove Botanist for the Mother Grove. She has over twenty years experience in the biological sciences and is an expert on the medicinal and magical properties of herbs and fungi.

There are 275 species of Oak inhabiting the temperate regions of the Northern Hemisphere and the high altitudes of the tropics. They extend as far south as Columbia and the Malay Archipelago. So if you live north of the Equator, you should be within easy reach of at least one oak tree.

Among American Druids there are certain fallacies concerning something called an "English Oak." Just what are people referring to? There are at least a half a dozen kinds of oak that grow in England and all are more closely related to oaks in other places than they are to each other! Many believe that a California oak can never measure up to the grandeur of an English Oak. But the largest oak tree growing in England is only 80 feet high (and is in its old age,) while California Valley Oaks and Black Oaks frequently measure over a hundred feet high. The largest White Oak in the world lives in San Bernadino County in southern California (my books don't give its exact height.) Quercus Schneckii averages 180 feet and grows in the Mississippi Basin. This inferiority complex about California oaks must come from comparing them to the surrounding Redwoods and Sequoias.

The first step in tracking down your local oaks is to go to your nearest library. In the "Nature" section you should find a Flora Key for your area. Look up "quercus" in the index. "Quercus" is the scientific name for Oak and rather than being Latin (as is usually the case with western scientific names) it is Celtic and means "fine tree." Usually there will be more than one sort of Oak listed, each with a paragraph describing the tree. If the key is highly scientific, you may be tempted to give up after a few words of impossible language. But don't surrender yet! Scan down the paragraph and somewhere near the end you will run across a sentence like this one out of Munz' California Flora (on Quercus Killoggii--the Black Oak):

"Common in hills and mountains, mostly, 1000-8000 ft, mixed evergreen F., Yellow Pine F., N. Oak Wd. San Diego N. through Sierra Nevada and Cost Ranges to Ore."

Now if you can figure out the abbreviations, you now know where to look. Elsewhere in the paragraph should be the average height of the tree and whether it is evergreen or deciduous (drops its leaves in the fall).

All oaks have one thing in common and that is acorns, whether the oak involved is one foot high or 180. Late summer is the best time to locate your local oaks, since the acorns are big enough to see easily. Knowing the average height and general location of the trees you are looking for should combine with these acorns to make it easy to find one, two, possibly even an entire grove of oaks. Once you find an oak of a particular sort and make friends with it, you will be able to spot its sisters and brothers easily.

This Space for Rent!!

Do you have a product or service of a Pagan, ecological, metaphysical, artistic or related nature that would appeal to Druidic-type readers? Well The Druid Chronicler is now accepting ads at the reasonable rate of $5.00 per quarter page. That's black-and-white, camera ready copy. Anything else costs extra to do.

Coming Up in Future Issues:

In the next few issues we'll continue the articles on Celtic time keeping and oak trees, present some new and old songs (with music hopefully,) spotlight activities going on in different Groves, share some tips on recruiting new members, spout off on matters philosophical and metaphysical, publish partial and complete ceremonies for various occasions, list the names of those seeking others to start Druid Groves and Protogroves, print the names and addresses of all willing Third Order Druids, and.....

But all this costs money and the Publishing Fund is barely going to cover this issue of The Druid Chronicler. So if you haven't paid for your subscription yet, now's the time to do so!

The Active Groves:

The following are all of the Druid Groves that your Editor knows are supposed to be alive and well. There may be others that we haven't heard from.

Mother Grove SDNA, Adr. Isaac Bonewits, Box 9398, Berkeley, CA 94709. Phone: 415-547-6697, 2 pm to 10 pm. Currently holding services only for Highdays. Some classes being organized for September & October. Bardic activities: Linda von Brasket, 843-9326.

Hazel Nut Grove SDNA/NRDNA Adr. Stephen McCaully, 6220 Telegraph Avenue, Oakland, CA 94609. Phone: 415-653-1710, 2 pm to 11 pm. Biweekly Saturday meetings and Highdays. Celtic library with 400 books and microfilms. Various classes now being organized.

Tuatha Grove SDNA, Adr. Pat O'Neil, 1808 Third Avenue, Apt #12, San Diego, CA 92101. Biweekly Sunday meetings and Highdays. Norse Druidism and ocean ceremonies.

Acorn Grove SDNA, Adr. Avery Grant, 3540 South Columbus, Minneapolis, MN 55407. Phone: 612-823-1303, 2 pm to 10 pm. Ecumenical rites with local Wiccans.

Los Angeles Protogrove SDNA, Br. Chris Sherbak, 588 North Lucern Blvd, Los Angeles, CA 90004. Phone: 213-467-5759, 2 pm to 10 pm.

Arch Grove HDNA, Adr. Vicki Rhodes, 475 Lockwood, Webster Groves, MO 63119. Biweekly Saturday meetings and Highdays. Hasidic Druidism.

Clan na Brocheta Grove ODNA, Adr. Robert Larson, c/o Cody Grundy, Ri Clanna Brocheta, 820 Circle Court, South San Francisco, CA 94080. Biweekly meetings and Highdays. Services in Irish Gaelic. Irish library with 100+ books and photos.

Carleton Grove RDNA, Adr. Sue Olin, Chairperson of the Council of Dalon ap Landu, Carleton College, Northfield, MN 55057. Meets weekly and Highdays during school year.

Southern Shores Grove RDNA/NRDNA, Adr. Steven Savitzky, 343 Leigh Avenue, San Jose, CA 95128. Phone: 408-294-6492, 6 pm to 10 pm only. Meets only for Highdays.

Ann Arbor Grove RDNA, Adr. Richard-Shelton, 722 Dewey Avenue, Ann Arbor, MI 48104. Meets only for Highdays?

Chicago Grove RDNA, Adr. Michael Bradley, 5611 South Blackstone, Chicago, IL 60615. Meets only for Highdays.

The Druid Chronicler

Volume 1, Issue 5

Whole Number 5

Fall Equinox, 16 y.r.

September 22/23, 78 c.e.

The Druid Chronicler is a highly irregular Druid newsletter published by the Mother Grove every 6-8 weeks. It contains news of all the branches of Reformed Druidism, depending upon who sends in reports of local events, as well as short articles of a scholarly nature, songs, rituals, and other items of Druidic interest. All contents, not otherwise marked are Copyright (C) 1978 by the SDNA/NRDNA (Pentalpha). Subscriptions are $5 per year, sent to the Editor: Isaac Bonewits, Box 9398, Berkeley, CA 94709. Ads are $20 per full page, $10 for 1/2 page, $5 for 1/4 page, etc. B&W, camera ready only.

Bay Area Fall Equinox Rites

Fall Equinox occurs at 2:26 am, Pacific Druid Time, on the morning of Saturday September 23rd. Various Groves will celebrate this holiday on Saturday and Sunday, depending on local customs.

The Mother Grove and Hazel Nut Grove will meet jointly on Sunday afternoon at 2:00 pm, in the Eucalyptus Grove behind the Life Sciences Building of the University of California's Berkeley campus. This is an easy walk from both bus and BART.

The Clanna Brocheta Grove will meet sometime during the weekend at the Renaissance Pleasure Faire, in Novato.

Arch Grove News

The new Archdruidess is Sr. Carolyn Clark. The Grove is meeting for full moons and Highdays, and hopes to start Friday night Weekend services soon. Classes in Hasidic Druidism will be starting in a few months. Their Fall Equinox services are planned for Saturday with a campout at Knob Lick. Former Adr. Vicki Rhodes has been sent to Guam by the military. Are we going to wind up with Oceanic Druids?

Evergreen Grove News

The Grove celebrated Midsummer in Bellingham with eight people attending (not bad for their first service). This included two Odinists, two Witches, three Druids and one unclassifiable. The sun burst through the clouds dramatically in each reference to it. "We took it to be a sign."

The Grove will be sponsoring a weekend seminar/workshop in Ceremonial Magic, and Paganism by Isaac and Selene Bonewits, on October 7th and 8th. The cost will be $40 per person and will include three meals. For details, contact the Evergreen Grove and/or Beltane Books (1406-A Northeast 50th, Seattle, WA 98105). Beltane, by the by, is under new management and is well worth a visit if you're in the area.

Chicago Grove Disappears

Adr. Michael Bradley has moved and left no forwarding address, so we don't know whether or not the Grove is defunct. Can anybody in the Chicago area let us know?

Men's Groups

The Mother Grove has organized weekly meetings for men in the Bay Area Pagan community who consider themselves to be mostly heterosexual. There have been three of these Tuesday night meetings so far, with attendance running from five to eight men. Discussions have centered around "men's mysteries," the role of hetero men in the community, the creation of new rituals around the Horned God and other male deities, magical techniques and exercises, developing legitimate pride in manhood, etc. So far the meetings have all been in the Berkeley-Oakland area, but they may move around the Bay if more interest develops from men living elsewhere. For now, call Adr. Bonewits for each week's location.

For gay and bisexual men in the Pagan community, Caradoc ap Cadwr has had a group going for a couple of years. For information, write to: Silver Wheel, Box 2064, Berkeley, CA 94702.

Protogroves

The following people would like to organize Protogroves in their areas and invite people living near them to get in contact:

Orange County, California: Richard Bonewits, c/o 34001-A Ruby Lantern, Dana Point, CA 92629. Phone: 714-496-5606.

Fresno, California: Craig R. Miller, 4324 North Cedar, Fresno, CA 93726. Phone: 209-227-8240.

Name Change?

It has been suggested that the "alphabet soup" of Druid branches is getting a little confusing to both the national Pagan community and the general public as well. The Schismatic Druids of North America and the New Reformed Druids of North America originally decided to use those names in order to distinguish themselves from the preceding Reformed Druids of North America; because while the NRDNA members were somewhat Pagan and the SDNA members very much so, the members of the RDNA were not Pagan at all. The SDNA encouraged the founding of the Hasidic DNA and SDNA Groves have begun calling themselves Norse Druids, Zen Druids, etc. Things may be getting out of hand.

Perhaps the thing to do is to reserve the term "RDNA" for the Carleton Grove and its nonpagan offshoots, while individuals and Groves wanting to practice Hasidic, Zen, Norse, Old Irish, Panceltic, Chaoist, Schismatic or Eclectic Druidism (or any other variety of Neopaganism) can use the term "NRDNA." Specific flavors can be listed in directories and mentioned in informational literature, but would not be part of the formal titles used; to see what this would look like, see this issue's list of Active Groves. In any event, we'd like some comment on these matters from Third Order members and others interested.

Help Wanted

We're going to need some volunteer help in several areas over the next few months, on both the national and local levels. Artists are needed to donate some new logo designs suitable for The Druid Chronicle and/or official stationary; we are also going to need art for The Druid Calendar for 17 y.r. Obviously we're mostly interested in themes of a Druidic nature, such as oak leaves and trees, acorns, sickles, menhirs and trilithons, Druids of various sorts, Celtic deities, and (of course) interlacings, spirals and other sorts of Celtic designs. But if someone wants to do Slavic or German or Native American stuff for the calendar illustrations 7 1/2" high by 10" wide) that would certainly be fitting for such an eclectic movement. Artwork should probably be black & white, pen & ink work, since our printing facilities are limited.

Also needed is someone who has access to a computer with astrological and astronomical data in its memory (or who can easily get a disc or tape with an ephemeris recorded). This is so that we can calculate the Druid calendars for the next few years with maximum accuracy.

Local Groves need people to help put up recruiting posters, organize music for services, collate mailings, and so forth. Druidism is very much a congregational religion--without the help of the individual members, the average priest or priestess can do nothing.

A New Special Order:

"Dear fellow Druids: The forests have their order and the waters have their order; the light has its order and the rivers have their order. The heavens, the oceans and the earth have an order. The original ten orders are a cycle of knowledge of nature. The later orders, for bards, magicians and healers, are ways of praise. Siblings, some have praise to give who cannot speak poetry, and cannot heal, and as yet cannot work magic. We are like the Zen monk Enku wanting to carve ten thousand images of the diety. We praise the Mother with the work of our hands. So, for slightly inarticulate craftspeople such as myself, I have successfully begun an Order of Lugh.

"Lugh (Ludd, Nudd) was a very popular deity in his day, and the patron of all crafts. There is a story of how he demanded entrance to the hall of the Tuatha De Danann and was told he must have some skill they needed; he rattled off every craft known to the Celts, but they already had representatives of each. He got in by winning a chess game in some books, and by being a jack-of-all-trades in others. He is also connected with light and kingship, and has been called 'the Gaulish Mercury.'

"Anyone of second order or higher is welcome to join the Order. There is no real need for an identifying sign, for the people of Lugh will forever be making them. Initiation consists of the candidate making a small 'image of the Mother' (any aspect) of/on some flammable material and casting it into the fire at services. If accepted (I faced the four directions,) the candidate then stammers something before the congregation, about each act of craft being an act of faith or something. 'Twould be nice if the congregation would then congratulate him/her.

"Creation is not the making of the unique, but the combination and rediscovery of what already is. It is therefore both a meditation and a praise of nature. Many of us have already dedicated a landscape or a batch of bread in our hearts--now this power can be manifest with the name Lugh. Natural materials nice, not essential.

"As to organization: I am not greedy for the title of Matriarch. Since I'm the first member, I'll collect comments, news, etc. until someone volunteers to replace me; no need to stress the leadership aspect of the deity. I happen to be RDNA, but you could all please show this announcement to your Groves anyway? Peace!"

More Facts About CIRCLE:

We mentioned last issue a fine Pagan group in the Madison, Wisconsin area called Circle. They've sent us a brief description of themselves:

"Circle is an eclectic metaphysical center headquartered on a farm just outside Madison. As an Aquarian Age educational center, Circle conducts research in parapsychology, maintains a New Age reference library, has a weekly radio show on the frontiers of consciousness, and offers a variety of lectures, workshops and classes on psychic and occult development. As a center for natural living and herbology, Circle offers instruction in herbal knowledge (both classes and an apprenticeship program,) and a great many herbs, wild as well as cultivated, grow in the fields of Circle Farm.

"Among Pagans, however, Circle is best known as a Wicca-Pagan-Magickal Resource Center and publishing house, providing artwork, music, information and contact for Magickal folk throughout the United States and several other countries. Seeking to promote better cooperation and communication among Pagans from many paths, Circle operates the Circle Network, and helps sponsor local, regional and national ecumenical festivals and conferences each year.

"For more information and a free brochure and catalogue, write: CIRCLE, Box 9013, Madison, WI 53715."

We've seen their artwork and songbook, and can recommend them highly. If you run a group that you think the readers of The Druid Chronicler would be interested in, send us an equally brief description and we'll fit it in when we have space. (Or you could break down and buy an ad, in which case it would definitely get printed in the very next issue.)

DC VI Iss 5 Sept 1978

By Robert Larson, 1978

This article, begun last issue, is by Adr. Robert Larson of the Clanna Brochecta Grove, and was originally printed in the Clann's' quarterly publication, "An Poc Uaim," in the Earrach 1978 issue. Subscriptions to this journal are $4.00 per year and can be sent to: Cody Grundy, 820 Circle Court, South San Francisco, CA 94080. We hope to have more of Bob's fine scholarship in future issues.

II. Achieving an accurate calendar

Nowadays we take the Calendar pretty much for granted. The Roman calendar we use is now quite accurate. In the eighteenth century, however, a gross adjustment of about two weeks had to be made in the calendar to rectify accumulated error. The calendar had gained nearly two weeks over the sun. The method for insertion of leap days now used (the insertion of an extra day in every year evenly divisible by four; except the century marks, when the year must be evenly divisible by 400) assures an almost exact accuracy. But it took a long time to arrive at this method of interpolation.

To achieve an accurate calendar, two things are necessary: the need for a calendar and a goodly period of accurate observation. The need for a calendar automatically arises when a people in a temperate climatic zone advances beyond hunting and gathering society. In an agricultural society, accurate timing of planting and harvesting is a necessity. While a calendar may seem to be less necessary in a mainly pastoral society such as that of the Celts, the times of transhumance must be predictable in order for the tribe to gather the herds. If the herds are moved too early in the spring, there may well be too little growth in the hills to support them; if they're moved too late, valuable growing time and the mountain grasses are wasted. If the herds are moved too early in the fall, grasses are wasted again and the harvest is interfered with; if too late, the herds may suffer from the onset of winter storms. In a pastoral society, moving the herds at the wrong time can seriously threaten the tribe's survival. Some sort of calendar is obviously necessary to avoid wastage of time, grass, livestock, and, ultimately, the tribe.

Being a northern people, the Celts had an advantage in calculation over more southerly peoples, for the difference in the lengths of the light and dark periods of the day is greater in the North. Determination of the solstices and, with them, calculation of the length of the solar year is thus made fairly simple. Equinoxes are also more easily determined, and their determination is more accurate than that of the solstices, because the sun's declination is changing more rapidly at equinox than at solstice. In fact, the Celts might well have been saved the trouble of these calculations (and many of the others, too).

A definitely Celtic culture first arose in that crucible of early northern Europeans, southern Germany and Central Europe. In earlier times successive prehistoric cultures had sprung from this area and spread in much the same directions as the Celts did later. One of these pre- (or perhaps proto-) Celtic peoples built Stonehenge. Gerald Hawkins has convincingly shown that Stonehenge incorporates incredible astronomical knowledge. The Celts might well have taken over, or inherited, their entire calendric system from their predecessors. Judging by later Celtic practice, they would not have evicted the peoples they found in their conquered lands, but would only have made them pay tribute to their new overlords. If this be the case, it raises interesting questions about Celtic religion. Considering the correlation of Celtic myth and Druidic philosophy with the calendar, if the Celts co-opted the calendar, much of their religion must also have come from these peoples. The druidic cult would thus be much older than the rest of Celtic culture, and Celtic Myth would reflect not so much early Iron Age beliefs as Bronze Age and Neolithic beliefs, the specifically Celtic elements being a later overlay. Many of the more primitive elements of Celtic religion, such as animism, would be explained by such circumstances.

Be that as it may, the Celts had an accurate count of the solar year early in their history. While the equinoxes are close enough to planting and reaping seasons to do for an agricultural people, a pastoral people follows different rhythms. The most propitious times for transhumance do not fall on significant sun days, but about midway between the equinoxes and solstices. At these mid-points, the sun is at the same angle of declination in the sky. The sun's midpoints can thus be determined by observation and the days of Samhain, Imbolg, Bealtaine, and Lu'nasa set in place. This angle of declination is 16.3', which again corresponds with certain megalithic alignments, again showing the antiquity of at least the basic Celtic calendar. This declination gives the following dates for the holy days: Samhain, November 7; Imbolg, February 4; Bealtaine, May 5; and Lunasa August 7.

Now, the phases of the sun are not equal, due to the slight eccentricity of the earth's orbit causing it to move faster in the winter when it is closer to the sun. Even as using the solstices and equinoxes yields unequal seasons, so does the use of the midpoints. The period from Samhain to Imbolg is about 89 days, whereas the period from Bealtaine to Lunasa is about 94 days, while the other quarters are around 91 days each. I believe it likely that the druids equalized these intervals, both from a sense of neatness and from a desire to better reflect the equal phases of the moon and maintain their religious symbolism. They most likely started at Samhain, the time of regeneration they probably considered immutable. This would yield the following normal dates for the holy days: Samhain, November 7; Imbolg, February 6; Bealtaine, May 8; and Lunasa, August 8. Though this adjustment is not strictly necessary, it makes the calendar work more smoothly and thus would be more convenient for the average Celt or for places where solar observation was difficult and unreliable due to weather. It also reflects druidic numerology, for the days set in this manner are three lunar months and three days apart, give or take a day.

So we come to the moon. The inclusion of the moon in the calendar was inevitable, not only on religious, but also on practical grounds. In practical terms, the moon is a counting device, enabling the observer to easily count large numbers of days and fix time spans with great accuracy. The introduction of the moon into a solar calendar creates great difficulties due to the incompatibility of lunar and solar movements. (The solar year is 365.242 days, whereas twelve lunar periods are 354.36 days.) The Celtic method of reconciliation between these two cycles is in full agreement with druidic precept and ritual and correlates with the peculiar nine-month cycle of celebration.

This article, begun last issue, is by Rachel, the Mother Grove's Botanist. She has over twenty years experience in the biological sciences and is an expert on the medicinal and magical properties of herbs and fungi.

It takes twenty years for an acorn to become a mature oak tree, and it can then live for two or three hundred years in some species. Oaks are not the biggest trees, nor the tallest, nor necessarily the most "impressive." What then makes them so special? Why did they become the Sacred Trees throughout all of Europe? One explanation is the observed fact that oaks are hit by lightning (the "fire of the Gods" --IB) seventeen times more often than any other sort of tree.

(This made the oak sacred to the Fire/Sun/Storm Gods of Europe and made the mistletoe that grew in its branches the most highly prized of all. The Germans and Slavs had their oak cults too, so the Druids of the Celts weren't the only ones. --IB)

When people lived as hunter-gatherers, the oak was considered important for many reasons other than the religious ones. It fed people, tanned their clothes, and cured their ills. Let's analyze the tree by parts.

The wood is valued in Europe for its hardness and toughness. Though there are harder woods and tougher ones, only the oak combines these qualities in its wood. Beams cut 800 years ago in England are still sound in old buildings. Logs dug up from peat bogs have been found in good preservation, despite having been submerged thousands of years ago.

The bark has been used for centuries to tan leather--something very important in a hunting culture that does not have weaving. The active ingredient, tannic acid, is also a medicine with slightly tonic, strongly astringent and antiseptic actions. It is used for chronic diarrhea and dysentery and as a gargle for sore throats. The bark also makes a number of dyes ranging from yellow to dark brown, black and a purplish brown. In England, after the tannic acid had been extracted, the bark (then called "tam") was dried and used for fuel and as a mulch around tender plants (since it generates warmth). In addition, some species of oak (such as the Cork Oak in England and another in California) produce cork from their bark.

Oak galls (swellings caused by parasites) have an even higher amount of tannic acid, and are used to make ink and as a strong local astringent applied externally to stop hemorrhaging (naturally, they are also used in tanning).

Then we have the acorns. These nuts are easy to open and can be quite tasty if left to leach out their tannic acid in running water for a day or two. They seem to have been the main staple in European hunters' diets until the invention of agriculture replaced them with grains. Acorns are still easier to process than wild grasses, and can be easily stored all winter in a dry place or ground into a flour. In Europe today, acorns have been pretty well forgotten as a food and are used only in times of famine (and then they forget to leach them!) or to feed hogs. But in the Americas, however, acorns are still eaten by Indians and by a growing number of foraging buffs. According to an analysis by Lancet, acorns are 6.3% water, 5.2% protein, 43% fat and 45% carbohydrates.

To see how well the oak can help humans, look at the Northern California Indians. They fished and tended their oak groves, growing strong and happy until the Europeans came. The only crop they raised was tobacco, since everything else was provided freely by the environment without work (I'm not sure it was that easy,--IB.)

So look upon the oak tree as the Lady before Kore, the Wheat Goddess, and remember how much it can give you if you ask. Remember too that the deciduous oaks are the best for getting acorns to eat and the evergreen oaks for medicinal uses.

In future articles I'll be discussing Giant Sequoias and other Redwoods, Ashes, Birches and other trees of interest to Druids.

Wedding Contract:

The following Wedding Contract was read aloud during the wedding of Isaac and Selene Bonewits last August 6th. We have had so many requests for copies of it that we are reproducing it here for others to use as they wish.

This marriage bond shall be a link, but not a chain.

Our marriage shall, for the time being, consist of the two of us.

Others, upon mutual consent, may be added to our family.

Our primary affections and commitments as individuals shall be to each other, however, both of us shall be free to share love and affection with others whom both would deem not unworthy.

Both of us shall make our best efforts to earn our daily bread, and both shall share the work of creating and maintaining a felicitous environment. When children arrive in our household, both of us shall share responsibility and authority in raising them.

Both of us shall strive to maintain open communication between us while respecting each other's right to privacy and occasional isolation.

Each of us shall be supportive of the other's growth in body, mind and spirit, and accept that this will sometimes be inconvenient.

This contract may be renegotiated at any time upon a month's notice, to provide time for thought. No decision to terminate this contract will be made by either without at least three months of joint counseling with a mutually agreed-upon counselor.

This marriage shall be built upon a foundation of sensitivity and mutual consideration for each other's needs and desires.

Subscription Business:

When this newsletter began, all we asked for was "a buck or two" and people took us literally. The result was that the Publishing Fund was constantly in the red, especially as the contents of each issue began to expand. We have finally had to set the subscription price at $5.00 per year, sent to the Editor.

Another problem with the early record keeping was that there wasn't much. We noted who had paid and who hadn't, and that was that. No dates were kept, so we don't know when those early $1-$2 subs expired. We were also sending out lots of free copies in the hopes of encouraging people to pay for subs.

All this is changing now. We are going to have Law and Order! If you look at your mailing label you will notice a few code letters or numbers in the right upper corner. "9/79," for example, means that your sub expires in September of 1979. For the sake of simplicity, all $1-$2 subs have been extended to "12/78," even though we'll lose money on that. "EX" means that it's an Exchange Subscription with your publication. "F" means that you're getting it Free. If you are getting this issue free and your label doesn't have an "F" on it then this is the last one you will get without a subscription of some sort. This issue alone will cost us over $150 to put out and paper and postage costs will no doubt continue to skyrocket. TANSTAAFL!!

"Old Gods & New Devils"

Newsletter:

We've just finished reading a fantastic new publication, a journal of thoughtful philosophical discussions of modern problems, set in a Pagan metaphysical context. Not since The Green Egg died has such serious intellectual effort been given towards establishing modern Paganism as a "real" philosophical school. We don't agree with everything editor Robert Gover (author of "The One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding") has to say, but then he obviously doesn't expect anybody to! He seems to view the Old Gods as primarily archetypes, rather than as living Beings, and seems to have a mild bias towards the Greco-Roman deities. But he also appears open to printing serious articles and letters (and perhaps a few humorous ones as well) by folks wanting to put forth solid philosophical arguments, whether they agree with him or not. So if you've been starved for some real intellectual food to chew on, and have found no other Pagan source to suit you, try Old Gods & New Devils. Subscriptions are $15 per year, or $5.00 for four months, sent to: OG&ND, Box 1546, Goleta, CA 93017.

The Hermetic Journal

Those of you interested in alchemy, kabbalah and related Hermetic studies may want to take a look at The Hermetic Journal, a quarterly publication from Scotland. We haven't the space here to do a detailed description, but send them $3 for a sample copy or $10 for a year's sub. Their leaflet on it makes it look pretty good, if this is an area you want to do deep research in. Write to: The Hermetic Journal, Megalithic Research Publications, 12 Antigua Street, Edinburgh 1, Scotland.

Next Issue:

Next issue will be Volume 2, Issue one of The Druid Chronicer, and we hope to start the year off spectacularly. We'll have the conclusion of Bob Larson's series on Celtic timekeeping, an article by Adr. Stephen McCaully on "Celtic and Druidic Moon Goddesses, from A to C" (from his Encyclopedia of Celtic Gods and Goddesses,) a new song or two, and news from local Groves around the country. We'll keep expanding the newsletter as people keep sending us good material and buying subscriptions!

The Active Groves:

The following are all the Druid Groves in the RDNA/NRDNA movements that we know for sure are in existence:

Mother Grove, NRDNA: Adr. Isaac Bonewits, Box 9398, Berkeley, CA 94709. Phone: 415-547-6697. Publishes The Druid Chronicer ($5 year,) holds services for the Highdays only. Pentalpha Journal & Druid Chronicler

Volume 3, Issue 1
Fall 1979 c.e.

Editorial

Welcome to Volume 3 of Pentalpha Journal! We started out two years ago as The Druid Chronicler, used both names for a year, and are now switching over completely to the new name. But those of the Druidic persuasion need not despair — TDC is still part of PJ, as you'll see in this and every issue.

We've grown beyond our original scope— Pentalpha Journal is now a quarterly magazine for the entire Aquarian Age community. We still have our Neopagan slant, but we're going to be including news articles, reviews and other materials of interest to those who are involved in ceremonial magic, parapsychology, astrology, psychic anatomy, vodoun, earth mysteries, cybernetics, psychic healing, ecology action, polytheistic theology, ritual design and execution, and many other areas of interest to those of us who are seeking our paths towards growth in old/new ways.

Religion and Science, Magic and Art, Poetry and Technology — all are needed if we are truly going to make it to the next step in Evolution. We who are engaged in working at the fringes of human knowledge need desperately to communicate — both with each other and with the general public. That's why we publish Pentalpha Journal: An Interdisciplinary Journal for the Aquarian Age.

In this issue we've got a review of the recent Parapsychological Association's annual convention, an article on ritual design, an historical survey on the role of sheep in Paleopagan cultures, an inspired prose poem about a divine vision, an article about one metaphysician's discoveries about nuclear power, and more. We've got our regular departments — Sushumna, the Chakra Column, The Druid Chronicles, Aquarian Age News, (about conventions and interesting organizations), Reviews of new books and tarot decks, the Contacts column, Feedback letters, Pentalpha Activities, and more.

Next issue we hope to add several new departments, including: Amargi, about the activities of the Church of All Worlds; Thaumaturgic American, about experimental design for psychics and magicians; Yggdrasil, about the activities of Norse Pagans; Magical Astrologer, about astrological effects on magical and psychic energies, and vice versa; and maybe even more!

Some of you may have noticed that this issue is late. Well, it did take more time to put together than we thought it would (adjusting to the new format and all), but the primary reason was that Selene, who has been doing all our typesetting and camera work, had a physical breakdown. She discovered that working for 40 hours a week at her regular job, then doing another 30 hours of Pentalpha activities, was more than she could handle!

As a result she exhausted her physical reserves and suffered several illnesses that kept her from doing much of anything, magical or mundane, for over a month. She's recovered now, and is training a new typesetter, so the Winter issue should come out fairly close to schedule in late December. But we've learned an important lesson. We (Selene & Isaac) can't do it all by ourselves anymore! Both Pentalpha as an organization and PJ as a magazine have become too big for just two people to handle.

So, we are asking friends, members and readers to help out with the donations of time, energy and money. The response so far has been encouraging (this issue wouldn't have come out without it), we are still going to need all the help we can get if we're to keep the organization and the magazine afloat. Some details on this appear in this issue's Pentalpha's Activities department.

Many people have made genuinely wonderful suggestions for things we could do or publish — but hardly anyone things about where the time, money and sheer energy are going to come from. We're will to do our share, and a little bit more, but the rest of the community is going to have to help out before Selene, Isaac, and the rest of the gang at Pentalpha burn out.

An interdisciplinary journal for the Aquarian Age.

Pentalpha Journal is the official publication of Pentalpha: The Association for the Advancement of Aquarian Age Awareness, a chartered member organization within The Church of All Worlds, Inc. It is published quarterly, in the general vicinity of the Solstices and Equinoxes, and contains news, essays, technical articles, songs, ceremonial critiques, and other items of interest to the Aquarian Age community.

Submissions: All items submitted for publication must be neat and legible, and clearly marked as "for publication." Artwork should be camera-ready and black-and-white (unless meant for the cover). If materials are to be copyright in the name of the creators, they must be clearly marked thusly. Our budget is tight, so items without return postage enclosed may not be returned.

Deadlines: All materials, including ads, must be received by November 1st, for the Winter issue; February 1st, for Spring; May 1st, for Summer; and August 1st, for Fall.

Subscriptions: See the subscription form elsewhere in this issue.

Ad Rates: Send for our Rate Card.

Copyrights: All items not otherwise marked are Copyright 1979 by Pentalpha and all rights are reserved to the original creators and publishers.

Editors: Isaac & Selene Bonewits

Staff Writer: Anodea Judith

Artwork: Linda Cook, Anodea, Craig Miller, Zai Zatoon, and others.

Production: Isaac & Selene, Kerrie & Kyle Griffith

Subscription Services: Randall Millen Registry (921 Colorado Ave., Palo Alto, CA 94303)

Printing: Isaac, Bill Heidrick (courtesy of O.T.O. Box 2303, Berkeley, CA 94702)

Collation: various volunteers.

Special Thanks

Chris Sherbak – without his generous contributions, this issue, like several previously, would never have come out at all.

Randall Millen – for his meticulous and confidential handling of our mailing list gives us efficiency, accuracy and a strong feeling of security.

Craig Miller – for his beautiful illustrations for the various department logos.

The Ordo Templi Orientis – for letting us use their printing press (as well as their classroom space).

Heliographics – for the use of typesetting equipment and light boards.

A Note About Our Paper

This issue of Pentalpha Journal is printed entirely on 100% Recycled Offset Bond from the Conservatree Company. This buff colored paper is easy on the eye, pleasing in its variety of shades, of archival quality (it'll last longer than regular paper), and is ecologically sound.

Patronize Our Advertisers

They're a major source of the funding that keeps PJ in operation. When you buy something from one of our advertisers, you're helping PJ as well as yourself. Let them know where you saw their ad. Thanks.

Gnosticon I

The Fir Gnostic Conference of the Gnostic Society and Ecclesia Gnostica will be held October 26th to 28th at the Tree House Motel in the city of Mount Shasta, California. The sponsoring organizations are modern, nondualistic Gnostic groups with strong interests in Jungian psychology, hermeticism, Kabbalah, magic and wholistic health.

Speakers will include Stephen A. Hoeller; Rosa Miller Richard Hanuman, Erin Cameron and Richard H. Svihus. The suggested registration fee is $60 per person or $100 per couple. For hotel reservations, call the Tree House's toll free number: (800) 528-1234. See the ad elsewhere in this issue for further details, or write to: Gnostic Society/Ecclesia Gnostica, 3437 A Street #23. Palo Alto, CA 94303 or phone (415)

Samhain Seminar

The Seventh Annual Samhain Seminar of the Church and School of Wicca will be held November 9th-11th, at the Ramada Inn in Durham NC. The C&SW is an eclectic reconstructionist Witchcraft organization, based originally upon Welsh materials but with a great deal of other occult traditions mixed in,

The theme for this year's seminar is 'Life After Death,' and speakers will include: Yvonne & Gavin Frost, Raymond Buck land, Colin of Ravenwood, William Wheeler and (possibly) Isaac Bonewits. The cost is free! (Though donations will be accepted and really are needed). For further information, contact: Church & School of Wicca, Box 1502, New Bern, NC 28560: For hotel reservations, write: Ramada Inn Downtown Box 98, Durham, NC 27702.

Science for the People

Most Aquarians [tend] to think that science and technology are wonderful tools and terrible masters. But where can we get honest scientific advice on matters such as nutrition, food additives, the politics of food, etc.? As most "authorities" in the field are pawns of the very power structures that are killing us how, its hard to find anyone we can trust.

Look into the Center for Science in the Public Interest. They publish books, leaflets, posters and other educational materials aimed squarely at demystifying technology and in returning control of science to the consumer. One of their posters, 'Chemical Cuisine' is a complete guide to all the food additives commonly used, listing which ones are safe and which ones to avoid, with the data presented in a clear and usable format. If you're concerned about what you put into your body then you should investigate C.S.P.I. They're at 1755 'S' Street NW, Washington, DC 20009.

Summer Festivals

The Gathering of the Tribes last June 17th was a big success. Members and leaders of a variety of Earth Religions, including representatives of the Hopi nation, met in Unicoi State Park in Georgia. Amid dire warnings of impending doom. But as the festival organizers had promised all along, the local residents not only were friendly, some of them even signed up for workshops and enjoyed themselves tremendously.

We couldn't get to the Midwest Pan-Pagan Festival held in July, but we heard that it was also a resounding success, with over three hundred attendees and a great deal of knowledge exchanged. They even made the religion page of Time in a less snide than usual article (once again we should thank Methodist Minister J. Gordon Melton for his kindness and courageous words to the mass media). We send our best wishes and blessings to all of these folks who are working to bring the Neopagan community together and provide opportunities for us to share our knowledge with each other and with those involved in other areas of the Aquarian community.

Traditional Chinese Medicine A Holistic Model

This is the title of a conference with workshops to be held in San Francisco, December 8th-11th. It's sponsored by the International Society for Professional Education (Box 27573, San Fran., CA 94127; phone 415-731 -1330) and is aimed mostly at professional members of the healing professions. "Continuing Education" credit is available for doctors, nurses etc. but paraprofessionals and nonestablishment healers may find a great deal of interesting information here. On the 8th & 9th is the conference (which -costs $85): talks on the metaphysical bases of Chinese medicine, dietary methods, directing energy flow in the body, diagnosing via tongues, irises and pulses, acupuncture and acupressure, Chinese herbalism, etc. On the 10th and 11th there are a variety of workshops on learning the specific techniques mentioned during the conference. These are expensive ($32 each 3½ hour session) and mastery is hardly likely to be so swiftly achieved, but for those with specific interests they may be well be worthwhile. The faculty has some impressive names including Patricia Garfield, William Khoe, Kim-man Lai, Michael Wong, Yat-Chiow Yeung and others.

Pagan Books

Drawing Down the Moon: The Resurgence of Paganism in America by Margot Adler will be published by Viking Press on October 31st (naturally). This is the first book about the Neopagan movements written by a Neopagan, and certainly is the most extensive thorough and unbiased examination to date. It's entertaining, erudite and (to some) exasperating. Bound to be controversial, it's one book you should not miss buying.

Another book by a Neopagan Witch will be coming out on the very same day, this one The Spiral Dance: A Rebirth of the Ancient Religion of the Great Goddess, by Starhawk (Harper & Row). In Order to celebrate the publication, Starhawk and other members of the Covenant of the Goddess (see Contacts Column) are throwing a ritual called "A Spiral Dance" in honor of "the true Halloween," on October 31st at 7:30 pm in the Fort Mason Center for World Music (Building 312, Marina & Laguna in S.F.). The ritual will use masks, dance and polyrhythmic chanting to invoke the archetypal energies behind the Halloween stereotypes. The ceremony is free and afterwards the publishers are springing for a party and book signing celebration. .

We'll have detailed reviews of both these books in the next issue of PJ.

Ariadne

Batya Padeo has been working on promoting the spiritual awareness of the Goddess through her production (and writing and directing) of plays in the Bay Area, Ariadne is her third, and looks to be well worth seeing and supporting. She has been funding the plays out of her own paycheck, depending on volunteers to perform, build & design their own costumes, do all the technical work, and to pay for it all out of their own pockets. They work with bare survival rehearsal space, and the going is rough.

Ariadne is a feminist version of Theseus and The Minotaur and promises to be a powerful experience. It will be running in San Francisco on Oct. 26 & 27 Nov. 2,3,4,9,10,11 16, & 17, and the cost will be $3.50. For more information, or to send any donations (much needed!) write to Batya c/o Women's Studies Program, San Francisco State, 1600 Holloway Ave, San Francisco 94132 .

Pagan Periodicals

The Crystal well, one of the best-known Neopagan magazines, is back on its feet again after a year of silence. Janine Renee is the new editor, and the Volume 13, #3 Harvest issue is now out. Contents include articles on "Bardic Tree Magic," "Storm Magic" "Crafting a Magical Drinking Horn," "Exercising Your Familiar," "The Blessing Way" and "Inner Plane Travels," as well as poetry, news and more. T.C.W. describes itself as a "Journal of Neo-romantic Paganism," and so it is. See the ad in this issue of PJ for subscription details.

The Sword of Dyrnwyn is the newsletter of the Association of Cymmry Wicca, one of the major Neopagan Witchcraft organizations in the Southern states. They are having Survival problems right now and urgently need people to send them articles, news, recipes, poems, reviews, interesting letters and — oh yes! — subscriptions! The cost is $5.95 per year in the U.S. and $7.95 elsewhere and they need help from the community. Their address is Box 4152, Campus Station, Athens, GA 30602.

Halloween PR

It's that time of year again! The media are all trying to do "spooky" stories for Halloween, and looking for Witches to interview. Well, this year, at least in the Bay Area, they are contacting people who actually know what they're taking about — thanks to deliberate PR work by the covenant of the Goddess (C.O.G.) and Pentalpha,

C.O.G. is a legal church composed of dozens of Neopagan and Feminist covens, mostly in California. C.O.G. members Starhawk, Valerie Walker (the new First Officer), Deborah Bender (former Correspondence Secretary) and Levanah have all been giving interviews to reporters from radio and TV stations as well as local newspapers. Starhawk and Co. are even throwing special dress rehearsal of her "Spiral Dance" rite for the local TV-stations, parts of which may be broadcast on the evening news magazines Halloween night.

Isaac will be showing up on KTSF (26) TV October 25th at 10:30 pm; on the KPIX (5) TV "Evening Magazine" Oct 31st at 7:30 pm; on the ABC Radio Network news programs (AM & FM) Oct 31st as well as in local papers

Maybe this year we'll be able to get some facts across to the general public for once!

Other Aquarians doing PR work this season should write to the Feedback dept. and let folks know how their efforts are rewarded.

Wheel of the Year

We are delighted to announce that Gwydion's new songbook wheel of the Year is finished! It has twenty-eight songs and dances, including all the seasonal and sabbat songs, with twelve songs never before published. The book itself is beautiful (we should know -- we did the production work ourselves) with numerous fine drawings by Craig Miller and a magnificent cover photo of a Stonehenge sunset. It's printed on sturdy stock and will last for years. At $6.00 per copy, it's a real bargain.

Also still available are copies of Gwydion's famous record album, Songs of the old Religion at $7.00 each. For either or both, send your check or money order to: Nemeton, Box 212, Redwood Valley, CA 95470

If you have news of upcoming major conventions, soon to be published books, organizations people should know about or other items liable to be of interest to the entire Aquarian/Magical/Neopagan community, let us know!

The 22nd Annual Parapsychological Association Conference

Or A Journey Into Psientific Technology
By I.C. More

August 15, 16, 17, and 18th of this year brought the members of the Parapsychological Association to the Bay Area for a four-day conference held beneath the Christian cross of Saint Mary's College in Moraga, California. The day was bright and sunny as I waded my way through gas lines and traffic toward the beautiful "nestled in the hills" campus, which was gleaming white with its monklike cleanliness.

After weaving my way through parking lots and past fruit trees, garden paths and other earthly delights, I finally spotted a group of hurrying men and women dressed in the standard suit and tie, or heels and dresses that I later learned was both typical and expected for gatherings of this particular group. I, too, was hurrying and arrived in the dark auditorium just in time to see the past president, a white-haired man with an English accent say "Thank you" and sit down. So much for the welcoming remarks. This was followed by remarks of Pascal Kaplan, Dean of General Studies at John F. Kennedy University (which hosted the conference) introduce their current Graduate and Under graduate programs in Parapsychology and the Study of Consciousness. The remarks were encouraging and inviting, considering the present limits of most educational institutions, but there was the sense of forced respectability that was to set and/or conform to the academic tone that ran through the whole conference.

The stage was set with a long table, with chairs and microphones and a podium on the right, over which most of the presentations were made. The three or four hundred people in the audience appeared to be a mixture of ages, nationalities and professions, but the large percentage of the population seemed to be over fifty, male, and quite successfully professional looking (as well as white). They came from a wide geographical range in this country as well as many from England, Iceland, Germany, and India.

The first set of papers was to be on the topic of Psi and Cognition and they began with an excellent paper by Ernesto Spinelli of Hampshire, England, on "The Effects of Complex Tasks on GESP Ability in Young Children." Mr. Spinelli found that GESP (general extra sensory perception) not only decreased with the increase of age in the children (who ranged from 3 to 8 years old) but GESP decreased with the increase of cognitive tasks as well. In other words, the more complex the conscious thought (or left brain activity), the weaker the GESP ability of psi function. Most interesting. The ensuing papers dealt with experimental approaches to testing psi with and against memory, speaking more to the fastidiousness of the experimenter than to the value of the findings themselves.

The rest of the morning dealt with topics on Micro PK Studies and contained papers on "The Mystery of Irreproduceability," a paper on Aversion Therapy and Psi, showing that subjects did not show greater psychic ability under the threat and use of painful electric shock; and "Directional PK Effects with a Computer-based Random Generator System," a rather interesting experiment involving the successful psychokinetic (PK) control of a random, moving computer graphic display.

The break for lunch gave everyone a chance to mingle, and I found myself joining three men at a table in a cafeteria whose beauty was as great as its food was poor. The conversation was typical – one man who considered himself a professional skeptic argued with another man who considered himself a professional psychic, while the third tried to mediate between the two and I gave up altogether trying to get a word in edgewise. I excused myself and returned to a very scientific set of papers on Spontaneous Case/Free Response Methodology, which discussed the qualities of targets used in psi experiments to test EP by having the subject guess or describe what they think is on a given screen, card, or similar set-up. It was shown that pictures of organic outdoor scenes scored more "hits" or appropriate matching responses than pictures of people, boatyards, etc. Animals were also high on the "hit" score.

The Symposiums were by far the most interesting and the one scheduled for the first day was on Psi and Scientific Method: Views from Diverse Perspectives, and it was here that Rhea A. White, a middle-aged woman from the American Society for Psychical Research, let the "cat out of the bag" by stating that psi phenomenon cannot necessarily be measured by science and physical methods that she had felt that way for 25 years and that the taboo against this kind of belief was so encompassing within the Association that she was only just now having the courage to say so in front of her colleagues. This was a typical indication of the state of the art within the Parapsychological Association. There was an intense loyalty to standard scientific method, with downright hostility to anything vaguely radical, and at the same time a growing dissatisfaction among the younger members about the overuse of such clinical methods.

The Symposium of Thursday morning interested me a great deal covering Altered States of Consciousness (Charles Tart), Psychic Healing, Psi-Conducive Communities, Shamanism, and Haunting, but many of the papers turned out to be other than I expected. Tart's paper dealt chiefly with hypnosis and drew no major conclusions, the Psychic Healing paper had more theory than it did Psi or Healing, the Psi-Conducive Communities mentioned a few tribal cultures with some mention of fasting and hallucinogens, but made absolutely no mention of any of the current American groups who gather together for the express purpose of doing psychic work, such as ritual magic or healing. Nor did the speaker mention any forms of ancient or modern "Witchcraft" as being related to such communities.

The talk on Shamanism (Rex Stanford), entitled "Are we Shamans or Scientists?" seemed to stress that it's more important to be scientists than to be shamans, stating that science had made more progress than magic and would probably continue to do so. The last talk, "A Case of Haunting," given by a very serious looking fellow (William G. Roll) turned out to be the most humorous talk given, and discussed the fact that the auras of the parapsychological experimenters stay in the laboratory long after the experimenters themselves have gone home each night, and that these factors need to be considered in evaluating clinical results.

There were more talks throughout that day and the next which covered such topics as Psi and Personality (people with open minds are more psychic than people with closed minds), Improving Communication Between Parapsychologists and Other Scientists, a roundtable discussion of such things as grants, publications, and the overuse of scientific jargon among those in parapsychological research. Psi and Social Interactions spoke of poltergeists in the family, the effect of competition on psi performance, and more on the experimenter effect.

Friday afternoon was perhaps the highpoint of the conference with a symposium on Synchronicity and Psi: Causal vs. Acausal Paradigms, chaired by Barbara Honegger, (Washington Research Center). It was in this symposium that I saw the first traces of actual creative thinking. The talks began with Alan Vaughan (New Ways of Consciousness Foundation), who discussed the parameters of space and time, as created by consciousness, which exists outside of space and time. This was followed by a talk on poltergeists by Hans Bender from Germany, a delightfully entertaining talk stating in essence that collective unconscious is identical with nature, making, as each speaker did, many references to C. G. Jung along the way. Barbara Honegger gave a brilliant talk on the effects of language as a factor in synchronicity, delving into her own personal experiences, and dealing with the questions of inter-hemispheric verbal communication as a factor in waking state psi. The symposium ended with a gentleman from Maryland, who attempted to rebut all of the above theories by garbling Jung's definition of the term synchronicity, and stating that it had no causal or psychic factor at all, and besides it was all "unproven". Despite the audience's apparent fear of any less-than-scientific thinking, it seemed that these talks were well received. Anyone willing to take the courageous step and present new theories was welcomed, at least by those who shared similar views and perhaps did not have the courage or experimental documentation to say so.

An Unexpected Look at Sheep in Paleopagan Society

By Cyprian

We cannot hope to understand ancient Pagan cultures, much less their religions, without a thorough and realistic scrutiny of just how various Paleopagan peoples actually lived. We need to know the circumstances of their lives because religious though, social behavior and the entire texture of civilization (or the lack of it) ultimately is determined by the physical circumstances in which people find themselves. Thus the desert Arab Moslem sees Paradise as a green and blooming land filled with flowing waters...much the picture of a verdant English landscape.

One of the vital aspects of European Paleopagan life, and one which has been largely overlooked simply because it is no longer of any consequence in western civilization, is the severe paucity of fiber throughout European history until at least the latter part of the 18th century. Today we are so glutted with fibers, both natural and artificial, that we have lost sight of the simple fact that the ancient European peoples had a hard scratch of it to put clothes on their backs.

Archaeology can tell us that Neolithic people wore leather garments because we have found the tools used to make them; we also know that they raised sheep because we have found the bones; and we also know they raised flax, the source of linen, because we have found flax seed imprints in their pottery. That they made textiles is known from finds of spindle whorls and pictorial representations of simple frameless looms and, by the most incredible of good fortune, the find of a piece of carbonized cloth.

At this point we need to stop and point out something so obvious that it's generally overlooked: wool from sheep and linen from flax were the two and only fiber sources commonly available to the Paleopagans in northern Europe and Britain. Although silk was imported into Europe at a surprisingly early date, it won't be discussed here because its scarcity and high price kept it forever out of reach of all but the very wealthiest individuals (this was also true of cotton until recently). Leather, wool and linen were what people wore because that was all there was available to them.

Now all this makes a difference, a big one, as to what was important in life and what wasn't. Many people now assume that the sheep was a meat animal throughout western history simply because that is the animal's status now. However, this is not true at all. Sheep were not considered a meat source in the West until wool was no longer critical as a fiber supply – not until the late 18th century! The sheep was simply too valuable for its wool to be casually slaughtered and served up as so many mutton chops.

Compounding the sheep's value as a primary fiber source was the sheep's rather uncertain and slow reproductive cycle; a slaughtered sheep is difficult to replace through normal herd reproduction. Also, while pigs, goats and cattle can browse profitably in scrub and forest land and even help clear the land for future cultivation, sheep must graze in open pasture; just another factor setting them apart from other domestic animals. These considerations, all working together, assured sheep a unique place in the economy until modern times, when wool lost its premier position in the quest for fiber.

(Woven cotton cloth was introduced into England in 1681 c.e., establishing the third fiber, even though cotton could not be grown except in parts of the Mediterranean Basin and required prodigious hand labor to be turned into cloth. A century later the production of textiles became the first industry to be taken out of the cottage and fully mechanized and powered by other than human or animal muscle. Thus, for better or worse, the Industrial Revolution was founded upon the spinning jenny, the cotton gin, and the steam powered loom.)

An example of the sheep's preindustrial importance may be found in Ralph Whitlock's delightful book, The Folklore of Wiltshire (Batsford). Whitlock, who had himself been a farmboy, recounts how Wiltshire (England) farms were run for the benefit and convenience of sheep and how the shepherd was the "king" of farm workers.

Archeological evidence sustains the sheep's favored position in Paleopagan times. A bone count made at Durrington Walls (Wiltshire near Stonehenge) suggests the eating habits of the Neolithic occupants of the site. The count reveals 27.4% were cattle bones, 63.8% pig and a mere 1.9% sheep and goats. The remaining percentages were distributed among wild game. Dr. Euan MacKie proposes in his book, Science and Society in Prehistoric Britain (Elek), that the occupants of Durrington Walls were not consonant with the normal rural population of Neolithic Wiltshire but were in fact members of a priestly caste, perhaps associated with close-by Stonehenge. The scant 1.9% certainly seems to indicate that sheep and goats were used as sacrificial, ritual animals and not as a regular food source.

About 15 miles almost due north of Durrington Walls is the great Avebury Neolithic complex. Part of this complex is the Windmill Hill causewayed camp. Archaeological investigation has suggested that this hilltop site was a seasonal cattle market and, according to my own research at the hill, this fits in with our growing knowledge of the pre-Christian pastoral calendar in Britain. Analysis of the animal bones found at the Late Neolithic level reveals 56.2% cattle, 22.6% pig and 13.1% sheep and goats, the remainder being again wild game. It's too bad, for our purposes, that the archaeologists did not see fit to separate out the sheep from the goats! At any event, 13.1% of the total could well represent sacrificial animals, herd culls and normal herd mortality. The percentage is too small to represent any real reliance on sheep as a meat source.

It's of some interest to note that hilltop markets, by then largely sheep, continued in Wiltshire until about World War One. Whitlock (cited above) says the shepherds hated the open and exposed hilltop sites. I wonder if those shepherds realized they were continuing a tradition begun at least five thousand years earlier?

People do not sacrifice that which they hold of little value. They do not offer dirt to the Gods. But their sheep were of value – of great, almost over-weening value—and they offered them.

In this light, Christian terminology and iconography establishing the Christ as “The Good Shepherd,” “The Lamb of God,” “The Sacrificial Lamb,” etc., begin to make a lot more sense. So too does the Nativity story that announcement of the birth of the Christ child was made to “shepherds tending their flocks by night” and not to farmers hoeing their crops at noontide. No, these terms and images would be readily understood by the European Paleopagans whom evangelists were trying to convert to their new and radical faith.

We should observe in passing that some authorities contend that the word Lammas (used by some to refer to a major holy day occurring in early August) originates from the so-called “Lamb Mass” celebrated each August 1st at the Cathedral of St. Peter Vinculis, in York, England. At this mass, each man holding land in feudal tenure brought a lamb as offering. Such an offering would be entirely in keeping with earlier Pagan practices – only now the Pagan sacrificial lamb was offered to the “Sacrificial Lamb of God.”

The Neolithic pre-Celtic society of Europe and Britain apparently was more agricultural than pastoral. The available archaeological evidence points to a farmstead society based on wheat and barley with enough domestic animals to supply immediate needs. One of the factors limiting domestic livestock production was the difficulty in obtaining enough feed to “winter-over” the stock. Consequently, as an approaching winter depleted the pasturage, surplus animals were harvested at Samhain and the remaining breeding stock was gotten through the winter as best as could be done.

The difficulty in providing winter food is best illustrated by the well-known “elm-decline” that began in prehistoric Britain around 3,000 b.c.e. The pollen record showed a sharp decline in elm pollen after that time, but there was no satisfactory explanation until a chance find at an ancient Swiss lake-village site revealed the Neolithic inhabitants to have been stripping leaves and twigs from elm trees and using them for winter cattle feed. Such a technique could hardly be expected to support the large herds we associate with a pastoral society. Even by the time of Saxon England, the situation seemed hardly better. Dr. Dorothy Whitelock, in her book, The Beginnings of English Society, (Penguin Books) records: “Owing to the shortage of feeding stuffs, only a minimum of stock could be kept throughout the winter; many beasts had to be slaughtered in the autumn and the flesh salted for winter consumption.”

The idea of pastoral society and the extensive land-use techniques required to support it does not seem too indigenous to Europe. Instead it appears to have been imported, perhaps from the steppes of Asia, and its best known historical impact came in Greece where invading male-god oriented pastoralists are believed by some to have overwhelmed the resident female-deity oriented farmers (including those of Crete) and to have established their own civilization, the Mycenaean, which gave us such pastoral Bronze Age swashbucklers as Herakles (Hercules), Agamemnon and Achilles. Perhaps, from such stock sprang the Tuatha de Danaan – pastoralists all – who pushed their way into Europe's final frontier, Ireland. Irish folklore certainly remembers these daring bronze-weaponed pastoralists, just as many of us remember, through Homer, the deeds of Achilles ‘neath the storied towers of Ilium.

It seems almost criminal to dismiss so much fascinating history in a mere paragraph, but the ebb and flow of peoples in not our subject here. Let us merely note that the Bronze Age warriors of Greece were themselves overwhelmed by yet another pastoral peoples, the Dorians, who with their new swords of iron pretty much hacked their way into whatever territory they wanted – and they wanted it all – just as the later Iron Age Kelts overcame the farmer and the Bronze Age pastoralists of Europe, Britain, Scotland and Ireland.

You will note that our discussion has turned from one of peace to one of the sword. There is a reason for this shift and it is rooted in a fundamental but little recognized difference between the farmer and the pastoralists. The physical evidence indicates that the Neolithic farming age was one of those now rare eras in human history, an era of relative peace. There is a reason for this: farmers, no matter how hard they try, can cultivate only a limited amount of land. This limit is determined by their own labor (and the labor available to assist) and the technology at their disposal. What this means is that the farmer is not land-acquisitive. Extra land is of no value to a farmer. Instead of an asset, it can be a liability. Further, because of the nature of farming operations, the farmer is wedded to the land and there is no better way of putting it. In the spring one must plant, then cultivate, then harvest, then prepare the land to plant again. The ploughman in Aelfric's Colloquy, quoted in Whitelock's book, may speak for farmers everywhere when he declares:

“I go out at dawn driving the oxen to the field and yoke them to the plough. It is never so harsh a winter that I dare lurk at home...but when the oxen have been yoked and the ploughshare and coulter fastened to the plough, I must plough each day a full acre or more...I must fill the oxen's manger with hay, and water them, and clear out the dung.”

This endless cycle of toil to wrest a livelihood from the soil leaves precious little time to go adventuring.

Pastoralists have an entirely different life situation. Rather than being tied to the land, they rove upon it as they follow their herds and flocks. Further, as their animals exhaust of pasturage, they must move on to new land, regardless of who claims it. As the herds increase in size, still more land is required for their support. Thus pastoralists are very much land-acquisitive. They must have land and ever more land if their animals, which are their livelihood and wealth, are to survive and prosper. The pastoralist, unlike the farmer, is ever aggressive because the herds ever need new lands to graze. Today, we call this process of land acquisition “war.” Only the weapons have changed.

So there we have the nub of it: the pastoralist must be aggressive in order to acquire ever more land for the flocks and herds, and they made their warlike male deities in this image. Farmers are settled upon the land, and in this sense are considered passive, and their Earth Goddess is molded after them. They are ripe for exploitation because of their more or less fixed position upon the land, and they have certainly been exploited throughout history. The traditional contempt of the ruling pastoralist for the farmer was nowhere better shown than in the recent farmers’ “tractorcade” upon Washington. Our government openly admitted the farmers had been ripped off and, according to our Secretary of Agriculture, we are going to continue plundering the farmers. After all, as pastoralists we have a license: announcement of the birth of Christ was made to shepherds, not farmers.

In trying to take a realistic look backward at the role of sheep and the herdsman in Paleopagan society we have kicked the shins of at least two popular notions: that the sheep was valued as a meat animal, and the shepherd (herder) represents, with their lambs, the tender and loving creature of popular and especially Christian myth and iconography.

The final part of this essay, which has already taken unexpected turns, deals with the relationship between stockpeople and their animals. Here we must attempt to destroy one more romantic shibboleth, kick another shin, if we are to approach the realities of Pagan life. As a boy, I grew up on my grandfather’s farm. This was a dairy and stock farm, and such farming that was done was done mostly to provide feed and pasture for the animals. Now, while it is true that our work animals, being fellow laborers, were held in some affection (I still remember with something more than nostalgia a big hammer-headed mule named “Old Jack”), the other animals, from chickens to prize dairy cows, were viewed purely for their value as meat or milk producers. When one of the dairy cows (and they were all named) fell behind in milk production, she was loaded on the truck and taken to the stockyards and sold as a canner and cutter. There was no tear shed, the only concern was how to best replace her in the herd to make up for the loss in milk production. This was a matter of economics, not sentiment.

The same outlook was even more pronounced in the case of animals raised for meat. I well remember the year I was given two pigs to raise, John and Mary, and with my sister I tended to them most diligently. I think I was about eleven at the time. Sentiment? A few days after Samhain I took my Remington .22 and dropped them both cleanly, then helped dress out the carcasses. The meat was mighty good that winter, and the next year I was allowed to participate in the big “hog killing” and this was a signal honor in my life.

The point of all this personal history is to indicate two things: (1) I know what I’m talking about because I’ve been there, and (2) domestic livestock are economic assets but like other assets they are of no value until they are harvested. In the case of the dairy cow, the harvest is milk, twice a day. When that harvest fails, the cow is no longer an asset and she must be disposed of and replaced by a new animal that will fill her place in the economic production line.

With animals raised for consumption, the relationship seems even more direct. From the moment of birth, the animal, be it the wobbly and appealing calf, the charming pink piglet or the fuzzy chick, is destined for the table. I promise you, sentiment and romantic notions have no place in this real and hardheaded world of animal husbandry, simply because they are unreal luxuries that cannot be afforded. Sentiment cannot be put on the table nor in the bank. This is not to say that stockpeople do not care for their animals, of course they care for them, but they are not sentimentally attached to them. The animal is bred, born, nurtured and finally slaughtered to provide human food, and in so doing a curious thing occurs. The animal, in making its individual sacrifice, assures the survival of its species.

Lest this seem an unusual assessment, we need to remember that Nature ever squanders the individual to promote the survival of the species. Consider this: not one of our domestic plants or animals, unlike the other inhabitants of this planet, is likely to qualify for the endangered species list. In harvesting domestic plants and animals, we guarantee those species will survive and prosper.

This arrangement may seem harsh in terms of the individual animal, but it has worked exceedingly well in terms of species welfare. If you think this is not so, then think about how many wild cattle or wild sheep exist as compared to their domestic relatives.

It’s only in the last handful of years that even our most advanced societies have been able to produce a sufficient surplus of food and fiber that they have been able to stop viewing wild (undomesticated) animals as unwelcome competitors for the available food and land supply and/or as welcome supplements to a meager larder. To the pioneer American settler trying to establish a farm in the wilderness, that deer raiding the cornfield was no beautiful and noble Bambi but a damned predator eating the food the family must have to survive the winter. Why not just kill the varmint out of hand and at the same time put some welcome fresh meat on the table?

Even today, there are very few areas of the world that can afford the luxury of wildlife conservation. Never was there a more tragic example of this truism than the recent slaughter of dolphins by Japanese fishers. Remember the photographs of the murdered dolphins awash in a lagoon of their own blood.

This essay, which began innocently enough, has been built to end on that final vicious note. This has been intentional and I plead guilty but make no apology for the purpose: to persuade you that there is nothing romantic or sentimental or idyllic about securing the essentials of life – food, clothing and shelter. It is tough, realistic and unrelenting work. That romantic dream of the bucolic life is no more than the vapours of some simpering poet or philosopher who never touched a hoe, cleaned out a stall or slaughtered the prize pig that their family might have food on the table.

My plea is simple. If we are to be Pagans, then let us be Pagans and understand something of the realities of Pagan life, and not become just so many more silly victims of Walden Pond.

Rite Thinking, Rite Action

By Kyle Griffith

Why doesn't the average Neopagan ritual raise as much psychic energy as a Pentecostal revival meeting? Because the revivalists use simple, concrete techniques for raising power and we don't.

The most basic tent meeting ritual is the Rite of Initiation. After hymns like "Are you Washed in the Blood of the Lamb" and a sermon on sin and salvation, the preacher asks "sinners" to step forward and "accept Jesus." The act of initiation can be a handshake, an embrace, or baptism with water, but in every case it is accompanied by an outpouring of psychic energy from the whole congregation, welcoming the new convert "into the fold." A number of ex-acidheads who became Jesus freaks have described this rite as a psychic experience more profound than any drug; and plenty of people who attend a Fundamentalist church every Sunday never miss a chance to step forward at a revival meeting to be "saved" all over again. Of course the clergy and congregation also get a psychic lift every time the rite is performed.

The important thing for us to remember is that the revivalists themselves admit that their initiation rite has little to do with an intellectual-belief in the doctrines of Christianity and converts are urged to join a regular congregation as soon as possible. Success of the ritual depends not on acceptance of a complex system of belief, but only on two simple acts of will. One, the "convert" has to accept initiation. Two, each member of the congregation has to accept the convert.

The old movie Freaks has a beautiful example of such a ritual in a completely non-religious context. A beautiful normal girl is marrying a deformed midget for his money. As part of the wedding ceremony, the company of circus freaks surround her and start chanting "We accept you, we accept you, one of us, one of us!" The girl, who of course is acting in bad faith, bolts in terror. The scene is one of the most eerie I've ever seen in a movie, and it owes a good deal of its terror to its raw portrayal of magic.

Now, I'm not suggesting we turn our rituals into tent meetings, drumming in public and initiating people by the score just to generate psychic power. There are ways to generate the same power even within the confines of a small stable group. The best as far as I'm concerned is a technique used in Voodoo and Amerind practices: assuming a special state of consciousness as part of the ritual. There are many ways of achieving this, but all involve the same two simple steps as the basic act of initiation. After preparation involving music, dance, preaching etc., a member of the clergy asks a member of the congregation, "Are you ready to receive the Power?" The member says yes, and some simple ritual act is performed to confer the power. Simultaneously, the whole congregation responds with an act of some words that symbolize the granting of power, while willing themselves to project the power into the individual. This process goes on until the whole congregation has received the power.

This all sounds childishly simple, much less sophisticated than most of the power rituals now in use. Well, it's supposed to be. It should be simple, repetitious...and powerful. The technique works very well for the Bible-belters, and it can be made to work just as well for us. The reason it can be made to work is because it does not depend on belief in particular deities or elaborate doctrine. All you have to believe in is the basic concept of Magical Power, and the ritual itself is constructed to reinforce that belief by enabling every member of the congregation to feel it.

Each individual group should be able to apply this technique to its existing rituals without making major changes. If your group uses special names for the members during rituals, the congregation might address the member receiving the power by his or her ritual name. If you wear special garments or ritual objects, receiving the power could be the act of putting them on. Or you might partake of a sacrament or recite a verbal formula. The ritual could also take the form of a dance with people moving from one ring (or other formation) to another as they receive the power. Any of these will work if your folks comfortable with them. As far as I'm concerned, though, the simpler the whole thing is, the better it will work.

OK, you've received the Power, now what do you do: with it. My suggestion is, start working Magic. If someone present needs healing, they should become the focus of attention while a specific healing ritual is performed. If someone needs advice or guidance, some sort of divinatory spell should be worked. Better yet, the whole group can go out and do something active: plant a grove, prepare a garden, even have an orgy. The important thing is that the activities have a concrete purpose, and that no particular activity be prolonged until it starts to drag and power seeps away. Hours of mumbo-jumbo about Gods and Goddesses accompanied by dancers panting like marathon runners just doesn't seem to work these days. Sure, maybe your group can successfully recreate the Saturnalia, but personally, I've never seen a long, complicated ritual that was worth the effort.

The important thing to remember if you want to raise and sustain magical power is to keep rituals short, simple, and to the point. Everything you do should have a concrete purpose, whether you're trying to heal, defend, or just make yourselves feel good. Rituals that make extensive reference to elaborate mythologies or methodologies may look impressive to outsiders. (Actually, few do, unless you think people giggle when they're impressed) but unless each ritual phrase and act means almost the same thing to everyone involved, so that individual emotional responses reinforce each other, very little power is going to be generated.

Generating psychic energy isn't at all hard. The crowds at sports events generate so much of it that a lot of professional athletes become magicians (Christian, Voodoo, and even a few Pagan, or so I hear rumored) in self-defense against bad vibes while on the road, or to make maximum use of home field advantage. Political groups from the Right to the Left raise and use psychic forces. And so can we, if we try to get back to the simple techniques everybody else uses.

This department is for news, reports, announcements and other materials of specific interest to Reformed, Neopagan and Mesopagan Druids of all persuasions, throughout Europe and North America.

Arch Grove

Samhain will be celebrated on Saturday night, Nov. 3rd. at Adr. Carolyn Clark's house. There will be a "dumb supper," skyring and other divination activities following outdoor services around the oak trees in the back yard. The grove meets for full moons and Highdays; as with most Druid groups the emphasis is religious rather than magical. There will also be some all day hikes in the country, with emphasis on gathering and using plants (medicinal & dye). For details, call Carolyn.

Evergreen Grove

The grove is growing by leaps and bounds, with over 30 members from the Olympia attending recent activities. On October 31st, the grove will celebrate Samhain with a "dumb feast" and a graveside vigil for a recently deceased member of the grove. Adr. Cyndie Schuler says that they will continue their full moon and Highday celebrations, and will be holding regular sessions of Mind Games (based on the book of that title by Jean Houston & R. Masters). Contact Cyndie for more details on times and places.

L.A. Grove

Adr. Chris Sherbak would like to invite Neopagans and other interested folks in the Los Angeles area to contact him about organizing Druidic activities in Southern California. L.A. Grove services, like those of all other NRDNA groves, are open to the general public.

South Shore Grove

Adr. Steve Savitzky says his grove is still active, with the majority of the members coming from the Society for Creative Anachronism ("Southern Shores" is the S.C.A. name for the area around San Jose, California.) So far the grove has been meeting mostly for Highdays, in the Archdruid's backyard (anyone knowing a nearby scenic location appropriate for ceremonies is asked to let him know). They will be meeting for Samhain, and local folks interested in participating can call Steve for details on dates and places.

Mother Grove

The grove has been growing steadily, due perhaps to the regularity of the every-other-Sunday afternoon services during the summer. These will continue through the winter at various locations around the Berkeley-Oakland area. On days when it is raining, indoor meditation and Hairpull sessions will be held. The dates for the next few months will be: October 7th & 21st, November 4th (Samhain) and 18th, December 2nd, 16th & 23rd (Midwinter). The times are usually from noon to 1:00 pm for Bardic practice (music, singing and soon some dance practice) and 1:00-2:00 pm for the actual ceremonies. There may also be another all night vigil for Samhain on November 6/7. For the specific locations each time call Co-Adr, Joan Carruth.

The grove is experimenting with new liturgies, the results of which will be presented herein from time to time. Recently a writer for New West magazine spent the weekend with various grove members, attended a Bardic Revel and participated in the regular celebration. He became a First Order Druid and has written a very supportive story, which should appear soon, Are we ready for a sudden influx of members?

His visit coincided with a variety of outreach decisions made by the grove. Ads will be purchased in the next edition of the telephone book, Yellow Pages, "under Churches, Druidic." Posters are going to be designed and put up around campus, and the grove has voted to join the Berkeley Area Interfaith Council. To cover the costs of all this (and incidentally to start covering the supplies that the Co-Archdruids have been paying for out of pocket) the members of the grove have pledged regular monthly donations of from $5-$20 each! For the first time in history, the Mother Grove has a checking account!! Are these the first steps on the road to doom?

Order of Oberon

This is the Bardic Order within the NRDNA, and has been entrusted with the musical and poetic aspects of Druidic rituals. Right now the members are all resident within the San Francisco Bay Area (primarily the Mother and Hazel Nut Groves) and two major sorts of activities are being held.

Every other Sunday afternoon before the services of the Mother Grove, rehearsal/practice sessions are held from noon to 1:00 pm at the site of the ceremonies. These are moderately organized attempts to learn and practice specific songs and (eventually) dances for ritual uses.

Every other Saturday night BYOE Bardic Revels are held at various locations around the East Bay. These run from 8:00 pm "until everyone falls over," and consist of group efforts to sing and play various (mostly Pagan) songs, alternating serious work on religious tunes with not-so-serious Pagan/occult doggerel. Individuals are encouraged to present original works of music, song or poetry. Copies of The Book of the Bards, Wheel of the Year, and other collections are available for use, but participants are urged to purchase their own. The dates for these will be: October 13th & 27th, November 10th & 24th, December 8th & 22nd. Call Matriarch Lind or MG Co-Adr. Isaac for locations and details about possible crash space for out-of-towners.

Formal admission to the order of Oberon is at the sole discretion of the Matriarch. All interested persons should contact her directly. The candidate should have ready a song, poem, dance, etc. to perform at their investiture. This offering may be an original work or else an interpretation of someone else's appropriate work (check with the Matriarch for details). It is suggested that each Bard or potential Bard keep a notebook of songs, poems, etc.

Stonehenge Viewpoint.

This is a bimonthly magazine published for those with an interest in archeology, anomalies, standing stones, ley lines and Celtic antiquities. Every issue has something new and challenging, with the scholarship ranging from poor to superb. The July/August issue (#30) included an article on "Hidden Druids in America," most of which was about British Masonic (Mesopagan) Druids, but which included several rare photos of members of the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids performing rites. Also in that issue were articles on "Megalithic Sites in America," "Maize in India in 1141 A.D.," and "Sir Bedwyr, the Saxon in King Arthur's Court." At $6.00 for two years (the U.S. & Canada), it's a bargain:

Order of Dian Cecht

This is the healing order within the NRDNA and is open to all Neopagans interested in both the magical and mundane methods of healing. Matriarch Joan Carruth says that no new initiations into the order will be performed after Samhain except for emergencies until next Beltane, (see- list of Highday dates in this issue of The Druid Chronicler). However, non-initiates can attend the monthly meetings on these dates this fall October 28th, November 25th and December 23rd.

A possible healing workshop following the feast of the Turkey God (November 22nd-25th) is being -contemplated. This would be an opportunity for local healers to get together and share their specific healing techniques, with an emphasis on the magical and physical aspects rather than the ritual ones. If you would be interested in helping her to hold such a workshop, contact her soon.

Golden Order Section Society

This is an interesting organization headquartered in England, and composed of folk's interest in Celtic folklore, monuments and antiquities, especially those with Druidic links. They publish a quarterly newsletter filled with fascinating charts on tree alphabets, news of Celtic revivals, facts about the ancient Celts, essays on the Holy Days and more. The latest issue (Lughnassadh/Lammas) included the French text of a Breton Druid group's Imbolc (Oimele/Candlemas) rites.

They also publish a huge collection of posters, charts, booklets, ceremonies and other materials of interest to Druids of all persuasions. Many of these will spark spirited arguments among Druidic scholars concerning their romantic ideas about Celtic past.

Institute of Celtic Studies

If you're interested in learning about the ancient Celtic cultures – Irish, Manx, Scottish, Cornish, Welsh or Breton – then one organization you should contact is the Institute for Celtic Studies (5339 Broadway, #105, Oakland, Ca. 94618). They have lectures, classes, workshops and concerts designed to teach Celtic arts, music, dances, religions and languages.

The quality of their scholarship, artistry and skill is superb, probably because their dedication is so intense. Though most of their activities center in Northern California, they are willing to travel to other parts of the country as well. This fall they are teaching classes in Celtic Mythology and Gaelic Folk-life, Celtic art, Irish & Welsh language, playing the tin whistle, the Scottish, Irish and Welsh pipes, and more. The costs are usually $30-35 per eight-week series, at two hours per week of class time. Those who belong to Celtic Traditions of Witchcraft or Druidism owe it to themselves to investigate the Institute. Associate membership, which includes a newsletter and all mailings, is $12.00 per year.

High Days for 18 y.r.

For those Druids or other Pagans who like to be precise in the holiday celebrations, the following list gives the exact dates and times for the Highdays (according to one Neopagan Druid method) for the next Celtic year, which will be the Eighteenth Year of the Reform (that is, since the founding of the Reformed Druids of North America). The exact times are based on an astronomical/astrological ephemeris which was calculated for actual or geometrical positions of the sun, rather than the more commonly used observed positions, and this can make a difference of several minutes for some dates.

The solstices and equinoxes, or Minor Highdays, occur when the sun enters certain astrological signs (Capricorn, Aries, Cancer & Libra.) The Major Highdays of Samhain, Oimele, Beltane and Lughnasadh occur when the sun reaches 16 18 north or south declination (which fits with certain Stonehenge measurements). The times are listed in Greenwich Mean Time and adjustments can be made by subtracting four minutes for each degree one is west of Greenwich England (0 longitude). During Daylight Savings Time, add one hour to the local time calculations.

Since Reformed and Neopagan Druid days run from sunset (of the civil day before) to sunset, the exact civil dates on which to celebrate some of the Highdays may vary in localities where the precise times are close to local sunset.

Samhain 17/18 y.r., the Day Between Years and the Beginning of Geimredh (Winter), occurs on November 7th, 1979 c.e. at 21:48 (9:48pm) GMT.

Winter Solstice or Yule occurs on December 22, at 11:03 (am) GMT.

Oimele or Imbolg, and the beginning of Earrach (Spring) occurs on February 4, 1980 c.e., at 18:38 (6:38 pm) GMT.

Spring Equinox or Eostara, occurs on March 20 at 11:04 (am) GMT.

Beltane or May Day, and the beginning of Samradh (Summer), occurs on May 5 at 5:56 (am) GMT

Summer Solstice or Midsummer, occurs on June 21 at 5:40 (am) GMT.

Lughnasadh or Lammas, and the beginning of Foghamhar (Fall), occurs on August 7, at 11:54 (am) GMT.

Fall Equinox or the Feast of the Hunters, occurs on September 22, at 21:03 (9:03 pm) GMT.

Samhain 18/19 y.r., starting of the next year, will be November 7 1980 c.e. at 3:19 (am) GMT.

Madrakara

The Earth current is alive and well at Madrakara! From Aug. 24-27 the Western Institute of Esoteric Science held an intensive "exploration of Earth Mysteries" at the nature community of Madrakara, near the Russian River. Thirty-five people gathered to study and experience geomancy, dowsing; sacred geometry, nature ritual, crystal energy and pyramids, orgone accumulators, the ancient lore of the Tuatha de Danaan and the Essenes, stone circles and ley-lines and power points, runes and Ogham, journeying into the field of Earth Mysteries. The four-day intensive closed with an Etruscan ritual wherein a large quartz crystal was prepared by the group for use in future healing circles.

Other recent news: Madrakara has recently been chartered as a grove within the structure of the Golden Section order Society, and has been hosting various activities involved with Celtic studies and healing. The Institute of Celtic Studies held their Bardic School weekend there, harp-playing, piping and whistling, story-telling and singing, eating and drinking, and generally gracing a magical place with magical music. Another weekend saw a healing workshop gathered together by Anodea Judith, for the purpose of sharing healing skills and secrets and talking about techniques, theory and ethics. We gave and received healing for ourselves as well as learning and sharing ideas, and many thanks go to the Madrakara folks for providing both the place and their warm energy.

a garden of delights for the body, mind and spirit.

C.A.W. is Alive!

The Church of All Worlds Inc is alive and well in Redwood Valley California. They've finished off the legal procedures to move the church headquarters official to California and have be actively involved in several projects. Recently, the Board of Directors of C.A.W. chartered Pentalpha as a Charter Member organization with the C.A.W. structure (see the Pentalpha Activities department for details).

Annual Meeting

C.A.W.'s required annual meeting will be held December 1st at 1:00pm in the deep forest of Coeden Brith and Annwfn (adjacent parcels on a ranch outside of Ukiah, which have become centers for Pagan activities in northern California). While most of the meetings will be of interest only to priests and priestess of C.A.W. (where are you?) all are welcome. Please make advance arrangements if you want to attend. For further information, and weekend reservations, write to C.A.W., Box 212, Redwood Valley, Ca 95470.

Forever Forests

Forever Forests, the tree-planting and conservation group established by Gwydion Pendderwen, will be planting trees over several different weekends this winter (if you missed last winter's New Year Weekend planting, you missed one of the best parties of the year). The projects include a lot more than 35 acres of reforestation, spread out over several weekends from late December through February with a five day tree planting: bash from December 28th through January 1st. The cedar, redwood, pine and other species that will be planted will remain as a permanent forest preserve in each location. No commercial logging will ever fell these trees. If you haven't received Forever Forests' new brochure telling the whole story (including how to arrange to help plant trees), drop them a card: Forever Forests; Box 212; Redwood Valley, Ca 95470.

Oak Tree

Otter, Morning Glory and others worked very hard again this year restoring the streambed on Coeden Brith, especially the area around Alison's Oak Tree. An enormous effort was made last year to save this tree, with several tons of rocks being packaged around its roots. Unfortunately the streambed scoured another two feet, undercutting the rock baskets and requiring the special efforts of this year. C.A. W. and the folks at Coeden Brith like to thank all the volunteers who have put so much effort into the land where so many good times have been had by Pagans of all persuasions.

Rituals and Songs

Gwydion is best known as a Bard, and his newest publication (even newer than Wheel of the Year) is La Fheile Eoin: The Rites of Summer, two ritual dramas with music. These were the plays presented at Coeden Brith summer solstice festival this year. If you missed them, or even if you saw them, you'll want to read "The Fox and the End of the World" and "The Dream of Iargalon," both with music and fantastic artwork. The cost is on $3.00 from Nemeton, Box 212 Redwood Valley, Ca. 95470. It will be published soon, so get your orders in now!

Midsummer Festival

The Coeden Brith Annual Midsummer Festival was all it promised to be – a weekend in the sun and forest of Northern California with 200 friendly Neopagans and a kaleidoscope of activities and rituals and meeting new people.

There were separate hearthfires for individual ceremonies, as well as a large main one for group activities. A Native American sweat lodge was built and traditional rites conducted therein. The Venusian Church from Seattle provided sensuous massages, and the Bee Tree brought along the honey. Gwydion organized, directed and performed music, songs, a ritual masque of his well-love “The Fox at the End of the World,” and a late night “Dream of Iargalon.” Initiations and ordinations, women’s circles and sunrise chants, healings and blessings, revelations and wonders filled the weekend. It was a warm and cuddly gathering, people getting together in a friendly setting to share what we have in common, rather than dwelling on differences.

True congratulations and many thanks are due to Morning Glory and Otter Zell, and the rest of the folks at the Church of All Worlds, for what turned out to be a high point of the year.

Star-Gate Symbolic System, designed by Richard H. Geer, art by Frank Casron, Cloud Enterprises, Box 1006, Orinda, CA 94563, 1979, $10.00 plus $1.50 shipping (and tax for California purchasers).

This is a new deck of divination cards, only vaguely related to the traditional Tarot system. The pictures are simple, the symbolic structure has several levels, and the packaging is rather slick. For your money you get 96 somewhat flimsy small cards (2 1/4" x 3 1/4") printed on both sides, a folding plastic layout sheet and an instruction booklet.

The front of the cards include such pictures as: Tree, Wanderer, Root, Air, Chest, Glass, Mountain, Candle and various Stars (Star of Change, of Inwardness, of Impulse, etc.). These full color pictures are not great art, but they are easily understandably by almost anyone.

The backs of the cards have the symbols for the seven categories, the names of the cards again and their primary divinatory meanings. The categories are described thusly: (1) STAR Cards – moods or energies surrounding you; (2) STATE Cards – an out state or condition; (3) STAR-CROSS Cards – how you look or are seen; (4) GIFT Cards – inner guiding qualities; (5) KEY Cards – a challenge to address; (6) GATE Cards – combined inner approaches; and (7) SIGN Cards – kind of fulfillment.

The usual sexism and creedism so common in standard Tarot designs are, for the most part, missing from this deck – perhaps because only the STAR-CROSS cards have people on them (all of who, however, are pink-skinned). The layout inscribed on the plastic (yuk!) sheet is fairly ordinary, the instructions are written simplistically (though there are some unusual touches to the method recommended for interpretation), and the divinatory meanings ascribed to the cards are somewhat shallow. But the system is quite usable, and not only by adults.

We have an extremely intelligent and creative friend named Cerridwen, who is ten years old and (having grown up in the Aquarian community) quite familiar with various Tarot decks. She was visiting recently while I was examining the Star-Gate deck and was immediately fascinated by the “kid-sized” cards and the “storybook” pictures. After a few minutes of playing with them, she declared they were “kid’s Tarot deck” and proceeded to lay out some readings for us. Her choice of cards (done in the usual fashion, by shuffling the cards until they “felt right”) for each layout was remarkably appropriate (far more than she realized). This ten-year-old was able to give good readings her first day playing with the new deck.

Some folks may feel that only the traditional Tarot designs have sufficient metaphysical depth to be worth using for divination and meditation work. The Star-Gate Symbolic System is - based on a complete numerological and astrological system (not, unfortunately, described in the accompanying literature), but even without these organizational details, the pictures chosen have sufficient archetypal vigor that they are perfectly capable of triggering the subconscious psychic forces behind successful divination work – even in children.

One interesting and unusual aspect of this divination system is that the instructions include a spell-casting procedure (not called that, of course). Users of the deck are encouraged to meditate on how the final cards could indicate a maximally beneficial outcome, and to create an emotionally powerful vision, based on those cards, of how things could be improved. People have been using Tarot decks for spell casting for centuries, but books on the subject seldom come right out and mention the procedures.

I think I can definitely recommend this as a beginning divinatory deck for children and adults. Whether the system behind it will prove satisfactory to experience metaphysical students remains to be seen – but there is no reason why we have to limit ourselves to the same Tarot images that have been common for the last 500 years. For those who want to try a new deck, the Star-Gate Symbolic System is well worth investigating.

Shadow on the Stones, Moyra Caldecott, Hill & Wang, New York, NY 1979, &$8.95, hardcover.

When you come up against a Bronze Age god named Groth you know you’re dealing with a baddie. This is not to mention his earthly representative, Na-Groth, who warlike tribesmen are terrorizing a sector of prehistoric Britain in Shadow on the Stones, the concluding book of Moyra Caldecott’s trilogy begun by The Tall Stones and continued by The Temple of the Sun.

The “Tall Stones” trilogy falls into that increasingly large sector of literature written for advanced adolescents or as light fiction for adults. It’s surely as thematically complex as the average pulp paperback, but the distinguishing mark is that most of the protagonists are teens or young adults faced with some crisis of courage and maturation.

Shadow on the Stones re-enters a land whose history, while outside of conventional delineations, have become established through the fictional works of such authors as the Thirties occultist/novelist Dion Fortune (especially in The Sea Priestess) and more recently Peter Valentine Timlett in his own trilogy of The Seedbearers, Power of the Serpent and Twilight of the Serpent.

It is Britain of the megaliths, the pre-Celtic Neolithic to Bronze Age culture responsible for the great stone circles and barrows of Western Europe. In the historical sequence accepted by these authors, the architects of Stonehenge, Avebury, etc., carried on a religious tradition begun in lost Atlantis and reinforced from contemporary Pharonic Egypt.

The trilogy concluded by Shadow on the Stones (the stones being megaliths, of course) tells of lives in this stable theocratic society threatened increasingly by greedy and warlike newcomers. These invaders are not identified, but “na” in the new ruler’s name is a Celtic definitive article.

The invaded culture, exemplified by Isar, the youthful hero of the book, Ferm his mother and Karne his stepfather (hero of the first book), must control the threat with a mixture of necessary force (including some improbably Da Vince-esque war gliders!) and high magick’s aid. Then they must try to restore the balance with the natural world, typified by the earth forces stored up in the sacred stone circles.

Shadow on the Stones has as its chief weakness the “got to rush, we’re near the end” feeling so common in third books of trilogies. The paragraphs are shorter and terser, the pace is faster and faster and pretty-soon-like-this-things-are-hurried-to-a-conclusion.

The story of resisting tyranny is eternal, though, and the archeology may only be anticipating future conclusions. Probably best is the plausible explanation of how stone circles would have been used in a stable Pagan society – and that’s something for your favorite articulate eleven-year-old to think about.

Jay’s Journal, “edited” by Beatrice Sparks, Times Books, New York, NY, 1979, $7.95, hardcover.

The Library of Congress cataloging description on the copyright page accurately lists this book as “Witchcraft – Fiction.” That listing may be the only accurate item in the entire book. Jay’s Journal claims to be a diary written by a teenage Mormon boy in the two years before he commits suicide at age sixteen. The book describes his growing involvement with “witchcraft” first defined vaguely as psychic exercises, but eventually revealed as the inevitable “devil worship.”

Although the author does an excellent job of depicting the emotional turmoil of a devout Mormon teenager struggling to deal with the 20th century, her treatment of the occult in general and “witchcraft” in particular is replete with one gross error after another. She has Jay led into witchcraft by a follower of Astara – a singularly conservative metaphysical schools whose members would firmly disassociate themselves from anything even vaguely resembling their conception of “witchcraft.” To make sure that this Astarian is seen as properly evil, he is later revealed to be a homosexual rapist of young boys. Most bizarre of all, however, is that this Astaran is able to teach Jay how to levitate heavy objects in only a matter of weeks! Not bad, considering that most people involved in psychic studies can work for years without developing that ability (or any of the others Jay so easily masters).

The rest of the book is a tear jerking soap opera of drug addiction, teenage sex and a gradual whirlpool of demonism (complete with cattle mutilations). The same scenario of an international Satanic Brotherhood infiltrating high schools and corrupting America’s youth that was so successful in The Stan Seller by Baptist evangelist Mike Warnke is repeated by this Mormon author with colorful embellishments.

Jay’s Journal is a singularly depressing book, especially for anyone who is actually familiar with current metaphysical movements in the United States. Distortions and mistakes are alternated with outright lies, mixed together in a manner designed to convince teenagers and their parents that the local Tarot reader or psychic healer is an active agent of the Christian Devil. It’s a book I recommend every Aquarian in America should read – to remind themselves of just how unscrupulous their would be persecutors can be.

Sparks could have written a book in which she accurately described the beliefs and practices of one or more religious or magical groups in order to subject them to a doctrinal analysis according to Mormon dogma. Anyone who belongs to any faith is entitled to critique other systems. But instead of taking this honest approach, she chose to create an emotionally loaded work of fiction. After all, if you can scare people away from examining new worldviews by misrepresentation, you’ve saved the time and energy you would have spent convincing them that their old beliefs are still useful. Jay’s Journal appears to be not just the result of gross ignorance, but a deliberate and successful effort to substitute fear and hatred for knowledge.

If, as many people in the Aquarian community suspect, the 1980’s are going to be a period of chaos and economic collapse, then we can expect that both the government and the masses will be looking for scapegoats. High on the traditional list of useful victims are members of “funny religions”. If there really is a collapse, then our people can once again expect to be murdered, raped and tortured in the name of the Prince of Peace.

And instead of the Malleus Maleficarum (the medieval witch hunting manual) our persecutors will be holding copies of books like Jay’s Journal in their hands. Read it and weep.

Witchcraft and Neo-Paganism, J Gordon Melton, Institute for the Study of American Religion, Box 1311, Evanston, IL 60201, 1979, $5.00, 8 1/2 x 11 offset.

Melton is a liberal Methodist minister who has been studying minority belief systems in the U.S. for over a decade. He has published sympathetic articles and books for Christian and academic presses. He runs the I.S.A.R., which has accumulated one of the best existing collections of books, articles, pamphlets and other materials relating to minority religions in America.

This latest work is subtitled “A Bibliographical Survey of Books, Periodicals, and Other Materials Representative of the American Magical Community.” Like his previous efforts, it is a remarkably thorough and unbiased treatment of its topic. He lists 681 books and articles and 114 periodicals, broken down into such categories as The Magical Worldview, European Wicca, The Emergence of Ritual Magick, Witchcraft in England, Feminist Wicca, Paganism, Voodoo, Santeria, Hex and Huna.

Although he seems have decided to be diplomatic about accepting modern Wiccan dogmas about the supposed antiquity of Neopagan Witchcraft, the majority of his categories are present with accurate and well balanced introductions. He has listed dozens of items, including publications that this reviewer has never heard of before. He invites users of the listings to send in corrections and additions for future printings.

Melton has asked us for information about what has happened to the following (possibly defunct) Neopagan organizations: Aquarian Family of Covens, Atlantian Wicca, Church of the Wiccan Rede, Dancers of the Sacred Circle, Delphic Fellowship, New England Coven of Traditionalist Witches, Our Lady of Endor Coven and the Religious Order of Witchcraft. Readers who can clear up the mysteries are requested to drop him a not. Those readers who are founders of new religious movements are also invited to send him a description of your group and copies of your literature ordering forms.

In any event, this bibliography is well worth buying for those who are interested in pursuing extensive literary research in the origins and growth of minority belief systems in America.

Gnosticon 1

First Gnostic Conference
October 26, 27, & 28 1979
Mount Shasta, California.

The Greek word gnosis indicates a knowledge of the heart; an all-encompassing and unifying wisdom through intuition. Gnosticism was a key element of the pre-Christian Mystery Schools as well as the philosophies of Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Plato and others. Among the earliest Christian the Gnostics emphasized mystical knowledge as opposed to dogma and the necessity of salvation.

During the fourth century, under the auspices of the Emperor Constantine, previously independent Christian groups were organized into a central church based in Rome. Almost immediately, the more mystical and symbolic movements, including the Gnostics, were declared heretic by the newly organized church (heretical simply meaning departure from established dogma).

For the next nine hundred years various Gnostic groups emerged and sometimes flourished until with the decline of the Crusades, official attention was once again turned toward the problem of heresy. The Inquisition — which became the Church's instrument for persecuting heretics — was formed specifically to eradicate the Cathars, a mystical sect with gnostic overtones. Modern gnostics, as represented by the Gnostic Society and Ecclesia Gnostica, trace their roots to some of these early groups, particularly the Knights Templar and, later, the Martinist Order of France. In its modern form gnosticism embraces a psychological view of religion, myth and symbol, an approach exemplified by the work of the late Carl G. Jung.

At our First Gnostic Conference, the Gnostic Society and Ecclesia Gnostica invite you to join us for three days of inner quest and transformation.

The Conference

Gnosticon I will take place among the breathtaking surroundings of Mount Shasta, an inactive volcano with snowy peaks veiled by a mantle of clouds. This environment, which has given rise to many legends since the time of the Indians, is particularly conducive to awakening the subconscious imagery so important to an individual's perception, of gnosis.

During these three days we will inquire into different forms of Gnostic thought, including:

Hermetic Philosophy — with a careful -translation of the only authentic record of a Hermetic initiation ever found. The examination of this document will also show why the mysteries of Hermes Trismegistus were held by the church fathers to be equal to those of Christ.

Kabbalah — the gnosis of Israel perhaps the most encompassing system of understanding the world within and without, with its emphasis on perfect balance. Rightly it has been called the Yoga of the West.

Sufi Dancing — easy to learn folk dances done to traditional songs and chants from all the major religious traditions of the world, bringing gnosis of God through the ecstasy of music and dancing.

Magic — Kabbalistic and astrological ritual of the pentagram with Gnostic overtones. -

Holistic Health — the Gnostic approach to medicine—an all-encompassing approach to physical and mental health through a never-ending quest for harmony between the individual and the environment.

Informal gatherings, a Eucharist Service, panel with all the speakers for questions and answers and an optional celebration of Halloween on the evening of the 28th will be featured in the program.

GNOSTICON-I orientation desk will open at 11 AM. on Friday October 26th where you will receive your program for the Conference along with all information necessary during your stay. Formal opening of the Conference will be at 4P.M.

Discussions and lectures will be held in the conference room of the comfortable and well-appointed Tree House Motel in the City of Mount Shasta.

The Speakers

Stephan A. Hoeller, PhD. noted lecturer, kabbalist and author; born in Budapest and completed post-graduate work at Gregorian University in Rome; associate professor of Comparative Religions at the College of Oriental Studies in Los Angeles; member of the lecturing faculty of the Philosophical Research Society, President of the Southern California Federation of the Theosophical Society and President of the Gnostic Society in Southern California

Rosa Miller born of French descent; studied medicine, international law, philosophy, theology and comparative religion at various universities in Europe and America; the first woman to be public ordained priest in a valid catholic apostolic succession; lectures on Kabbalah and Gnosticism; Vicar-General of the Ecclesia Gnostica for Northern California; President of the Northern California chapter of the Gnostica Society and Vice-President of the Whole Life Center in Palo Alto.

Lewis S. Keizer, PhD. received PhD., Biblical Studies (New Testament, Hellenistic, and Coptic Gnostic Studies); Graduate Theological Union; Berkley California; Executive Director, Popper-Keizer the Advanced School for Gifted Children, Santa Cruz; Dean of the School of Humanities, Academy of Arts and Humanities in Seaside; past lecturer and Acting Assistant Professor of Religious Studies and Classics at the University of California, Santa Cruz. Dr. Keizer is also a jazz musician as well as founder and conductor of the New Hastings Symphonic Band and the Mozart Festival Orchestra of Santa Cruz. .

Richard Hanuman received B.A. in Harmonistic Psychology at the University of California, Santa Cruz; formerly President of the Whole Life Center in Palo Alto; Founder of the Church of Hanuman and a long time student of Ram Dass and Sufism

Erin Cameron graduate of the University of Arizona; post graduate work in theoretical astronomy and psychology at the University of California, Los Angeles; uses astrology as a symbolic approach for more complete understanding and is a practitioner of Kabbalistic ritual.

Richard H. Sullivan, M.D. Dr. P.H. , F.A.C.P.M., received Doctorate of Medicine at the University of California, San Francisco founding member of the American Holistic Medical Association; a Diplomat of the American Board of Preventive Medicine; A Fellow of the American College of Preventive Medicine and the American Public Health Association; has served as President of Northern California Public Health Association, The California Academy of Preventive Medicine, The California Conference of Local Health Officers, and The Association for Holistic Health.

What is a Growth Groupies Doing in the Anti-Nuke Movement?

By Jeff Love

This essay was originally published in the July issue of Meta-link; a metaphysical publication from Sonoma County California, and is c 1979 by Wonderbrink Publications.

I have always believed that if we could all get our heads straight by getting more conscious and taking more responsibility for ourselves personally, the problems of the world would work themselves out. I was wrong.

The word "politics" has always turned me off. What, after all, has politics to do with personal/spiritual growth? Besides, newspapers always have the same bad news and I never felt that I had any power to change the way things were going anyway. So why sit around feeling all paranoid about it. Hot tubs and higher consciousness feel much better. Beautiful ideas are so delicious. Why bother with all those endless struggles?

But even constant bliss can get boring, so last year (1978) during the spring, I decided to find out what political action was all about. My ignorance was astounding. The only political action that I had thought about was the fat-cigar-in-backroom-kind that we are familiar with from old television movies and Watergate. My definition has changed since then; real politics is concerned, conscious people getting together to improve their lives and the lives of their loved ones. A year ago I joined the Abalone Alliance. . .

Intuitively I knew there was something going on behind the nuclear power industry and on a gut level it was leading to no good. I thought the exercise of getting actively involved would improve my dharma — you know, acting instead of just think in and talking. Little did I know that my dharma was bigger than a nuclear plant.

It began with non-violent training with one of the member groups of the Abalone Alliance, The Friends Service Committee. These people (the Quakers) have been around for a long time, non-violently protesting the inequities of our system since before I was born. The Abalone Alliance is composed of many such groups and “affinity groups” formed from training sessions all over the state of California. The Abalone Alliance (counterpart to the Clamshell Alliance on the East Coast) got its name when Pacific Gas & Electric released some copper into the sea during construction of a nuclear power plant; this copper began to kill Abalones (an underwater mollusk) But, as I was to discover later, the deaths of Abalones is the least of our problems with the nuclear industry.

The training lasts one whole day and is one of the most educational experiences I can remember. First I learned about the nature of atomic energy and how it is used to make electricity. People are a up slogans to put on their t-shirts and the following one sums it up for me; boiling water with nuclear energy is like cutting butter with a chain saw. Then I found out the dangers involved. Suddenly all my worst fears about nuclear energy were clarified — even paranoids have real enemies. Having been brought up with the fear of Russian missiles you probably thought that they were your enemy. Guess who is building nuclear time bombs in your own back yard?

Next I learned about the process of consensus decision making which is the foundation of the Abalone Alliance’s political structure. Break into small groups; divide the problem at hand. One of each group meets with spokespersons from the other small groups. If everyone agrees, the decision is made. If only one person disagrees, it’s back to the small groups until everyone’s ideas and considerations are heard and taken into account in the final decision. It’s wonderful to experience real democracy. One gets the feeling that we really have the power to make decisions. I look at the way the government is elected and wonder how it ever got that way. .

Then we broke into affinity groups. These are people who live near each other who work towards personal friendships; the members of the affinity groups meet regularly together to help support each other in up coming actions. Another function of the affinity groups is to keep itself non-violent: The police, it seems have a vested interest turning non-violent actions into violent ones. That’s how they’re trained — that’s what they know how deal with. They know that they can win with violence and, as Gandhi proved, they are helpless against non-violence. They have been known, in the past, to infiltrate protest groups in order to instigate violence. The affinity group system helps prevent this simply by letting everyone know the people they’re involved with personally.

We were also trained to stop violence before it happens should one of our group members fly off the handle. And we were taught for example how even the slightest touching of a police officer can be called “assault” or resisting arrest. Non-violence is not only a spiritual philosophy but the best strategy. “Gee,” I thought, “whose side are the police on, any way?”

The training ended with role-playing. Here the affinity groups were put in situations similar to the ones we might encounter during a real action. Someone plays a cop or an angry worker and we play the protester; We’re taught that they are not really: our enemies, but people who, like ourselves, believe in what they are doing. So our function is to change their beliefs about who we are (they may think we at Russian agents or worse and to try to communicate our concerns about the danger of nuclear power to them, even as they arrest us. Arrest who? Me??

The idea of civil disobedience is as old as America— you could even say it is what started America. When every legal channel, has been tried and closed to us, we have the right to commit an insignificant crime such as trespassing in order to prevent a much larger crime (such as another Three Mile Island). But not everyone can afford to spend time in jail; so many ‘participants’ act as support persons who help those who do. Jail? Yes, jail. If you plan to walk on someone else’s property without their permission in America, you can plan on paying a fine and/or going to jail and being on probation. Last August 6th and 7th (1978) almost 500 people from all classes and all walk of life crossed over the line of PG&E’s Diablo Canyon Nuclear power plant property and were arrested. But they knew the consequences of their actions and thought they were about to put nuclear power on trial.

A few interesting questions came to mind during the process, such as ‘Why is PG&E, is well as all essential utilities private property?’ Other equally interesting questions came up as the Diablo 487 came to face what we had initially referred to as “justice.”

In smoke-filled rooms far for the eyes of the media, PG&E officials, various politicians, local lawyers and judges seemed to have decided the outcome of the trials long before they began. Almost unanimously the judges decided that these people had come all the way to San Luis Obispo (the nearby coastal city) for the thrill of trespassing. Nuclear power was not to be allowed as a defense. Did I say “judges” or “dictators?”

Well. I’m afraid that in a courtroom the judge can deem what can be presented as evidence on what issues and has the power to do just about anything, including jailing the defense lawyers if he wants to make the trial come out his way. What a rude awakening to find out that the judges and the police might just as well have been working for PG&E.

Suddenly, it dawns on us. This is a huge conspiracy we’re fighting and nuclear power is only the tip of the iceberg.

Granted it is a pretty big tip, but wait until you see the iceberg. It looks like this: the reason nuclear power plants are built in the first place is not because they are safe, economical and an alternative to more important oil, as the industry has been claiming they are for the past thirty years. The plants are not safe enough for any insurance company in the world to risk insuring them. You the taxpayer and the unfortunate victim will pay for any accident with your taxes and your health, and your children’s children’s taxes and their health, if they have any. The plants are not, economical if, for example, you add the cost of decommissioning and guarding the waste products for a quarter of a million years. A nuke is only good for thirty years and then the power company will dump each glowing plant on the public. Reliable? Statistics show the opposite even if you disregard the near catastrophe of Three Mile Island, Yes, they are an alternative to more imported oil, but what about imported uranium? Guess which oil companies, have cornered the uranium market? ,

‘So why are they built? As you know all utilities are monopolies and the government (In theory) has laws against: monopolies, So special laws allow these privately owned companies to remain monopolies while (theoretically) protecting the public from the extremes of the profit motive by limiting the amount of profit they can make. It turns out that the rates the utilities are allowed to charge are based on how much capital they have invested, in order to provide service. And what do you think is the most expensive and therefore the most profit increasing investment a utility can make? At about two billion dollars each it's hard to beat a nuke. But the utilities are regulated by the government aren't they? Guess whose favorite ex-employees are on the regulatory commission?

So we get down to some basic questions about why the fundamental resources that we depend on are in the hands of the profiteers. The United States is one of the few, if not the only, western country where a few powerful corporations own its essential resources instead of the government owning them. Do you realize that the annual combined budgets of the, major oil companies is twice that of the largest government agency, the Pentagon? The amazing fact is that private corporations are more powerful in terms of getting people elected (inducing judges) and in setting policies than all 200 million of us average Americans. But then only about half bother to vote, and very few are willing to jump fences for what they believe in.

So, what has all this to do with spiritual growth and higher consciousness? The belief that you can sit back from the political realities and work on just yourself is just that, a belief. There, is an assumption within this attitude that somehow it will work itself out if you just keep your head straight. The fact is that by not participating actively in changing the world for the better, you are holding the world where it is.

The people who run things now do so only because we're not doing it. They will continue to try to keep us from doing it for as long as there is profit in it. You may not think of yourself as profit motivated because you have switched to other, in your estimation, higher motivations such as spiritual development, ecological harmony, and love of one another. These life-affirming directions you have chosen are where most of us really want to go if we had the choice. But we do not have the choice. Others more powerful than us at the present will make those choices for us and they won't base their decisions on spiritual growth.

In Search of the Lady Rhiannon's Mystery

By Stephen W. Abbott McCaully

The following prose-poem dedicated to the Goddess Rhiannon, Goddess of the Wind and Song, was written in a mediumistic trance on Thursday, March 29th, 1979 at 3 AM. I was inspired to some degree by Fleetwood Mac's song about Rhiannon, sung by Stevie Nix. The greater part of my inspiration came from my recent studies and researches in relation to this particular goddess, material that I intend to publish at a later date. I'd like to thank Zai Zatoon for her lovely artistic rendering of the Goddess Rhiannon. I am interested in all comments about this work.

The Journey

I am being taken out of my body, directly out of my body by some unknown force. At first I resist, but after a time I realize that this unseen force does not wish to do me harm. Quite the contrary, it wishes to take me hither and yon away from the confines of my body and mind into another world that I have seen only in glimpses. A world of unearthly beauty and light. An immortal world where time ceases its unending pace. A place where dwelleth the divine kindred of my Celtic race.

I am out of my body floating on my thoughts and allowing them to transport me to this other-worldly place, beyond time and space and even memory. I gaze down at the sites below and see an earth strange and transfigured. Vestiges of the 20th Age are not to be found in any form. There are no cars, no street nor planes, nor trains. Just masses of green and patches of rivers and stream, and occasionally a village flows by.

The air about me is fresh and clean, no smog to poison my lungs and brain. My motion slows in pace, and my memory relates to me its tales of the Celtic race. The winds about me are pressing closer and closer and growing cooler. But I feel not the winds harshness, for I am now clothed in fine, white linen which magically fits my body as if it had been patterned for me. It smells of crisp fresh snow. I am no longer in free flight, but standing on the top, which seems to me a familiar place, and evokes to mind my Celtic race. My mind tries to trace this rock-strewn hill within the bounds of my living memory. After a time it finds the passage to the hidden door that conceals this long buried memory. Through my mind I pass through this door of memories lost and come at last to realize where am, even to know what force has brought me hither through the bounds of time and space, to dwell at last with my Celtic past.

The Encounter with the Lady

My mind has done its work: A great feeling of warmth and mirth now consumes my inner being. I am in a place of grace a power and beauty. A place that I have known before in another life and time, a place where many a sacrifice has been performed to truth and light. The name of this place is whispered on the lips of the wind, and I listen to what the winds wish to tell me:

‘Thou hast been transported to this place beyond time and space, and even beyond your deepest memories. This place thou knowest by the name Corshedd Arberib, the hill throne of justice and Sacrifice of this world and the Otherworld, presided over by the Lady of justice and Light, Wind and Air and Beauty Bright. Rhiannon is my name and love and song be my might. To my abode thou hast come this night.

The wind now takes the form of the most radiant and beautiful woman that I have ever seen in all my life, dressed in a gown of clouds and light, whose airy presence brings to me tears of grand delight. And in a moment of timelessness the Great Goddess of singing Birds and Loving Life stands before my being. I gaze upon her and my mouth forms words that seem strange to my senses. I speak to the Lady of the Wind's True Song:

'Oh Rhiannon; Oh Rhiannon, Beauteous Goddess of Life, Light and Love fashion for me a dove of Love.

She gazes upon my linen-draped frame, with eyes so wise and tinged with flame, and speaks to me and calls to me and calls me by name with a voice so musical I cry in shame.

The Grey-eyed Lady speaks.

"Oh Bard of my people I have brought you hither to this place of light, back to your time honored home this night. Be not ashamed of thy lips desires for thou art welcome in my sight. Here in my throne room thou shalt stay the night and listen to the tales of woe and plight, which I shall impart to thee with grand delight.

And with the wind, which is her element, she tells me tales of woe, and bedevilment, which brought so many tears from out of my eyes that a river began to form, which reached my thighs, and a fire consumed my ears and eyes. Then she blew away my river of tears and cleansed the redness of my eyes and ears.

After a time the Lady spoke to me again:

'O Bard of my people, you have passed this test. Your tears flow honestly down thy breast. In many ways thou art the best, but still thou must pass the final test.

She told me tales of love and beauty that went beyond the rest, and I found myself laughing and then crying like all the rest. Once again a river formed and as before she blew it away and cleansed the redness from my eyes and ears and wiped away all my left over tears. She spoke to me a sleeping rune, which made my mind sway and swoon. But before my lids had fully closed, I heard her say to me in repose:

"Oh Child of Earth, Oh Bard of Loving Heart, I send thee back to relearn thy art, and when though hast accomplished this, I shall call thee back to dwell in this, thy true abode of immortal bliss.

When I awoke I was back in my earthly home, and suddenly I felt so alone and saddened. But when I realized all that had happened, my heart and mind were happy and gladdened.

The Pledge to the Lady

"Oh Lady Rhiannon, Oh Patroness of those who follow the Bardic path, I shall relearn my art and return to the Path of Bard and Druid, of Mage and Sage, and Wisdom of Age, and ever shall I strive to reach the highest path to the highest goal of life and love and freedom of soul. Farewell to thee Oh Lady of Memory, farewell to thee Oh Lady of the Wind's True Song, farewell to thee who taught me this song of life and love and wisdom gone. Farewell to thee sweet Rhiannon.

And now I sit before my desk to study and learn the true poet's quest, and one day soon I shall come again to her holy place of wisdom and learn the arts that will grant me the freedom to live and love within her kingdom.

Sushumna: The Chakra Column

By Anodea Judith.

This is the third in a series of articles on the chakra system. Chakras, in this system, are defined as energy centers in the body that correspond to levels of consciousness, bodily processes, and categories of "external reality." The basic seven chakras, from bottom to top are as follows: one) earth, centering, survival; two) water, sex, emotions; three) fire, power, active energy; four) air, love, affinity; five) ether communication, creativity; six) time, clairvoyance; seven) cosmic consciousness, Godhead, 1,000 petaled lotus, seat of enlightenment.

This series of articles is some original conceptualization based on research of common interpretations of many systems. Due to the psychic and metaphysical aspects, the chakra system is very hard to express verbally. The author suggests that the reader bear with the logical inadequacies, and instead turn inward for personal experience in order to understand the functioning of these centers. Any comments or criticisms are most welcome.

Chakra Two

We have come from the earth; energy that is still, solid, dense consciousness that is concerned with survival, our bodies. We have an understanding of grounding and have talked about things associated with one— singleness, solitude a point, beginning, unity. This is all concerned with the first chakra.

Now we come to chakra number two and add a new dimension. The point becomes a line, solid becomes liquid, the density of the energy is decreased and a new degree a freedom is obtained. Physical matter (seen as densely manifested energy in the first chakra exhibit distinctive characteristics which can be classified according to similarities and differences and regarded in terms of polarities. We can look at the polarities as part of the basic motion of the universe, both as cause and result.

Psychologically, we can look at this motion manifesting in terms of attraction and repulsion. The attraction as well as the repulsion are basic forces behind our concepts of desire, within the concept of desire is the organism's (or person's) natural inclination towards the circulation of its own energy, both within and outside itself.

Each chakra has an associated element that remains fairly consistent throughout most systems, and the element for the second chakra is water (flowing above earth, chakra one). Water is cool, clear formless; flowing, constant seeking and naturally finding its own lever. The water flows over the earth, guided not by its own will, but by the shape of that which it encounters.

Likewise Emotions (from e, meaning out, and movere, to move) 2 are not always guided by our will or conscious control. We don't consciously decide who, what, when or where to love or hate, laugh or cry. These feelings are triggered by the existence of outside events, situations, or people as they interact with us. What makes me cry may not affect you, and vice versa. Although emotions can be controlled, their initial existence is not under our control. Have you willed or consciously created the emotion you are now trying to control? If so, why does it need controlling?

Emotions, polarities, dichotomies, sensation, desire, and sexuality are all aspects of the consciousness level in the second chakra, working interdependently.

Our point, from the first chakra, now has become a line, or a connection between two points. The energy frequency of the second chakra lies not in the points, but in the connection between them. This is the dynamic, seemingly active force of the second chakra.

But is it active? In the world of "two," the world of differentiation, we have yin and yang, the two basic forces in the universe as expressed in Chinese philosophy. In this system, the yin represents the feminine, the passive, the receptive, and yang the masculine, the creative, the active. This second chakra dualistic concept of yin and yang can be applied to all of the chakras (one through seven). The first chakra, which represents oneness, unity, and beginning, would be classified as yang. This would make the second chakra yin. So instead of being dynamic and active, it is receptive – a view that is contrary to most thinking about sexuality and emotions.

Everything in the universe is in motion. Even the molecules in what we experience as solid mass are moving. We are all looking for completion. We are all on a path somewhere. If we stopped everything in the world right now for the purpose of looking at it, we would find everything was straining, on its way to going somewhere, on its way to becoming. The car on the street, headed for home, a falling apple on its way to the ground, clouds on their way to condensation, streams on their way downhill. This motion is part of the basic yin-yang of the universe, manifesting as change. Constantly. This change is a force which can be worked with, if understood. The best example of this is the I Ching, or Chinese Book of Changes. The I Ching is a system of divination based on the idea that everything is in change, governed by these two basic polaric forces, yin and yang, feminine and masculine, and that by understanding where you are in terms of these forces, you can understand where you are likely to be next. These states and changes are determined by casting to "change" six sets of choice, which manifest as yin or yang, giving 74 possible combinations. Each of these combinations is called a hexagram and represents some basic situation that occurs in nature. If we are in harmony with this nature, we can better govern our lives and achieve wisdom, according to the I Ching. Aside from the fact that the I Ching is thousands of years old, and somewhat sexist, (they don't mention a superior woman) I find it an excellent system, worthy of much study.

So now we have polarities and motion and emotion, which can be described as the moving out of the motion within our own selves. (Ever have butterflies in your stomach or shaking spasms when you laugh or cry?) And since this is yin, we have postulated that it is a passive, rather than an active force. It happens naturally and spontaneously, without effort, at least in the healthy individual. Unfortunately it doesn't happen that way for all of us. Some of us have held in our emotions for so long that it has become habitual, and we are unaware that we are doing so.

What is this a result of, and what effect does it have on us? In a culture that largely supports this kind of control, I think this is worth examining.

First of all, how do we experience emotions? If our answer to this is movement, then how do we experience the movement? I would say it is all experienced as sensation, or the perception of data by the senses. The data which is kept from reaching the higher centers and becoming information manifests as unconscious information or a feeling. Something is trying to give us a message. A message for which our human computer is not programmed. But human beings are not computers, and it is our emotions that make up part of the difference. Let's take the following example:

I'm out on a date with a strange man and we go to a house somewhere. I walk into the house and the house doesn't feel right. My conscious mind cannot find a logical reason for it, but my sensory data tells me there is something wrong here. This is an example of a feeling, the precursor of an emotion.

The man I am with says, "Oh don't be silly, there's nothing wrong here. Relax!" But I really feel that there is something wrong, and for lack of validation (agreement, confirmation); my feeling turns perhaps to fear, or maybe anger at the man, both of which are emotions. Had my feeling been validated or supportively respond to, we might have both been able to track down the source of the feeling and turn it into information. Or perhaps he knows the cause (has the information already) and could explain, "Yeah, well there's this old lady who practices a strange form of magic, but she never really does anything harmful." And perhaps I would relax and forget about it, and let my consciousness move on to other things.

If I didn't, I would get "stuck" there, and all evening I would be off in my own world, giving my attention to my feelings, build them up into emotions that I then have to deal with. The basic nature of feeling and emotions is to express themselves, or to "move out." It is through this process that we turn the data into information.

So why do we suppress feelings?

Earlier, we defined feelings as data that does not compute. As I said in the last article, we live in a culture that is "out of the body" oriented. We live in our heads. That is the information we govern ourselves by in our present state of civilization, (generalization notwithstanding). If the culture represses data that does not agree with its dogma, it keeps the programming where it is. "I don't care what it feels like, this is what it is! Shut up and do what I say!" We've all heard this. And yet we have a sense that something else exists.

The rise of kundalini is often described as a painful, burning process that is frightening to someone who does not have a teacher to allay the fears. My theory on this is that with the rise of kundalini, or the processing of information from "lower" charkas to "higher" charkas comes a great deal of realization that does not correspond nicely with what we have been taught and conditioned by, what we have built our lives around. In fact, the difference is so astonishing; it's like being thrown into another world. Gross realization that can show us the absurdity of our lives can be frightening indeed! As we get into the other charkas, this becomes more and more apparent.

We have a culture that keeps us out of the lower charkas. We looked at this in discussion of the first charka, at the subsequent relationship this population has with the earth that presently supports them. What happens if we look at the water on the earth? We see the same thing. Pollution, dams, drought, occasional floods. And what happens where people get angry, have outbursts, or get locked in their feelings? They are classified as crazy and locked away. The entire charka is repressed; emotions, sexuality, pleasure, the whole works.

Data (raw sensory input) that becomes information (data that is assimilated and assembled conceptually) originally comes to us through our bodies. This data comes to us through processes in all our charkas and the more we let in and process, the more information we have. If something is trying to give us a message, then why not listen? In harmony with the yin concept of second charka, we should be receptive.

There are people who seem to get stuck on an emotional level quite often, much to their own detriment. I find this is usually a case of invalidation. They have been invalidated for so long about what they feel that they stick it out "down there" habitually just for self-validation, guarding the data and never really letting it turn to information.

No matter how much we transform energy, and raise it up the charkas, we never get over our need for the lower charkas. We must always be able to receive and process information this level. Just because we learn to think with our heads does not mean we outgrow our use for our feet.

There is a further result of blocking emotion-sensory shut down. Not only is the data kept from becoming information, but further data is screened out, so as not to "tilt" the computer. This can be dangerous because a) it takes energy to maintain the screen, and b) it starts to impart the functioning of the whole sensory system. This makes everything a little more dull, muddily, and lifeless. We lose our joy, our impetus for movement. Paradoxically, we feel something is wrong when this happens, but so much data is screened, we cannot make out what is behind the feeling and we get stuck there trying to figure it out. By this time, the charka is so crowded with pent-up emotion that we can't even really "feel" it. Can this pattern be broken?

Movement (exercise), circulation of breath, massage, someone that you can share your feelings with; bio-energetics, anger-release (even hitting your pillow); crying even if you don't know what for, all seem to help. Old emotions come off in layers, so it takes time and patience. Since emotions are felt in the body, it is very important to re-establish identity with your body by doing something to make feel good. This can be done in a variety of ways, through grounding, eating, exercising, sex, good music...(I'd love to have people send me lists of ways they can make their bodies real!).

The experience of "reality" seems to go hand in hand with validation, so I would like to talk about validation as an interface between emotions and the major aspect of the second charka, which is sexuality.

We started out as individuals, theoretically with seven charkas each. We have energy in all different states flowing through each of our charkas as well as through our lives. This is an enormous amount of information! As children grow, they make a journey through all the charkas: they begin, barely aware of existence, dependent on the mother for survival. They wet, they drink, they become more aware of the whole world of sensations. All they have at this point is emotions. When they are hungry, they cry without any conscious deliberation. As they gradually become aware of themselves through movement, they realize their separateness, and power. They (like all of us) are still caught in the foregoing processes, and the relationships that are part of this process become part of their awareness and part of their first experiences of love. Gradually, as they grow older, they learn to communicate, see conceptually, think for themselves, and find their own spirituality.

But none of this would take place if it weren't for some continuity of experience, some interaction with others, and some validation that what they feel is real, or that someone else feels, sees, hears, or thinks similar things. When they say "milk" and get milk, that validation teaches them language, as well as the concept that they are able to procure what they want and need for themselves.

Sexuality is one of the greatest forms of validation I know. I can think of little else that is more validating than lying in someone's arms, feeling close and feeling mutual energies running through us. It opens up energy on all the charkas and gives us so much validation that we make more of ourselves (even in the literal sense!). Someone loves us, someone makes us feel good, someone validates that yes, and indeed we are really here.

Sexuality also offers a release of tension, especially tension created by held-in emotion. Tension can be described as inhibited movement, or the blocking off of a natural inclination to do something (i.e. cry, get mad, express fear). However, the sexual release is often hardest to come by when it is needed the most. When the charka has been closed, it does not have as much energy going through it, and therefore does not generate as much energy. It's like trying to dribble a basketball from a resting position.

There is a psychological phenomenon involving sensation, which is commonly called the pleasure principle. This principle states that human beings naturally move toward that which is pleasurable and away from that which is painful. Aside from a small minority of masochists, I think this principle is easy to accept.

But our culture does not seem to exhibit this principle when you really think about it! Television screens allow our children to watch murders and crime shows but censor any scenes that involve lovemaking. Hard work and upward mobility are stressed but life's simple pleasures are frowned upon and those of us who believe otherwise are called lazy, weak, and self-indulgent. But the pleasure principle lives on and leaks out in the form of alcohol (to loosen cultural inhibitions), violence, rape, amusement parks, poorly made pornographic movies, drugs and millions of dollars worth of advertising playing on the repressed sexuality in all of us. When something natural is taken away from us, the resulting gap can be used as an implement for control. Advertising is the best example of this.

There have been studies of culture comparing levels of sexual taboos to violence statistics. The more stringent the taboos on sexuality, the higher the violence rate; and conversely, the more sexually permissive the culture, the lower the crime. 3

It is my strong belief that pleasure and sexuality do not debilitate the organism, or inhibit the flow of kundalini in any way. Yes, many yogis and gurus have achieved a certain lever of awareness through bypassing the sexual charka, but it can be argued that they lack a certain level of awareness as well. Furthermore, Western culture is different from Eastern as is the psychological make-up of individuals. It is true that second charka energy has more of a tendency to get “tacky” under the wrong circumstances, but I feel that this is also a result of the cultural repression that exists.

I cannot deny that abstinence from sexuality can give one an increase of energy for other things. No intimacy, no one to worry about, no one to take up your time, made demands, confront you on your views...It is also true that intense engagement in sexual activity can give one an increase in energy to use for other things. And personally, I prefer the latter. I find that I am more tolerant, more relaxed, more spiritual, more loving, more energetic, and generally healthier physically when my sexuality is flowing. Again, we are talking about a yin charka, and the idea is to be receptive, to flow like water, to move, to expand. To inhibit this flow, is, I believe contrary to the basic harmony of nature, and a general impediment to the flow of energy through charkas.

In the process of evolution, I believe we are moving from constriction to greater freedom. The movement of energy through the charkas supports this, for the energy gets less and less dense as it rises. Moralistic dogmas tend to inhibit freedom and deny our rights to make our own judgments and decisions. Anyone denied this right is bound to be held back from their own growth. And I don't think that's moral at all!

There is more involved than just the second charka in making sexual contact with another person. Even on the most casual of levels, there is a certain amount of communication involved (5th charka), though processes (6th and 7th), energy mobilism (3rd). When we contact another person we contact all seven charkas worth of energy in that person if it is a healthy exchange. If it is not a healthy exchange, the energy is still there, it is just denied realization. In contacting another human being, an aware person cannot help but learn. Sexuality, as part of the basic motion in the universe, is part of the general evolution of consciousness. It brings us together, mixes us up; we exchange energy, love, ideas, and it disperses us when it is time to move on. Not only that but it continues the species. We couldn't survive without it.

I have probably learned as much from my various sex partners over the years about a variety of subjects as I have learned from any institution, work experience, or spiritual pursuit. Yet even as I write this statement, I wonder if I should be saying this in a published paper, due to the cultural conditioning that still exists around me. Will people make moral judgments about me and discount what I am saying? If sexuality were openly and squarely dealt with, I believe we wouldn't have the problems of population control that we now have, which is another strike against the earth. The emerging sexual consciousness in this country, and the simultaneous close to zero population growth support this, and I believe they are connected.

Sex Magic

Now that we have opened all the channels that keep us blocked in our second charka, what can we do with this energy?

Well, first of all, we don't have to do anything with it. We can just keep it for ourselves and experience it for what it is. I find many people who are so intent on sending their sexual energy up their spine, that they have ceased to be able to really appreciate the experience. They remain outside of their bodies, as if externally controlling the energy, and the intensity of their experience is diminished. Sexual energy can be sent to any of the charkas. It can be grounded, and used to make the body more real, more centered and solid. It can be used in the second charka for triggering movement, emotion and tension release, for sheer pleasure, for making the sense clearer and sharper. It can be used in the third charkas as power and energy. Chakras vibrate, and just by increasing the activity of a charka, you increase the general vibrational level of the body. This can give you more physical energy. But please, on a third charka level, let's avoid the power plays and games that often go along with sexuality (more about that in the next article). To use sexual energy for love is self-explanatory (4th charka). Using sexuality on a fifth charka level is interesting. Many things can be communicated with one's body that cannot be communicated any other way. Sexuality itself can also be improved when the communication between the partners is clear, both in the general relationship and in the communication of sexual needs and preferences. On a sixth charka level, I find that it is much easier to link minds, or read telepathically with people I have been sexual with. Sexual communication also enhances the ability to intuit needs. And on the seventh charka level—at that is some of the best energy this charka can aspire to.

The principles of sex magic and Tantra also work on the basic yin-yang of the universe. The belief is that these masculine and feminine forces manifest themselves as archetypes, some of which can be thought of as Gods and Goddesses. The idea behind Tantra (Hindu method of raising energy through sex) and western sex magic is that the partners involved are taking part in the basic dance of the universe, and are manifesting their own inner divinity as Gods and Goddesses when they make love. The act of sex, in this case, is designed to increase the realization of this divinity through mental connection to the Gods during sex, and mutual worship on the part of the parts towards each other as Gods. Each partner sees the other as the respective God or Goddess, and in the Union of these forces, the basic union of the cosmos is continued and experience. “As above, so below.” Some forms of sex magic involve stimulation to the point of orgasm, and some stop short just at the point of orgasm. In either case the purpose is to raise energy to use for whatever purpose is intended by the participant. Tantric practices generally try to inhibit orgasm, and it is part of the yogis discipline of self-control as well as an experience to realize deity. Unfortunately, Tantric practices are generally designed for men, and the role of the woman is only to be there for the religious experience of the man; to not be too demanding, too erotic, but erotic enough. In India as well as other places, there are temples where there are women who are trained to do just that, and it is considered part of their spiritual work. In America we have prostitutes, and our culture does not consider this part of a woman's spiritual work. I personally think that anything we do is part of our spiritual growth if we are awake and aware while we do it. However, I do not believe oppressive sexism is particularly spiritual for any of us, and I would like to see more techniques of sex magic developed for women.

Although sex magic is based on the union of opposite forces it can be just as valid for homosexuals of either sex. It may ever be that women are more able to be Goddesses and consecrate each other as Goddesses due to the common understanding they share of the feminine principle (and likewise respectively for men). I think homosexuality is part of the whole process of releasing cultural taboos around sexuality, and leads us to greater freedom, understand, and general enlightenment for members of either gender.

I would like to insert here another note about sexuality and power. In our present culture, there has been greater permission given to men for sexual gratification than for women. Women are taught to wait, to withhold, to be "good" girls. Aside from the theory that this custom comes from a basic denial of the female principle, it is interesting to note the relationship between men and women concerning power. The men presently have the power, the confidence and the energy to go out and do what they intend, while the women stay home and fret about their acceptability, get lost in their emotions (remember validation?) and generally remain powerless. It has been my experience in working with pre-organic women (women who are unable to achieve climax) that when they learn to ask for their own pleasure, to achieve orgasm and feel good about their sexuality, their whole outlook on power changes, and they develop a new self-confidence, a feeling of power and energy in their daily lives.⁴ This is rapidly changing and will soon be out of date, but it does prove a relationship between sexuality and the upper charkas.

Conclusion

We have come a long way in our discussion of qualities associated with the second chakra. We have talked about polarities, yin and yang, movement and the basic motion of the universe. We have brought these principles into our bodies and examined how they work on a personal level – as emotions, feelings, desires, sexuality and sensation. We have talked about sensation being a level of data that has not yet become information and the need for validation in order for it to do so (self-validation is also possible). We have talked about emotions and the need for their release and the organism's shut down true to lack of release. And we have culminated (as second chakra energy tends to do) in sexuality; talking about sex magic and consecration to the Gods.

We live in a culture that is basically upper chakra oriented, and we talked about the negative effects this has on the environment and on its inhabitants. I have stated my personal bias in favor of opening the second chakra and supporting sexuality. However, I would like to add that despite the open avocation of sexuality, it is only one level of consciousness and one level of energy. To dwell too much on it is to miss out on some of the very exciting things that are yet to come.

Autumn Equinox Meditation

I see the sunlight streaming down in great gold shafts and blocks, solid, as it never is at any other time. The grass is greener than in spring, forest green, rich, not with growth, but with fulfillment. The earth, the air itself, is thick with richness and harvest, and approaching cold.

Praise be the gods that never died, for they are True Gods, and non man-created only, though for long and long we thought them extinct. Still, times like this, they sing to us, and we know it is not only our own voices that we hear, not only the sunlight, not only the grass. The dulcimer lays across my knees. I can no longer play it. I had to stop, to look at the wood, the light in it, the curving sides, the great carved head, the strings and frets. Autumn had got into it, and I could longer use it as a tool. It had become Magick itself. Each season has such times, when the singing comes through, and all is as the Mother dreamed it, not as it is on Earth.

Coffee and bread and wood smoke on the air, and I am not longer on the Mountain, but among the houses of men, and my time approaches, the wild sweetness of it. It feels so strange to be in Faerie, and on the common streets. We thought the Magick died, and belonged to an older world, but it is here! Here! I was like the young Jew, who feared that if he moved to another land, his God would not hear him. I ask forgiveness. Magick is not defeated by asphalt, and the myths of the new Age are now, for now there is more than fear, more than hope. And I wear a body in this time, and I am glad.

Autumn has got into me, too, and I am Magick itself, the full fruit of the earth, and such fruits as not a score of centuries has seen. They thought it dead, and, after a while, so did we; and now behold, the light has become so solid as to make a body, and given life to me, and to these others, and to a new time of myth. To believe it cannot happen again is only to fail, and to build up walls between ourselves, and the unseen which are being torn down from the other side. I could not have come down from the Mountain otherwise.

And now I know those others' fears of us were in their own way correct. For if I am Magick, I make all around me Magick too, and the foot I have in the other world treads the common ground. Praise to the Gods of Harvest, praise the kitchen garden, grey with dew in the cool mornings, mellow in the long afternoon sun, praise the warm fruit in the hand, for the seed that was dead always reaches its impossible fruition, and no cycle lasts forever.

Prayer for Foghamhar

The Lady's tears
Glisten on the webs of spiders
Glutted with the blood of summer

The sky cools.
Its fire has fallen
Onto the leaves of Autumn

Day retreats,
Night returns on wings of wind,
Shaking the stars.

The eternal Hunter,
Pinned on his back,
Struggles to rise
To herald the time of death.

Let us drink then
Of the waters of life.
Let the fire of spirit
Flow in our soul
From here back to summer

Stonehenge

I have seen the cold stone faces of holy men in sacred places praying with unspoken phrases to exorcise me of my sin

I have seen my temples torn by viciousness of 'sanctity' born and I stand silent there, and mourn the Silence of the gods within.

I have seen the witches die in flames that lit the winter sky while laughing crowds of men stood by and cheered their victory.

And I have seen the druids come to worship in the newborn Sun the cycle has again been run –
Can now the Truth be free?

Two Serpents

by David Geller

I saw two serpents arise from the morning's edge
Both were green, with the wings of eagles
Below them the clouds became as two great outstretched hands
Freeing them to fly
These two serpent, who were brothers
And one turned from green to gold and his wings became flames & cast a great light
& the other turned to blue
& his wings became shadows & his eyes became stars, & from the beating of his wings came a cold wind & in the falling of his feathers came snow
& he rose against his brother
& they wrestled across
The sky
& the weight of the dark Serpent brought low his light brother
& the light one was enfolded in Shadow-wings
& all was cold
& all was still.

& the breath of the Light one struck the wings of The dark one
 Thus came the mist.
 Thus came the rain.
 Thus came the green things,
 Slowly upward
 & the serpents turned About
 in the sky.
 Over the edge of the shadow wings, lightening
 The shadow sings, came The feathers of
 The Golden Serpent
 & The Gold Serpent rose & weighed down his brother Neither being vanquished, neither dying; each in his turn, becoming weary of the weight of the Other
 each giving to the other
 The hours & the seasons of resting
 & of waking —

To Lesley

I have met the witches, and
 They are burning.
 They move with a cat's velvet grace, void silhouettes with diamond eyes and brilliant fingertips, and burning, burning with all the memories of all the human conflagrations.
 Burning, milky luminous around the old ones, opal fire around the young ones,
 the weak ones burn in wanting,
 the strong ones like the center of the sun;
 the hurt ones burn in self-pity,
 the angry burn in bitterness.
 Behind their shoulders, within the flame
 I can see the other lives, chained back screaming pain,
 screaming ecstasy.
 They do not forget.
 Sometimes behind a man's shoulder I will see a woman's white throat;
 sometimes behind a woman the blistered body of a man: but the soul-feeling is the same.
 These are
 The souls that dared that turned their faces from the well-lit world of men and walked straight into fear, though not always without trembling.
 The ones who remember with hatred can lead you to that sad, dark land and leave you stranded.
 The ones in whom even hatred has burned away can lead you out with one, sure hand and the best ones burn in love, having burned through nervous tissue and personality to make of flesh a viaduct for Himalayan waters,
 coll and burning.
 You cannot face such eye:
 Within them is the Name Abraxas, eternal death and life.
 The hand holding the ritual cup is white with flame.
 And should you drink, you yourself will burn,
 burning in the furnaces of Shiva, til every tear is shed, every fear passed through,
 released in a different morning,
 on an unknown earth,
 with diamond eyes
 burnt away with the seeing of other worlds.

And I took the cup.
 And, Oh! my backbone is being pressed against something dry and wooden;
 and Oh! my body is burning!
 And every move is met with searing chains!
 And there is only this time left to tell you want I can see through eyes not yet consumed.

They tell me
 the Craftsmen is fashioning new ones for me, and that they are jewels.

Our Father

Words & music by Isaac Bonewits

They told us that You had gone quite mad;
 They told us that You were insane.
 you were the Lord of Love and Light
 And they made you the God of Death and Pain.
 Our Father...Our Father...

Earth Shaker, Sky Mover,
 Lord of the Wind and the Waves.
 You were the joy of all free hearts,
 And they made You the God of Slaves.
 Our Father...Our Father...

Lord of Lust and God of Hunt
 Brother, Lover true.
 Often a warrior, never a soldier,
 They took Your own sword and cut You in Two!
 Our Father...Our Father

The love that You hold for your Lady dear
 Brought You both great joy and fame,
 Till they made you a figure of hate and fear---
 Now even Your daughters curse your name.
 Our Father... Our Father...

Father, Mother and Holy Child,
 A trinity most true---
 Come back to us both tender and strong,
 The Father we once knew.
 Our Father...Our Father...

By the sun and the Star and the Standing Stone,
 By the hammer and the Spear --
 Your children call You back to us.
 We need Your balance here!
 Our Father...Our Father...Our Father...

Big One Coming

I was amazed to discover the Church of the Latter Surf is Neopagan. Your informative description of Neopagan religions in the Summer Solstice 1979 issue sounded strangely like the basics of Surfing; especially the aversion to monolithic religions. Surfers have almost unanimously rejected organized religion over the years, and even today a few consider LDS too orthodox.

LDS believes that the Seismic Forces are in balance with the Cosmic Forces. The Truly Touched Surfers are in tune with the Reality Waves passing between Seismos and Cosmos. They know that none of this will matter when the Big One comes, thus the characteristic aura of joy or peace that they have about themselves.

The Surf is where three powerful forces come together – Air, Land and Sea. This is a sacred place to the Surfer, much like the Druid's Groves. There the Surfer can become one with the Seismos and get "touched to the tits." (What we call "Triple T-ed").

Most important is the coming Big One. This is not the first Big One, nor is it likely to be the last, but it's undoubtedly the only Big One we will ever see. The last Big One came about 3,000 BCE to South America's West Coast. Archeological evidence shows us that ancient Surfers were in touch with the Seismos and prepared for the coming Big One, much as the Church of the Latter Day Surf is doing today.

Deep down you know it's coming soon.

Seismically yours,
Captain Cook, President

Heart of Mother Earth

I just returned from the Gathering of the Tribes in Georgia. A messenger came to us asking the help of all those peoples on the spiritual path towards the Mother, in defending the Place of Her Heart Chakra, which is at Black Mesa. The federal government has declared the Mesa and surrounding lands as a "National Sacrifice area," and declared their intention to "utilize the resources" there without regard for ecological ramifications. Needless to say, the Elders' protests have gone un-listened-to, since the BIA has decided that a rival council of "progressive" Uncle-Tom-toms represent the "true will" of the Hopi Nation. Meaning they do what the BIA tells them to.

The enclosed material tells most of the story. The Elders also those who can't join them to pray and make magick at home. And also, although the "deadline" is past, you can write to Pres. Carter, % Don Hewitt, producer of 60 Minutes, and demand an accountability for the government's policies. The address is: President Carter, c/o Down Hewitt, 60 Minutes, 624 W. 57 St., New York, NY 10019. Mr. Hewitt has said that if enough people write he will do a show on Black Mesa "from the Elders point of view."

Please spread the word as fast and as far as we can. Black Mesa is the Heart Chakra of the Western World, and if we let them kill it, we'd better get used to living on land that looks a lot like the moon.

Thanks & Blessed Be Lady Dana

Storms & Celebrations

By third class mail I've sent you all the back issues of my fanzine Time Machine. The first three issues include some reports about current activities at Miskatonic University, including a brief account of the student riots of 1969. They began, you may recall, when a Xerox machine was put in the Rare Book Room.

Also in Time Machine are a couple of times that I copied from an issue of Pentalpha Journal that Pat loaned me. I should like also, in a future issue, to reprint the ritual for recycling beer cans. In company with Brian B., one of Judy H.'s housemates, I have over the course of the years emptied a good many cans and bottles of beer, and even a couple of kegs. I will send you some publications of the Beaker People Libation Front that go into the matter in further detail.

Even if the 1999 eclipse is not total at Stonehenge, the Witches of England and their foreign guests can simply reschedule the event at Tintagel. The eclipse will be total there, and there are many mythic associations with Tintagel. Scarcely one stands upon another now, but the site is said to be most impressive. You will find details about it in the de Camps Ancient Ruins and Archaeology, which was paperbacked as Citadels of Mystery.

Before the 1999 eclipse, however, there will be another English observation that might be worth commemoration by devotees of the Craft. In July 1988 will be the 400th anniversary of the defeat of the Spanish Armada. According to the late Dr. Gardner, the English Witches claim credit for the storm that scattered the ships of the Armada after Drake's fleet had knocked chunks out of them. Considering what the fate of all the English would have been, Pagan and Protestant alike, had the Spanish landed, the Witches' efforts deserve commemoration.

Arrangements for both celebrations probably should get under way in the not too distant future. Tintagel may be placed under the same limitations that now obtain at Stonehenge.

Stay well,
Roger Herwell.

Medieval Women Writers

Just finished the March Pentalpha (believe it or not, I'm much more nearly caught up on your publication than on most others to which I subscribe). I was about to make out a renewal check to you, and then I saw it goes somewhere else. I think I'll renew for 3 years...

I greatly enjoyed the beginning of your article on Druidism – Past, Present & Future. But I can't allow one statement to go by unchallenged: "Throughout these centuries, the scholarship of learned men (women weren't allowed to write)..." The centuries in question seemed to be about the 7th to 16th c.e., and women were "allowed" to write. Just off the top of my head, I can think of 3 women writers: Teresa of Avila, 1515-1582; Gertrude the Great, 1256-1311; and Roswitha or Hrotswitha, 10th century c.e. No doubt there were many others. Far from being forbidden to write, some of their works were approved by the Roman Church, and Teresa was actually given the title of Doctor of the Church. No doubt, most learned women of the day were nuns, and hardly likely to be better inclined toward Druids and other Pagans than were their male counterparts, nor would they have had access to any unbiased materials on the subject had they been fair-minded toward other religions. Your phrasing however, implies that the male hierarchy actively and legally or perhaps canonically forbade women to write, which could not have been the case. And I just remembered at least two secular authoresses: Margaret of Navarre, 1492-1549, and Marie de France, late 12th century.

A few stray thoughts on the Mishmash, 2:4 People are more important than property. Granted! But a certain amount of property is necessary to sustain life, even under the provisions of 2:6. In their best intent, the property laws of Western Civilization are designed to guarantee that individuals may possess and enjoy what property they need for survival and a reasonable degree of luxury, and what they or their parents have worked for. Thus, property laws are meant to protect people; they are an extension of the principle that people are more important. Unfortunately, the ethos has gotten out of hand and the underlying reason has largely been lost in the shuffle, but the basic notion of personal property rights is not thereby invalidated, any more than the basic principle of farming is invalidated by certain mammoth companies that push out small farmers. And yes, indeed, Dru Chwerthing – a good Christian convent is a communistic community, for instance. Also, there's a difference between the free principle of Capitalism, with its emphasis on individual effort, and Capitalism run amok.

Sorry, I'd meant to keep that short and humorous. Well, re 2:6 and the possibility of persecution of Neopagans, I hope you can believe that if that ever comes, here's at least one monotheistic Christian who will be on your side against the persecutors.

I enjoyed the little ad for the "Christians 900, Pagans 1" stickers re The Wicker Man. Speaking of which, did that film Dark Secret of Harvest Home get your community as angry as it did our household?

Sincerely P. A. Carr

Harvest Holidays.

Thought I would send a comment on your last issue. If Lammas is called Harvest Home, I suspect it is a modern application. I have always seen Harvest Home applied to the end of the harvest, not the beginning. Since the pilgrims got the idea for Thanksgiving from European custom, I have seen Harvest Home applied to that time.

Lammas is loafmass, a time to consecrate bread made from the early harvest. Lughnasadh is the funeral games of Lugh, which give him new energy for the following year.

I suspect both are behind the American custom of holding outdoor fairs at this time. I understand some rural Britons hold picnics in a common pasture on this day.

We have a new Stonehenge here, which was just completed. It is called Stone cairns, and resembles Medicine Wheel in Wyoming. It is between Hood River and the Dalles, Oregon. For information, send a stamp to Portland Center for Visual Arts, 117 NW 5th, Portland, Oregon, 97209.

A new convention is born! By popular demand the people in Grimoire Games and the Multiversal Trading co. have formed an organization to bring to you the kind of conventions we all want, but very seldom get. The first "GRIMCON" will be held over the last weekend of October the 26th, 27th and 28th, starting at 5 p.m. Friday evening.

The motto of these conventions is simple: SOME ARE BIGGER, BUT NONE ARE BETTER! Take a look at our lineup and you'll see what we mean.

Tournaments in Runequest, Cosmic Encounters, Barsroom (John Carter of Mars), Elimination Dungeons (DMd by prominent local DMs), Fantasy/Ancients Miniatures, and several others.

Seminars by people such as Dave Hargrave (The "Arduin" Author"), Stephen Abbot (Head of a real Druid's Grove), William Voorhees – doctor of internal medicine, and many others.

A film program of incredible proportions (over 18 hours!) and quality. Also we will have TWO THEATERS! The confirmed program consists of:

20,000 Leagues Under the Sea

Equinox

Them

Laser Blast

The Wizard of Oz

What's Opera Doc?

Phase Four

Moon Zero Two

The Thing

The Dunwich Horror

and all four hours of Flash Gordon Conquers the Universe

There will be a "Come as Your Character" costume contest, medieval fighting demonstrations, Micro Computers, a huge 2200 square foot open gaming area (plenty of room for all!) and so much more there just isn't room to list everything!

The location is super; it's the Oakland (Edgewater) Hyatt House, only one mile from both the Oakland Airport and the Colesium BART Station. There will be FREE! pick up by shuttle van from both locations by the Hotel! Simply call 562-6100 and they will pick you up. See you there!

Room Rates: $36 a night for a single room. $46 a night for two, three, or four.

(These are special GRIMCON rates) ($6 additional charge for rollaway)

Con Rates:

	Pre Registration	At Door
Three Days	$11.00	$12.50

Editorial

Hello! and welcome to the 1980 issue of Pentalpha Journal. It's been a long haul; we know there have been long delays; but at least now we are here and in your hands.

For those of you who are new to Pentalpha, you are holding in your hands a collection of essays, poems, stories, news, and rituals dealing with the subject of magic, the occult, higher consciousness, and spirituality. In this issue we don't have some of the usual Pentalpha departments, and have concentrated instead on articles.

At the time of the writing of this editorial, it looks as though Pentalpha will take another long vacation. It has been a long swim upstream to give birth to this issue, and like the salmon who spawn at the top of the river, the effort takes so much energy, the salmon die. We have been unable to find the money, resources, or the staff to continue publishing. Although I hate to say this is the LAST Pentalpha, I, alone, cannot promise another issue, and there is none on our staff who is willing to do the work to head up another issue. Do any of you out there want to adopt a growing Pagan magazine?

We are truthfully up in the air about what to do. We need the response of the readers. Would you like to see Pentalpha continue? Would you be willing to donate time, supplies, moneys? Is there anyone who would like to head up production of the next issue? Do you feel Pentalpha is worthwhile?

We are on the verge of a new age, and it has been my hopes that Pentalpha could ride the crest of the wave of consciousness that is awakening within us all. If you would like to see this publication continue, we need to hear it from you. If not, the influx and sharing of new knowledge will take other forms, such as teaching and healing and sharing songs and dances. Those of you on Pentalpha mailing lists will receive announcements of these events, as well as any further publication that we may do such as pamphlets or single' articles, or songbooks.

I wish I could be more certain or more optimistic, but instead I choose to be honest. All we can do is leave it up to the Goddess, and hope that a way will open up for the path to be followed.

Until we meet again,
Thank you and Blessed Be,
Anodea Judith, for the Pentalpha Staff.

About Pentalpha

Pentalpha (The Association for the Advancement of Aquarian Age Awareness) is designed to be an interdisciplinary information nexus of an occult, metaphysical, or spiritual nature. Our hopes are to help educate and unite envoys of the coming Aquarian Age--an age that we feel will be strongly spiritual.

The Advancement of "higher consciousness" is a broad spectrum indeed, and Pentalpha chooses to focus especially on the occult--to reveal and revive those hidden teachings of the metaphysical world. This includes such things as Astrology, Witchcraft, Ceremonial Magick, Voudoun, Kundalini Yoga, Environmental Action, Poly-theology, Ritual Design, Parapsychology, and Psychism. Many of these teachings are quite esoteric, which possesses a problem in pleasing both the beginning and the advanced magician. We hope to have a range of articles that spans this spectrum. From my own studies in metaphysics, I have found much of the information veiled in mystery and esoteric language--which only forced me into further study. This is a design in the teachings.

We hope to edit our articles to read as plainly and simply as possible, while still maintaining some of the esoteric flavor in which these teachings flourish.

To the beginner, we say "Welcome! And may you long continue!" and to the advanced, we say, "Remember how great the learning in the Beginner's Mind!"

We hope you enjoy this issue.

Black & White Magic:

a Non-Racist Approach

Marion Zimmer Bradley

Almost everyone claims to know what is meant by "black magic": and most people have some fairly clear mental picture of what constitutes "white magic." Nine out of ten people, if you pin them down, will say something like "Black magic is it the purpose of doing evil, and white magic is for the purpose of doing good. Right?"

Warning. That answer is terribly simplistic; furthermore, it implies that the person doing the answering knows exactly what good and evil are, or that there is a very clear demarcation line between them.

Some fairly sophisticated people have recently come up with an even more dangerous definition of "black magic." Black magic, so they say, is the primitive magic such as voodoo, derived from Africa and Haiti; the magic of black people.

So, first, let us stipulate, for the purpose of this discussion, that black or white magic, as definitions, apply to the color of the magician's heart; not to the color of skin, robes, or the candles burning on the altars favored by the particular magician. I still remember getting into quite a hassle, some time ago, when participating in a harmless magical ritual, "white magic" by any standards, when my partner, an experienced occultist, but new to ceremonial magic, became very upset by the fact that the officiating priestess (not me) wore a black robe and burned black candles. As it happened, the school of magic to which she belonged stipulated black candles and robes because the color black, absorbing all light, was conducive to retaining body magnetism and power within the magic circle. My inexperienced partner, however, became very disturbed and almost walked out on the ritual, feeling that the black robes and candles meant black magic and a devotion to evil, to darkness.

And here is a deeper ambiguity which should be settled. People who have recently been re-thinking the semantics of our heedlessly racist culture have been disturbed by the long-standing assignment of evil in magic to the "black magic" side of the matter. What, they demand--reasonably, I must agree--is so bad about blackness, that the very idea of "black" should be evil? And this thinking does pervade our culture. A wicked man is "black-hearted," wicked deeds are "dark deeds" and the "Black Man" was a common euphemism for the Evil One otherwise known as Old Scratch, Old Horny, or, the Devil. Conversely, I've been forced to ask myself what is so good about whiteness, that "good magic" should be called "white"? Considering that one of the most paranoid and evil societies ever to infest the face of the Earth, Nazi Germany, was dedicated to the pure white of the supposed Master Race, never to be contaminated by the darker races, one could make out a case for re-defining evil in terms of whiteness; everything from apartheid in South Africa to lynchings in Alabama, has been done in the name of the "White race," enough to make the thoughtful magician hesitate before proclaiming any magic as "white."

About all one can say for this arbitrary designation of black and white is that it goes far further back than the petty group of ethnic snobberies which has led to current racial troubles. As far as I can tell, the Egyptians (who were certainly NOT a white race in our sense, being neither Aryan nor Nordic) were the first to divide magic into white and black and they probably got it from Atlantis. Furthermore, when they started calling some magic black, and some other magic white, all the people involved in the practice of either were all the same color. The terms "black" and "white," then referred not to people, but to the great division between Good and Evil, which were associated, then, with Light and Darkness.

Why, then, should light have been the symbol for all that was good, for people whose skins were probably dark? Maybe we were a little too fast in declaring that the association of "black" with "evil" had anything to do with racism.

So where did it start?

Probably somewhere about the time of the dawn of sapience in the species Homo Neandertholensis. What is the source of light, warmth, heat, life, and strength for everything that grows? Obviously, the Sun. What is cold, evil, terrifying, a threat? Night, of course; darkness; the withdrawal of that nourishing light. Certainly the first religion known to humanity was the pure awareness of the great light. Jane Goodall, working with higher primates, has demonstrated that even the chimpanzees demonstrate something which can only be called reverence and worship for the Sun.

The greatest event in the history of humankind can only be the discovery of how to control Fire. One of the greatest figures in ancient mythology is Prometheus, who stole Fire from Heaven, and brought it down to Earth for us to use; it had previously been limited to the use of the Divine Ones on Olympus.

Recent theories have conjectured that this might even refer to a visit from space faring peoples, who taught the primitive inhabitants of this planet how to use fire, being worshipped thereafter as Gods. Personally, while a theory of that kind looked fine in the movie "2001 A Space Odyssey," I'd rather leave Von Moniker and company to the science fiction lovers among us--who can give them the ridicule they probably deserve. Regardless of how fire was discovered, none of us today will really know the truth about it. So despite objective facts, I'd prefer to concentrate on what this great event must have meant to primitive humanity.

The discovery of fire meant that the setting of the Sun no longer need condemn the watchers to a terrible closing-in of darkness, it ended the need for a long stretch of time when the world must be abandoned to the great predators who prowled in the inky darkness, with eyes much better than ours.

There is little doubt that the first religious rituals arose from the need to preserve the tribal fires from going out; early in human history, a fire kindled accidentally by lightning would be guarded "religiously" and later, when the art of making fire was discovered, this awesome secret would be entrusted only to the wisest and most responsible of the tribal elders.

All things, therefore, in their whole existence would have contributed to this great dichotomy; Light, Fire, the Sun, as the greatest of blessings and good things; and cold, darkness, night, as the first among all evils, sheltering most of the other evils inimical to the survival of the tribe.

This goes so deep into the human psyche that virtually all the great religions have equated their spiritual metaphysics with the search for Light. The Egyptians called their most powerful God, Amon-Ra, after the Sun, and referred to the happiness of the blessed dead as "Coming forth into Light." Even in the twentieth century, Christian hymns refer to Christ as the Light of the World--and other mythologies hail Buddha as the Light of the East.

This symbolism has been preserved all through human history, through all religions and all mythologies. To the nit pickers who quibble that religions and mythologies are not history, I venture to remind you that until a very recent date, legends and mythologies were all that we had of human history; and it is through these religions and mythologies that we get our deepest insights into human psychology. In virtually all religions, the Gods are those whom James Frazer, in The Golden Bough (a monumental work of comparative religion) tries to explain away as "Solar Myths." I think he got it the wrong way around. To say that the Gods were Solar Myths is to insist on a literalness worse than that of the clerical-collared jackass who solemnly assured the Church that the God of the Old Testament had created the Earth in 4,004 B.C. at 8: 30 on a Tuesday morning in October.

Rather, in the various but universal mythologies of the Gods of Light, the great human psychological drama was being retold; the drama of the daily and yearly return of the focus of human existence, the Sun; Apollo, Bel-Marduk, Amon-Ra--the name does not matter. However, it is significant that when the world's first monotheist, Pharaoh Amenhotep IV, singled out one God as being the greatest and only, he chose Aton--the personification of the physical disk of the Sun--and called himself Akh-n-Aton by the name of his chosen God.

It is also noteworthy that the greatest of the goddesses were associated with the Moon--and what is the Moon except the great and benevolent force which lends light when the Sun is gone, so that the Night may not close in altogether.

And the reverse was true. The evil Gods were those associated with darkness, with cold, with the kingdoms of the dead. In Egyptian mythology, the dead who had not been virtuous in life, and therefore could not "Come forth into Day," were cast into outer darkness. Hell as a place of fire and burning is a fairly recent concept. The very word "hell" comes from the Norse goddess Hela, who ruled over death and the abodes of the unvirtuous dead who could not achieve Valhalla.

Religion and Magic, in those days, were not separated. They are not separated now. I have read books on magic, or "Magick," which state that it's not necessary to embrace any kind of religious belief, but that has always seemed a little fatuous to me. (I suspect what Crowley and others of his ilk probably meant was that it was not necessary to be religious in the ubiquitous "Christian" sense; which it certainly is not. Crowley grew up as a member of the Plymouth Brethren, a sect which would be called, in this country, Jesus-freak and Holy Roller in one. Who could blame him for thinking of the Devil as a friendly fellow by contrast to that grim and fundamentalist God of theirs?) But if magic, or magick, if you prefer, bases itself firmly on the fact that there is more to this material universe that can be weighed or measured, then, whether you know it or not, and whether or not you subscribe to any creed, you are accepting a religious view of the universe. You may not call it that, but that's what it is. Atheists are materialists and cannot be magicians without at least suspending their disbelief.

Well, then, white magic, or if you prefer, the Magic of Light, has always been the function of the priests and priestesses of the Light-bringing Gods and Goddesses; no doubt, the original practitioners of Light Magic were the custodians of the various Sacred Fires, who were pledged to put their care for the tribe and the common good ahead of their own convenience.

And going back again to pre-history, the worshippers of the Gods whose realm was the darkness, somehow accumulated all kinds of evil Anything which had to be done under cover of darkness--treachery, murder, theft, blasphemy--were by definition those things which would not bear the light of day, or the friendly circle of the tribal watch-fires safeguarding the common good. Things done secretly in the dark were, of course, those things which the tribe would not approve. In this same dark category came necromancy and all manner of dealing with the dead.

Recently, of course, night and day have been banished by technology, and so, of course, have these distinctions. Yet the psychology of the cave is still within us all. In most languages, a "dark deed" is a mysterious and shameful one, and people speak of "letting in some light" on anything wrong or furtive. Psychological truths are most often expressed in figurative language. Anything which can be done "right out in the open" is a deed of which no one should be ashamed. "Daylight robbery" is unusually bold and shameless. And in my own college days dormitories still locked up the maidens of the tribe at eleven at night, to safeguard their virginity, as if no maidenhood was ever sacrificed at three in the afternoon or ten in the morning.

Perhaps, in view of the semantic and racist connotations of black and white magic, it might be better to speak of "Dark Magic" and "Light Magic."

But whatever you call them, people are always going to want to know how one differentiates. And if you thought I was splitting semantic hairs before, just watch me now!

I referred before to the simplistic-definition; white magic does good, black magic does evil. This, of course, assumes that there is some simple definition to that question which has baffled a hundred generations of philosophers. I suspect people who think that way, and with good reason; investigate

I'm thinking you'll discover that "good" consists everything of which they personally approve, and evil just somehow manages to take in everything else.

If you want to split a few more hairs, try to define Light Magic and Dark Magic by intentions. The white magician, you say is trying to help someone, and the black magician to hurt or damage another. This may be less simplistic--at least people who define it this way are trying--but it has problems. For instance; most people approve of healing. White magic. Good Stuff. Praying for the sick is always a good thing, right? No problems there?

Well, try this one on. A few years ago, a woman I know gave birth to a premature baby, weighing just over two pounds. He was not expected to live, and the mother, a very dear friend of mine, was in utter despair. Two years before, she had lost another child, a tragically handicapped baby who had endured three months of terrible suffering, and died. After that death the mother had had a terrible breakdown; this pregnancy had been spent in very bad shape, and most of us felt that if this baby died, it would shatter the last remnants of her sanity, and leave her other children virtually motherless.

Need you ask what we did? We prayed; some of us prayed and fasted nonstop around the clock. We literally stormed heaven with our prayers. Prayer, of course, is the oldest and simplest form of magic.

Well, almost from the moment that the full-time prayers began, the baby began to gain weight; in a week or two he was discharged from the hospital, and seemed to be doing well. He was an adorable baby; we all fell in love with him and all felt we had been doing a fine thing. The mother was recovering fast, and seemed happy and together again for the first time in years. Everybody felt good.

For a little while. And then the shadow came down. There was something wrong with the little boy. The poor little fellow didn't grow; he didn't thrive. Eighteen months later, after a terrible, draining and exhausting round of doctors, tests, hospitals, diagnosticians, and progressive misery for the baby and the parents, he died of an extremely rare genetic defect. He had been doomed at birth; that particular defect is incurable. Instead of the short, terrible shock of a premature baby's death, they had to face the death of a real little person, one they had known and loved for more than a year.

So what price white magic? Did we really do any good at all? Did we turn the divine purpose or was it an illusion? Our intentions were perfectly good; but we must share in the blame for prolonging the agony, and for the final disaster that split the family asunder. Who knows enough to try that now?

On the other hand, most people regard the calling up of demons as black magic. Yet there is a well-known treatise on magic (The Sacred Magic of Abra-melin the Mage) which contends that the white magician has the natural dominion over demons, because good must always have dominion over evil.

My own personal feeling is that the man who has supper with the devil had better use a long spoon. However, they are welcome to the company of the demons if they can handle them.

I also remember reading Anton LaVey's various books on Satanism--at the height of that fad. Somewhere in one of his books he said there was no such thing as white magic, that everyone was basically selfish, and that anyone who claimed to practice white magic was a liar and a sanctimonious hypocrite. He states that the first step toward magical power is to declare one's self beyond good or evil. Again, he is welcome to the company of whatever results he gets, but I hope I am a good long way off.

Yet, it can't be doubted that the practitioners of white magic are often a fairly silly and ineffective crew. And as a result, there are many people who are completely turned off by the idea of black magic, don't know what white magic is (or doubt that there is any such thing) and therefore, a great many respectable occultists feel that the only solution is to give up the practice of ritual or ceremonial magic altogether.

It seems to me that this is throwing out the baby with the bath water. Of course, magic is not for everybody. There are people who should never attempt to practice any form of magic, be it black, white or some shade of gray or pink. (Yes, I once knew a young woman who claimed to practice pink magic.) There are also people who could practice magic, black or white, from now until doomsday without any more effect upon themselves and the Cosmos than practicing the piano, and with far less annoyance to the neighbors than practicing the trombone. Everyone who tries his hand at it isn't a magician, any more than everyone who takes voice lessons is Joan Sutherland. Every Sunday, in some church, some minister is practicing his elementary form of magic, praying "Spirit of God, descend upon our hearts"--and no one would be more surprised than himself if the Spirit did actually descend.

This, of course, is what was meant when some character in Shakespeare proclaimed:

"I can call spirits from the vasty deep," and another, more common-sensical one answered him:

"Why, so can I, so can any man,

But will they come when you do call for them?"

And that, of course, is the question. Will they come when you call them? Can you make them come? What will they do when they get here? And last, but not least, when they have finished doing whatever they came to do, can you send them about their business again?

When I used to write a column for the LAST VILLAGE OTHER on occult matters, people would write in from time to time, and ask me, either seriously or flippantly, if I could teach them to summon up demons. I always replied, yes, I could teach them to call up demons in three days, but it might take seven years to learn how to get rid of them again.

Of course, I was being facetious; but not entirely. My own feeling about "calling up demons" is that the practitioner does not call up some strange alien thing called "a demon" from some distant outside realm known as Hell, but is performing a complex psychological act which lowers the barriers around the mind, and calls forth, or lets out, all the evil impulses and repressed unknown quantities within the subconscious mind. In making the acquaintance of these "demons," the magician will feel probably that the old demons of old folklore with horns, hoofs, a tail and a smell of sulfur would be not much easier to get along with--and certainly a lot easier to get rid of again. Forbidden Planet, a science fiction movie from a generation ago, showed murders committed by a demon who could literally get through any barrier, to commit terrible, unsolved crimes. It turned out that the culprit was the "monster of the Id," called up by the suppressed hate and unconquered guilts and pride of the other people. This was, of course, fantasy, and a powerful metaphor; we all carry within ourselves these "monsters of the Id" and these are all the demons we will ever know or want; and if we can harness these--which is considerably more difficult than harnessing conventional imps of folklore--we can achieve whatever we want. But we must get past the monsters first, and any psychiatrist can tell you how hard that is and how long it can take.

So what, then is magic, and how can it be practiced. How, and why?

W.E. Butler, in his excellent book, Magic, Its Ritual, Power and Purpose (which is one of the first books required for reading in my own order) defines magic very well; Magic is the art of causing changes in consciousness at will.

I cannot think offhand of any magical operation which is not covered by this definition; the kahuna magician walking across hot coals, the witch doctor sticking pins in an image of some frightened person, the mass-hypnotist doing the Indian Rope trick, the hex doctor charming away a child's warts with rainwater and a dead frog, the love potion which started Tristan and Isolde on their ill-fated love affair, or Christ feeding the multitude with the loaves and fishes. These things were brought about by changes in someone's consciousness.

Whether these changes are objective will probably never be known in the measurable way that "scientists" demand to have them known. Magic, almost by definition, has no reproducible results. Otherwise it would be science. But does it matter? The child's warts are gone. The kahuna magician has walked across the fire because his mind was in a state where he could block out heat and pain, and emerge with unblistered feet. Tristan and Isolde are happily bedded down, and on the way to a legendary romance. The man whose wax image is full of pins has a hell of a headache, and will probably die, unless he can get somebody to take off the curse; witch doctors have to make a living too. The masses are entertained, whether by the sight of a man climbing up an unsupported rope, or by the illusion; it certainly beats the average TV show. And since it was two thousand years ago, nobody knows whether the five loaves and the couple of sardines were actually turned into a feast with bushel-basketfuls left over, or whether the multitudes joyously shared a crumb or two apiece in a spirit of love and brotherhood and were nourished by the knowledge that their consciousness of hunger had been changed to consciousness of abundance.

Somebody's consciousness was changed.

So here we have at last a working definition for the magic of light and the magic of darkness, whose consciousness was changed, and for what reason, and with what result.

The white magician, the magician of Light, is trying to bring consciousness up to the level of the good thing found desirable; to find out, in short, where the universe is going, and to go there in complete harmony with it. The magician wants to conform more closely to the forces which are beneficial to humanity, and become more attuned to them; and the white magician is convinced that when his, or her, individual consciousness is completely in harmony with all those vibrations when the magician can stretch forth a hand, and whatever is needed will fall directly into it, without need for further effort; because that means the magician is in a time and space where the Lords of Karma will bestow everything which is desirable at that moment in time.

White magicians make mistakes, of course. Usually by not trying hard enough to distinguish their own will from the will of the Cosmos. Probably, instead of praying that the premature doomed baby should live, we should have prayed only for strength to be given the parents, so that they could endure whatever was best. Nevertheless, the white magician tries to do what is best, in the best way that one person's limited sight allows--and sooner or later, it usually comes around to "God's will be done, because God sees further than I do."

The black magician, on the other hand, is usually not concerned with the ultimate benefit of the universe, or the harmony of the Cosmos. The black magician creed is "Oh, I want what I want when I want it," and to that end, the black magician operates upon the world to get exactly that, whether it is deserved, or beneficial, or not. He or she wants it because it's wanted, and that is that.

Take a silly example. A black magician and a white magician want an apple.

The white magician tries to put the self in relation to the Cosmos and go where there is likely to be an abundance of apples; in an orchard at apple-ripening time, for example. And having politely asked permission from the owner of the orchard, or ascertaining that no one's rights will be damaged thereby, the magician will stand directly under a particularly ripe-looking apple just as the wind whose vibrations have pervaded the cosmic awareness, begins to blow hard enough to bring it directly into his hand. So at the proper moment, having become harmonized with the natural laws controlling winds, apples and desire, the magician stretches for the hand, and the forces of nature deliver an apple directly into it. A simpler method is to think "Apple" until it is impressed on the cosmos that the Law of Abundance owes you an apple; you can be sitting at home at the typewriter, or scrubbing your floor and the forces of universal harmony, working together, will create the strangest co-incidences to bring you an apple. A neighbor will say, "I just stopped by to bring you this apple," or someone with a surplus of apples will give you a bushel basket of them. Of course, by the proper use of the Law of Abundance, you have to obey that unexplainable impulse to go see good old Joe and take him a chocolate chip cookie just then! It's astonishing how well it works. Almost every writer has had the experience of needing a particular book, and having someone, "out of the blue" as it were, send it in the mail, unrequested.

Our black magician would probably not want to be bothered waiting for apple-ripening season, or to make the journey to the orchard. Nor would our black mage be humble enough to ask permission of the orchard's owner to pick and eat an apple. Rather, he or she would start sending out vibrations of "I want an apple! Gimme an apple." though the Cosmos, without regard to what was required to deserve an apple from the Cosmos; until somewhere, somebody, disturbed by these vibrations, would stop whatever was being done and deliver an apple, out of proper time and harmony, to this black magician, even if it meant someone who deserved it must go without.

My dog employs a very simple form of "magic" to get a dog biscuit. He goes to the cupboard where the biscuits are kept, cries, whines, yelps, and sends out vibrations of looking like a good dog who hasn't had a biscuit that day. Now, if it's biscuit time, and I have simply forgotten that the dog was due for a biscuit, then the dog is simply attuning himself to the Cosmos and saying, "Here I am, it's biscuit time; do your duty by the harmony of all things and provide me with my biscuit!" And somebody will do it, as his due. That's white magic. Yet he is not a very well trained dog, all things considered; very often he doesn't know or care whether it's time for him to have biscuits, he just knows he wants one, and he makes such an infernal pest of himself that someone will get him one whether it's the right time or not. It's not stretching the point too far to say that the dog is a liar, practicing black magic.

THE FEMINIST CRAFT

An Interview with Deborah Bender

by Sally Eaton

(Insert interview graphic here)

When I asked Deborah Bender to contribute some material on the Women's Craft, I had in mind reprinting something from one of her two periodicals: Women's Coven Newsletter, (no longer published) and Homebrew, which she co-edits with Levanah Shell Bdolak. While leafing through her files, I found myself asking her many questions about the Women's Craft-questions that I felt, in essence, I already had answers to, both as a woman and a practicing Pagan.

Soon enough, however, I found that I didn't know as much as I had thought. I have never worked in an all-female circle, and I had a lot of preconceived notions about them, as you will see. A good deal of what I had read and heard seemed half-baked. Many of the men I've talked to expressed the idea that women were attempting to substitute female dominance for the patriarchy. I felt an uneasiness beneath people's careful choice of words, a lack of trust without a clear definition of what they were mistrusting. "What are they so wary of?" I wondered.

Most of the magical systems I've worked with are either male-dominant (a convention one tries to ignore!) or attempts at balancing the sexual roles in relation to each other. (No heterosexual-mixed groups I know of draw down the Goddess into male bodies--though why this form of experimentation with role-playing gets ignored is beyond me!) But in a women's temple--those of us used to playing complementary roles wonder how the energies are exchanged: don't you need balance to raise a cone of power? Apparently a naive question...

I made up a list of topics for Deborah based on some common-denominator notions (my own) of relative ignorance about the Women's Craft. She cheerfully contributed two hours of taped material, which was, in a sense, an initiation. The force of her personality conveys a contact with the Goddess she worships. She was able to give me a much clearer view of the nature of women's magical energies and their importance in the community.

Sally: Why do you prefer to work with women?

Deborah: "When I was first starting out, and looking for a group to join, I had been a convinced, active feminist for a few years and was used to working with women's groups in other areas of my life. I enjoyed that and found it very productive. I was aware that I had some suspicion of men and what they might do to me. Regardless of what the real situation was, I felt I would be enough concerned about my feelings as to be unable to relax and just get into what I was doing. I was coming in as a beginner, and therefore unsure of my own power. Most of the mixed groups involved my placing myself under some kind of male leader or teacher, as well as a female one. But I was seeking my own knowledge and power--I had too many images attached to males to be able to receive this power from them as a source.

"As to why I continued working with women: most of the work I have done or am doing involves women's interests. I want to evolve, or 're-invent' a women's magical culture--from the past that has been almost totally forgotten, or probably just ignored. I do work with individual men at times, or for certain reasons, but mostly I work with women on things that concern us."

Sally: What, specifically do you do in a women's coven?

Deborah: "The mixed groups that I've seen tend to be a lot more systematic and cut-and-dried about what they do. There might be leaders who have a set series of formulas that they follow, or rituals or goals. I don't know of any women's groups that work from a set-down system like that. As far as ritual work is concerned, it evolves out of the group..."

Sally: Could you give me an example?

Deborah: "Well, we did a ritual involving some of our feelings about menstruation, which was later published in the anthology MOON, MOON, by Anne Kent Rush, and also in Women Spirit Magazine. It was not an abstract, cerebral ritual--we used our own real menstrual blood. We recited poems in praise of our women's bodies, and our transforming, life-giving blood from which all human life is born. We passed a cup of our combined blood around the circle, celebrating it, and painted our faces with it. Some of the witches there were shocked by this action, which was done publicly. They might have felt it was the blood of a sacrifice, or perhaps be influenced by the old Judeo-Christian concept that menstrual blood was a curse or a pollution. But by bringing this out in the open, we accomplished our purpose, which was to turn around some of these negative feelings and treat our blood as something good and holy and powerful. And it became good and holy and powerful again, as it once was.

"The blood itself is representative of our female bodies, of our wholesome, beautiful, female strength. This was a ritual to celebrate our women's bodies, to rejoice and glory in our beautiful wholeness. Politically, we need to affirm our bodies, to overcome the patriarchal concept of division between body and spirit. Our bodies are sacred, but people can't seem to really experience this. We wanted to create an experience which would make this real. We made our bodies the focus of a ritual which treated them as sacred, and most of us came away from the ritual feeling that this was really true."

Sally: A lot of people seem to want to know about role-playing, ill terms of sexuality. How, for instance, do you raise a cone of power without male-female polarities?

Deborah: "That's a lot like asking a Lesbian couple which one of them plays the man's role. What goes on in a women's circle isn't a pale imitation of a mixed group; it's a different way of working. The energy pattern of a women's circle looks like a tightly-woven net, with lines of energy crisscrossing between all the people present; or like a bubbling cauldron, wherein each woman's personality floats in the broth of group personality. We are not concerned with setting up pairs of opposites, because polarized relationships are not what we are seeking to follow. We might sometimes play roles of various aspects of the goddess, but mostly we let each woman bring out in her turn whatever aspect of her personality she chooses to manifest. We recognize that this in itself is a manifestation of the Goddess. We improvise a lot, and go from seriousness to laughter in an instant."

Sally: The term "Dianic Craft"--tell me something of your definition.

Deborah: "I follow the definition put forth by Morgan McFarland and Mark Roberts. The Dianic tradition of the Craft sees the Goddess as being whole and sufficient in Herself and worships Her without a consort. Femaleness is the basic fabric of the Universe, and maleness is one of its manifestations." (Thelemites, take note! -S.) "Dianic covens are frequently all-female, but some include people of both sexes. But they are not founded on the Yin-Yang balance principle; they don't celebrate the interplay of maleness and femaleness."

Sally: Talk a little about your coven, Ursula Maiar, if you would, please.

Deborah: "We were the first female-only coven in the Bay Area. In fact, at the time, the only women's covens that we knew in the world, were the ones led by Morgan McFarland in Dallas. But a women's coven seemed very natural and right to me, and I was sure there would be others."

"My roommate and I, and another woman taught a class on women's spirituality under the auspices of a feminist free school, with the help from the High Priestess of a mixed coven."

"Witchcraft was only one of the areas that we dealt with, but after we'd been meeting for several months and gotten to know each other, the women in the group got more interested in Witchcraft and were willing to try to form a coven. We had to figure out a lot of what we were doing as we went along, but fortunately, there were a lot of very talented women in the group. There were no followers at all; we were all leaders."

"We wanted to help more women's covens grow, so we tried to share what we were doing by publishing some of our rituals, giving workshops, and talking to interested groups of women."

Sally: How many were in the group?

Deborah: "Most of the time, seven. We met weekly for over two years. Lots of the sessions were not rituals; they were what you might consider training-coven work. We shared information, practiced psychic skills, made masks and talismans, had healings and meditation sessions. We studied mythology to forge our images of the Goddess. We built things up almost from scratch, and after two years had reached the point of beginning a series of formal initiations. However, there arose a difference of opinion in the group regarding bringing in others who had not been part of the original seven. Since we worked by consensus, we were unable to resolve this issue, and as members of the coven drifted into other interests, we lost the central core of energy. There was no one to replenish it, because we hadn't conceived of it as an ongoing thing. We hadn't all seen its potential -some were still into it and an extension of the original study group.

Sally: How do you handle sexuality in a women's coven?

Deborah: "The rituals and general tone of mixed covens are based on Gardner's 'sacred marriage' concept. This forces members to deal with sexuality directly before the group has developed a collective mind. It also tends to distract people from group goals in general. In our circle, we started out dealing with each other as sisters. After we knew each other, after we had forged a common bond through our work together, some sexual activity and stimulus took place. But sexuality was not the fuel or the focus of our working. Some women were Lesbians, some were bisexual, some heterosexual. It didn't seem to make much difference, or to cause a problem."

"Which is not to say sexuality didn't form a part of the energies we raised. But it was a freer, less conditioned sexuality, something you can experience only outside of a role-playing situation. I think men in particular tend to focus on accentuating the differences between gay and straight; women have in general less hostility across these lines. We are concentrating on uniting, not polarizing. We don't depend on artificially created differences: to most women these things are irrelevant in terms of our survival as individuals."

"People in mixed covens tend to look at women's covens as an invention of the feminist movement. What we're really trying to do is look at the old traditions, in which women took major roles of leadership and direction. It is re-inventing, or rediscovering something which has always been there. When the Pagan temples were closed and magic driven underground, Witches could only practice in their family groups. Women were not permitted to bond together outside of family ties. So a great deal was lost, but we can rediscover the 'Women's Mysteries.' They are in our bodies, our actions, our feminine powers as we magnify them within ourselves."

Sally: How can interested women contact sources of information, and find groups in their areas to work with?

Deborah: "Levanah and I publish HOMEBREW, a journal of women's witchcraft, c/o Deborah Bender P.O. Box 6, CA, 94704. The subscription price is $2.50 an issue; $6 for three. THEMIS, published by Susan B. Anthony Coven No. 1, P.O. Box 42121, Los Angeles, CA 90042, is $5 per year. Both these magazines have contact columns for women. Several other publications, notably WOMAN SPIRIT, COVENANT OF THE GODDESS NEWSLETTER, and CIRCLE NETWORK NEWS devote sections or articles to the women's Craft. If you hang out in general Occult circles, you're not as likely to find a women's coven as you are by sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope (perhaps with a donation) to one of these sources, along with a request for help. You can ask the Goddess for help, and you can start your own group, too. That's the best advice I can give anybody."

Live Archetypes Prowl the Mysterious Mountain

by Walter Breen

To Pagans and Christians alike, Glastonbury has been for over 2,000 years one of the most sacred and magical places in England--or even the world. Glastonbury is the Avalon ("Appletree Island") of Celtic legend: the Holy Isle in the Summer Sea where Druids were trained at a (now vanished) Stonehenge-like Temple of the Sun atop the mysteriously terraced Tor Hill; the site of the Sacred Well, whose waters have cured many people; the legendary burial place of King Arthur and Queen Gwenthwyfar (Guinevere). Christians know it as a place where Jesus supposedly walked in youth; where his kinsman, Joseph of Arimathea, brought the Holy Grail and various other relics for safekeeping; where Joseph's staff, thrust into the ground, took root and grew into the Holy Thorn Tree blooming at Christmas as well as in spring, until Cromwell's soldiers hacked it into firewood. (Its seedlings still bloom there, and every Christmas flowery sprigs are sent to the Royal Family. This species is found nowhere else but Israel and Glastonbury, Connecticut!) But most of all, Glastonbury is a place of pilgrimage, where sidewalk talk or pub-talk is as likely to deal with the occult as with weather or taxed, and where open-minded visitors even today have mind-opening Close Encounters--with ghosts, or their past lives, or their gurus, or Something--that wakes them to a new consciousness.

When my annual October vacation approached, I was offered the choice of going to Hawaii or England. Though I hankered for the unearthly beauty of Hawaii, every time I thought of the place, an inner voice kept saying "England." And

I remembered that ten years before, on a guided LSD trip, I had suddenly known that someday I would have to go to England, specifically first to Stonehenge, and then to Glastonbury (of which place I then knew nothing); that something awaited me there, something I would have to see and hear and do; but never a hint what.

And so, on hunch, on the feeling that I must go there and find out once and for all, I arrived--for the first time in this life--in London on October 14, and at Stonehenge three days later.

On October 24, I awoke with the feeling: this is the day to head for Glastonbury. Everything had a magical quality; coincidence control was complete and automatic--no transit delays despite a route requiring two trains, four different Underground lines, and two local buses. Though I had forgotten to bring raincoat and gloves, I never needed either--weather was perfect, and this day sunshine was unusually brilliant. The whole time en route, I felt that I was going home, that somehow everything had been specially prepared for this day, that somehow I was specially meant to be there at this very hour. I kept wondering why I was heading there--something like Jesus' question, "What did you go out into the wilderness to see?" Speculations like "A past life? My roots? Someone I must meet? Acid-induced foolishness of a crazy dream?" led to no feeling of recognition; but nothing could quell my growing excitement.

I got off the bus at Market Cross and headed up High Street toward the Gothic Image Book shop, a place strongly recommended as a source of everything from occult books and magical supplies to greeting cards and quality craft work. A face looked from within its window across the street, making eye contact; I somehow recognized him, thought "friend, but who?" and headed for the door.

"Jamie George? Marion Zimmer Bradley said I should look you up."

"You're Walter Breen, then? When I saw you through the window I said to myself, here is someone I have to get to know." Instant affinity: like old friends getting back together after years apart. I briefly flashed on him as much older and wearing a tabard with a cross fleury, he identified this as part of the uniform of the Knights Templars, to which he recalled having belonged in a past life! After more conversation, he suggested I head for the Tor, and be sure to return before 5:30 p.m. as that was his closing time. I thanked him and headed first for the Abbey.

Glastonbury Abbey ruins felt oddly familiar, and I kept hunting for things that I kept having to remind myself weren't there. The atmosphere was beautiful and like home in Lady Chapel and the Abbot's Kitchen and everywhere else except St. Patrick's Chapel. A sign in the latter notified us that any clergymen of established faiths (unspecified) were welcome to celebrate their liturgy therein by prearrangement. I doubted that they would welcome Druids or Craft people and thought, "They'd have to be awfully insensitive!" I found no prayer possible except, "O Lord or Lady or Whoever, help my disbelief." And I realized that somehow I seemed fated neither to accept Christianity nor to abandon it totally.

Hearing a power mower's growls and whines, seemingly following whatever path I took among the ruins, I kept thinking, "We came here to escape the sounds of war, yet now again they intrude. If even this holy place can be destroyed, what will survive the coming holocaust?" And the answer in a flash: "Only the frailest and paradoxically the toughest things of all: human memory, human DNA." And the mower's noise seemed to drive me toward the exit--to meet--what? whom? On the Tor.

The climb--520 feet vertically, possibly three times that on the slope--was unexpectedly difficult. I have never had any trouble climbing ordinary hills; but this was without any path, only a series of divots dug into the side, mostly too small for safe footing, many slippery from previous rains, or obscured by cow droppings. I kept slipping and became increasingly fearful that I would not reach the summit: either my heart would give out or I would fall and bash my head on a rock. Yet suddenly I became indifferent to whether I lived or die here: after all I was where I should be, I was doing what I should be doing. At once both the heart symptoms and a nagging feeling that I should give up and go back vanished. I kept climbing; it was increasingly difficult but that didn't matter.

At the summit I looked around at the amazingly beautiful landscape--flat areas sharply demarcated by hedges, hardly any two alike in shape or shade of green--and thought, "How obvious that this was once an inland sea and this Tor an island: Avalon, Apple Tree Island, but where are its apple trees? Why was it so carefully terraced? What is inside?" I passed occasional tourists, but spoke to none. I examined the Tower in growing wonderment.

The tower is possibly 120 feet high, open to the sky, square in cross-section, battlemented at the top, furnished with niches (empty,) and can be entered at East or West by Gothic windows low enough to climb into without difficulty above one of these are two carven medieval plaques, one with the Weighing of the Soul in the Balance, the other with the Cow--singular Egyptian symbolism. This Tower is all that remains of St. Michael's Church, blown down by an earthquake in the Middle Ages (I thought, "a site too holy for Christians to monopolize!"); it has been a place of pilgrimage ever since.

At this point I kept thinking, "OK, I'm here: what did I come to see? Is this all? Maybe whatever I seek isn't here. Maybe I should just go back now and tell Jamie how beautiful it was." But somehow that same inner voice said

No. Wait till the tourists are gone. I tried to dismiss all this with "Why?" but no answer came; only within my inner peace, my sense of being at home, that inner voice began to repeat, Go in and lie down. I tried to dismiss this as foolishness but could not silence it. I circled the Tower, waiting. Go in and lie down. And again, as the tourists gradually dispersed, Go in and lie down. GO IN AND LIE DOWN. I felt foolish. Yet I climbed in one of the two windows, took off my coat, and lay down, and looked up: AND SAW BRILLIANT RED AND BLUE FLAMES LINING THE FOUR TOP EDGES OF THE ROOFLESS TOWER FRAMING THE SKY!

Optical illusion? No, the flames were nowhere else, and there they remained, the blue below the red, forming a rampart at least a foot high, probably more; lapis lazuli and intense vermilion. Without my glasses they were exactly as blurry as the wall just below; with my glasses they were again exactly as clear and intense, looking like any other names--except that I never recalled seeing flames in exactly that shade of red. (Highway flares come closest, and these were nearly as brilliant; but much nearer to spectral fire engine red.)

I began taking notes, only to be interrupted each time by that inner voice, stronger than before, saying LISTEN. I took this to mean, "don't make words just listen," and put away my notebook. I listened in order to hear: and I heard and saw.

No human voices, but dimly the buzz tone (not the tap tone) of a bell with a deeper voice than any I had heard in England or America, a bell that might have served for the Transformation Scene in Parsifal. And as this faded, there came the sound of rushing waters below me, from somewhere deep within the Tor: Caves? Tunnels? Over and above the sound of wind within the Tower was another wind-like sound, below me, west to east, east to west (along the Ultimate Ley Line, joining the Tor with Stonehenge and Canterbury Cathedral!), and I began to feel the energies pulsing in the same directions through me, then up through me, through the Tower, along the walls and especially up the corners.

AND ABOVE THE FLAMES, FROM THE FOUR CORNERS OF THE TOWER APERTURE, WHITE ENERGIES LEAPT UP FORMING GOTHIC ARCHES, WAVERING, FLICKERING, MEETING AT A VERTEX THOUSANDS OF FEET THE SKY!

Listening still more closely, trying not to think in words I heard and felt those energies more and more clearly, with others north to south, south to north, weaker, and others converging on the Tor in still other directions, still weaker.

I looked out through both windows, wondering if the energies could be seen--but the landscape was luminous, glowing golden, only on the Tor, though quite normal everywhere else. For a fraction of a second I wondered: illusion? effect of sunlight? But the glow was identical westward toward the lowering sun, and eastward in partly shadowed areas; and it seemed superimposed on the normal green. Within the Tower the flames still glowed, the energies still flowed; I felt some-how I was partly transparent to them, though unfortunately not completely so: the stream was a little muddy, the crystal a little cloudy, the rainbow a little dirty, but not enough to block the flow altogether. I saw these metaphors in my mind's eye, realized that they represented my psychic condition and to some extent that of many others: all different ways of saying the same thing. In the sky the energies still played and formed their intersecting arches. At one point, clouds passed over the tower and formed themselves into an Eye looking straight down at me! I again wondered if this was an illusion, but realized I had not made it happen; and the winds dispersed the clouds. Then the insights began pouring in: concepts familiar and unfamiliar suddenly coming together, forming huge patterns. I understood much that was before obscure--about myself, about the human mind, about the history of our species, about the way the world is put together: a concentrated course in psychology, philosophy, cosmology. At this point I received what amounted to instructions: I am a kind of intersection point between Eastern and Western concepts, and must investigate the Eastern ones via the Theosophists and their sources, compared with the Western ones via their roots in the Gnostics, medieval mystery schools, esoteric Masonic guilds, early German Rosicrucians, to their Western Tradition successors to the present day, and eventually make some attempt at a synthesis. A huge order, and I hope I live to start it, so that my coworkers and successors may finish it, so that some part of it will survive the holocaust.

Eventually I noticed the sky was suddenly dark as the--instructions? revelations? realizations? came to some kind of stopping point. Above me was a solid bank of white clouds the flames faded out. Through the windows, sun and sky were covered with dark storm clouds. An inner voice said GO. My watch said 5:05, only 25 minutes left for reaching the bookstore!

I climbed out, circled the Tower, kissed one wall good-bye, watched a meditating couple for a few seconds, and headed downslope. An inner voice said SIT. Feeling foolish but unwilling to temporize or ignore it, I saw a park bench nearby and sat down on it, thinking "What am I waiting for?"

At that very moment an old man--possibly 80 or 100 years old--came up and joined me. He looked like a sea captain or other weather-beaten outdoorsy type, glowing, immensely strong, like an oak which has survived centuries of storms clean-shaven, dressed in tweeds and a cap. He introduced himself as Jim Pollard (I gave him my name then,) he said he'd been drawn there today from the far north of England, and did I mind if he talked to me a little while? I said the first thing that came to my mind:

"Speak: I am listening."

This did not even seem odd then, but only later did I realize what a strange way to greet a tourist. He continued:

"Do you mind if I ask you a few questions?"

(These and his later words may not be exact--I have been unaccountably unable to recall them verbatim--but the gist of his questions is exact, and my replies are as near verbatim as possible.)

"I will try to answer."

I felt like a kid in school being given an oral examination. I felt somehow that right here was a phase of the Experience just as important as what had happened in the Tower; I must formulate my answers as clearly and as carefully as possible, for something (but what?) would depend on how I replied. Suddenly I had stopped worrying about getting back to the Gothic Image in time; stopped worrying about being drenched by the oncoming storm or about being struck by lightning on the Tor: I was where I should be.

"Have you found what you sought here?" His voice was gentle, but sounded as though he need only raise it and he could make himself heard halfway across Somerset County.

"In part, at least, yes."

"Did you know what you were seeking when you came here?"

"My heart has followed all my days / Something I cannot name." These were a couple of lines from Don Marquis, the multiple Leo who created the "Archy and Mehitabel" poems. These lines spoke for me better than I could for myself.

"Who are you now?"

A strange question; I had already given him my name! I remembered the insights I had been shown in the Tower--which I kept thinking of as Chapel Perilous--and said:

"I have been the Fool on the Hill. I was one of those who bore the title of Myrddin, I was one of those called Faust. I was once at home in the Abbey, but now I see myself as the Wanderer." (I flashed again--as in the Tower--on the meaning of "Myrddin" which is Welsh for Merlin and is rendered as "man of the sea hill," namely of Avalon--one who had been trained on the Tor! I flashed again on there having been several people about whom the Faust legends sprang up, and on Faust's REAL quest being for esoteric knowledge, the devil being a figure added by superstitious churchgoers. I flashed again on the similar Wanderer's Quest ascribed to Faust and to Odhinn/Wotan, but with the difference that I was not seeking the key to absolute power. I felt somehow that in answering as I did, some part of this would be familiar to my Interrogator.)

"Do you believe in reincarnation?" (a peculiar inflection and emphasis on "believe.") I took this to mean "believe--or know experientially"

"Belief is no longer the relevant word. I can 'believe in' things on others' say so, but experience changes belief in knowledge. Memories of past lives have changed belief in reincarnation into knowledge; just as did the experience of the Tor."

"Good. What can you tell me of the origins of man, of how we have come to be where we are now?"

I did not think he meant he needed any summary of the history of technology. I felt that something like a karmic story would be nearer the desired answer, but somehow I had to integrate it with biology:

"I have seen our earliest ancestors as originally one extended tribe, the ultimate face-to-face society, where individuals were linked by kinship or by love" (or by sex, I thought, but did not say) "and each felt responsible for the others" (we're all in this together!) "but over the hundreds of generations their populations increased so much they had to spread out to find living space and enough food for all. And they came to live in geographically isolated tribes which rarely saw one another and eventually forgot about each other. And after thousands of generations of this happening, some of the more remote tribes changed by genetic drift, adapting to different germs, different parasites, different predators, different food, climate, land. They came to be through this genetic drift, this adaptive radiation, almost a different species: short-gutted, high-adrenal, aggressive, mostly carnivorous, mostly nomadic herdsman with some hunters, unlike the rest who remained long-gutted, low-adrenal, more placid, mostly omnivorous, mostly hunter-gatherers and small farmers. And eventually the ice age came, and drove all our ancestors back together, and though they were at each other's throats, like Cain and Abel, their survivors interbred, and we are a divided species to this day because we are their descendants, we bear their DNA--Man Divided."

"Good." (I felt this meant: correctly answered.) "Have you studied Blavatsky?"

"Do you mean Isis Unveiled or The Secret Doctrine?"

"The Secret Doctrine."

"Only occasional quotations." And I suddenly knew I would have to read it through as part of the instructions which had come to me in the Tower.

"You have almost been quoting her: read her to know more. Now that you have been here, what will you do when you return to America?"

"Tell people--especially in writing--of what I have seen and heard, of what I have learned about that small part of the Universe I have been enabled to see, as clearly and accurately as I know how. Tell them to stop murdering the planet. Tell them they need not be afraid to love one another without erecting barriers of class or age or gender or especially religion. For more have died over theological disputes than for any other cause in human history."

"Correct. What do you understand God to be?"

"In the first place, we must not confuse that tribal kitchen-snoop and bedroom-snoop concept worshipped by Jews and Christians, with--THAT" (I pointed to the sky) "which started all this; THAT of which we are all a part-- He interrupted me:

"Good. Have you found your guru?"

"Not yet."

"Nevertheless," (he spoke with great force) "you are to become one, you MUST become one."

Chills went up and down my spine.

"When I have learned enough to feel ready. I am not yet ready."

At this point his wife joined us, a distinguished lady in her 60s or 70s or older. She greeted me, shook hands and said,

"I am so glad Jim got to talk with you."

I was somehow touched and impelled to answer, in a whisper, "Thank you, Mother." She nodded and smiled from ear to ear. We parted; Jim Pollard said, after walking down with me a little way, that they would meet me further down the hill. I found myself climbing down with some difficulty. When I reached the lower slopes, there they both were, sitting on a bench, and I suddenly realized they must have scampered down like mountain goats. I approached; both turned around to see me. Jim resumed.

"What do you know of the brothers of Joseph of Arimathea?"

"I did not know he had any. All I know of the Joseph tradition is what everyone knows." (As mentioned in the beginning.)

"Does that make this place any more holy to you?" He pointed to the Tower.

"This was holy hundreds of years before Joseph arrived. Their coming was only part of the whole." (I thought: but what on earth could make this place any holier? It is the holiest spot in Britain, and arguably the holiest place in this part of the world. It did not occur to me for two weeks that he might have meant an occult order; for which I could not qualify because it was more strictly Christian.)

Then he laid hands on my head, to bless me; and the energies pulsed and crackled into me through my third eye. We parted; I gave him my Box 352, Berkeley 94701 address, should he ever again wish to reach me. His wife said, "Do you wish to write it down?"

"No need to write it. I will remember." Then, to me,

"God go with you."

"Blessings on you. Thank you."

Back at Jamie George's bookstore--five minutes before closing!--I described these extraordinary happenings.

Nobody answering Jim Pollard's description had been seen near the bookstore. The Tor is well known to have been an island in an inland sea; shells of modern types and fossils of museum quality: are continually being found in local gardens. (I saw some later, and they are splendid; mostly scallop types and nautilus types.) Ley-line currents are repeatedly and consistently described in much the same terms as I had used. Many people have seen either the red or the blue flames, fewer have seen both. Almost nobody who goes to the Tower open-minded comes back indifferent to the place; it is a site of vast energies. Many have seen discarnate entities or visions of various kinds, or have had some other kind of mind altering experiences there.

Jamie could find me only one available bed; this was at Chalice Hill House; run by something called the Ramala Foundation (known for the RAMALA REVELATIONS). I had to share a room with one Wayne Tooker, American expatriate on his own spiritual Quest, friend of Jamie's, devoted to astrology and many of the other occult interests I shared with Jamie.

And with Wayne Tooker my last counts were resolved. As he told Jamie, he had seen Jim and Mrs. Pollard with me coming down to the foot of the Tor, including Jim's laying hands on me and said,

"This old man might as well have been Gandalf. I could see the energy flows. I knew I wanted to talk to you and what a synchronicity that Jamie got us together." This eye-witness perceived the tail end of the Experience very much as I had seen it.

During the months since I left Glastonbury, I have mostly been high without grass or other chemical catalyst. Learning has continued, mostly exploring implications of what I learned in the Tower.

This has been a Faustian quest, in which I received much more than I had sought. I am not claiming I actually was Johann Faust or the other scholar of whom similar stories were told (though I do not exclude this either); but it seems clear that I have resumed a Faustian search begun centuries ago, which search for esoteric knowledge to assemble into a system (like those of Aristotle or Albertus Magnus) must have struck my land bound contemporaries as impossibly eccentric, alien, and dangerous.

For me, the relevant part of the Faust legend is not the Gretchen/Marguerite episode enshrined in the operas, but the final sections of Goethe's Faust Part II, in which not only "das Ewig-Weibliche / Zieht uns hinan" (i.e. the Goddess, the only true Eternal-Feminine, leads us onward,) but it was precisely the glimpse of the Ineffable that induced Faust to say, knowing the consequences, "Remain: Thou art beautiful." Clearly, Faust then, like myself today, would neither fully accept Christianity nor completely abandon it; hence he remained like Mr. Spock, like so many of us, like so many characters in Marion Zimmer Bradley's novels, Man Divided.

But more profoundly still, consider: how could the Devil have shown Faust Heaven or the Ineffable? How could he have endured to go anywhere near there, let alone how could he open its gates to show Faust What was within? Then what did show Faust all That? And the answer flashed on me with a major shock of recognition - remembrance, and parallelism.

The Interrogator is not the Devil, but a wholly different archetype, namely the Hierophant, the Mystagogue. His questions are standard tests at any Initiation. Faust (or whoever is in the position of candidacy, like Oedipus confronting the Sphinx, like Jesus in the desert being shown the neighboring kingdoms) must answer correctly or fail. What was translated as "Remain: Thou art beautiful" is a ritual answer in recognizing the real Ineffable as against its counterfeits. For only here can Faust the Wanderer find his true home, only here is the Grail, the end of the Quest, on the other side of the Mirror; only here are the real answers in the Riddle Game, the archetypes made manifest, the symbols seen in resemblance to That which they allude to. But this Experience is not an end but a beginning: the very term Initiation means a beginning.

For me, since that day, the "Mysterious Mountain" archetype celebrated in Alan Hovhaness's symphony of that name has had to mean Glastonbury Tor as much as whatever height this visionary composer might have had in mind; the place where archetypes (like the Wise Old Man who was my Interrogator) prowl the slopes; the place where the Ineffable allows itself to be glimpsed: Avalon.

The Druid Chronicler Section

This department is for news, reports, announcements, and other materials of specific interest to Reformed, Neopagan, and Mesopagan Druids of all persuasions, throughout Europe and North America.

Arch Grove:

Archdruidess Carolyn Clark reports that the Beltane Service will be held this year in Kansas City, in conjunction with a Wiccan group. Lughnasadh, however, will be her wedding (Handfasting) to Michael Fix, at Tower Grove Park. It will be modeled after a mini-medieval craft faire, with a tourney, archery, etc., as well as a feast (which will be $3-4, and should be paid for in advance). She encourages those who would like to attend to do so in costume. After that, she and her new husband intend to come out to Coeden Brith in Northern California around the first two weeks in August for ANOTHER rite, and a visit.

Other than that, things seem to be going well for Arch grove. There seem to be about 10-12 members who meet for Full Moons and High Days. Call Carolyn for more information as to dates, places, etc., and also about the herb hikes, which have resumed.

Evergreen Grove:

Cyndie Schuler is now Cyndi Salle Brown, having re-adopted the names of both her parents. The Grove settled to about 15-20 people over the Season of Sleep, and seems to have an active Bardic section, which is working on original music, which we all hope soon to get a sample of. Spring Equinox Services, "Bringing in the Light," were held on March 22nd at Burfoot Park, with a large ritual fire, a picnic, hiking on Nature trails, and a beach. The Grove holds Full Moon and High Day Services, and Cyndie should be contacted for times and places.

Los Angeles Grove:

AD Chris Sherbak says he is changing the Grove to an RDNA affiliation "just to keep things interesting," and would be glad to hear from any interested Neo-Pagans in his area, to organize Services and other Druidic activities. There is some chance that he may be moving to the San Francisco Bay Area this summer.

Southern Shores Grove:

Adr. Steve Savitzky says his grove is still active, with the majority of the members coming from the Society for Creative Anachronism. ("Southern Shores" is the S.C.A. name for the area around San Jose, California.) So far the grove has been meeting mostly for Highdays, in the Archdruids backyard (anyone knowing a nearby scenic location appropriate for ceremonies is asked to let him know. They will be meeting for Summer Solstice, and local folks interested in participating can call Steve for details on dates and places.

Madrakara Grove:

The folks at Madrakara seem to be busy as usual, with their varied assortment of festivities, workshops, and house building. INVITING IN THE LIGHT was the title of a large, public spring equinox ritual given by Madrakara in San Francisco. Billed as "A Major Event of Transformation for the New Age," they presented an all day affair of Celtic Druidism, Native American Shamanism, Esoteric Christianity, and Wicca, (The Old Religion). The ritual took place indoors, within the halls of the Irish Cultural Center, near the beach in San Francisco. After some group singing and chanting, the lights went out and the ritual began. Hopes and words of wisdom for the New Age were read off papers on the wall that had been hung for that purpose. Ritual movements of bringing in the light from overhead and bringing it down to the earth were performed by all, finally ending in one large spiral dance leading down to the ocean to join Shiela Na Gig for dancing, music, and wave-wading.

There are several things being planned by Madrakara for the future. Danaan will be conducting his earth mysteries workshops May 9-11, May 23-25, and August 22-24. Price is $65.00 which includes food and lodging. Call 707-865-1498 to register.

Madrakara will also be holding their regular Summer Solstice ritual in the meadow (the big stone will have been laid exactly one year ago!) Call the above number for further details if you wish to attend.

Mother Grove:

The Mother/Berkeley Grove continues to meet at John Hinkle Park for New, Full, and High Day Services, although there has been some talk of moving to a less public area, at least some of the time. Contact ADs Joan Carruth or Stephen Abbott if you're not sure.

We will, in any case, be meeting at 12 noon for Bardic Rehearsal, and 1 p.m. for the actual Services. Since we have a member who works weekends, we will be meeting on CLOCK time, not Pagan Standard Time.

The Grove Officers are sporting wreaths, made for us out of Druid funds by Sally Eaton, so that from Samhain to Yule, we had Oak wreaths; Yule to Oimelc, Holly; Oimelc to Spring Equinox, Pine; and Equinox to Beltane, Ivy. They are quite lovely, and are being saved for use in future years, as most of them are artificial, or real leaves dried and siliconed. Many members have been getting their own white robes, and Linda Von Braskat has been working on elaborate embroidered tabards for the ADs, so our visual impact is becoming quite impressive.

There has been talk of (for lack of a better term) a Pagan Sunday School for children of Grove members, to acquaint them with some of the mythic stories we adults know and love so well, and to introduce Pagan philosophy, as an antidote to the prevailing culture. How many kids are interested? We'll make it as interesting as possible, and, of course, you can participate in the design of what you'd like. There are all kinds of interesting projects that could be done! How many adults are interested? Anyone have experience with this kind of thing? Pagan children's books? A Pagan Children's Order?

The new liturgy is much liked. There is more Grove involvement, and the magickal design is better. We still need a dance and choreography and acting workshop, and new songs.

Yes, we're part of the Berkeley Area Interfaith Council, and an interesting experience it is, too. At the group's annual meeting in January, a speaker from the National Council of Churches pointed out that this may be a unique IC, as most are dubbed "Interfaith" because they have a few Jewish or Unitarian members, while Berkeley boasts Bahai, Sufi, Scientology, Zen, Taoist, Vedanta, an Ashram, and various other non-traditional religions, including, of course, the Reformed Druids. Any of you other Groves out there interested in making your local Interfaith Council REALLY Interfaith?

Daniel Ellsberg wandered into one of our Services in December, and seemed intrigued, and he and his wife, Elizabeth, wandered off again with their hands full of literature. One never knows...

ADs Joan Carruth was also invited around Yule to consecrate a tree planting in People's Park in Berkeley, which marked the loss of the famous parking lot, and the turning of the entire tract to growing things. A small ritual was held, and an 8' Douglas Fir consecrated. Various street people struggled wo/manfully through "We Are One Family."

We are planning once again to hold Beltane Services in the Berkeley Rose Garden, and would like to take this opportunity to invite all interested Groves, Covens, and individuals to come and join us. The Rose Garden is a stepped amphitheater with room for the impressive presentation of many Druids. Contact AD Stephen Abbott McCaully for details.

Order of Dian Cecht:

This is the Healing Order within NRDNA, and is open to all NeoPagans with an interest in magickal, psychic, and mundane methods of healing. Now that Beltane is upon us, we would like to encourage new members to join formally. If you do not live near Berkeley (where the Matriarch is), write to me, and an arrangement can be made for you to be ordained through your local Arch Druid Matriarch Joan Carruth can be contacted through the Berkeley Grove.

We are always interested in ways people have learned to heal themselves and others, but our meetings have stopped being wholly dedicated to comparing notes, and have started to be active working sessions. We have worked on a half dozen or so people so far, and results have been good, but still too small a sample for statistical measure, if ever we wanted to go so far. So far, like most Witches, we have been satisfied with results. We usually meet on Sunday nights closest to the waxing quarter moon.

Order of Oberon:

Matriarch and Chief Bard, Linda Von Braskat-Crowe, announces that beginning after Beltane, the Order will be inducting new members. Prospective Bards are encouraged to keep and add to a notebook of songs and poems, (both their own and others') and to have a presentation ready for their induction ceremony. Contact the Matriarch (preferably in person) for further details.

The order is currently holding monthly Bardic rehearsals at the Matriarch's home. Call her at 839-1628 for specifics. Bardic revels also happen monthly, as desired, at various locations.

Isaac Bonewits and Joan Carruth of Mother Grove conducting Druid Services.

Druid Publicity:

The March 24th issue of New West magazine included an extensive article on the Neopagan Druid movement, focusing on Isaac Bonewits and the activities of the Mother Grove. The article was well written, friendly and (for once!) reasonably accurate. Out thanks go out to the author, Frank O'Donnell who became a first order Druid last summer while researching the story.

One side effect of the article's publication was a sudden influx of interest in Druidism--an influx we aren't really ready for yet. PJ was mentioned, and it looks like we'll get a few extra subscribers out of it--perhaps enough to keep this magazine going on to bigger and better things. PJ was referred to as a Druidic publication, which it really isn't all that much

Protogroves:

Why should the full Groves get all the fun? Are there any functioning Protogroves out there? You may get your own section in the Druid Chronicler! Or you may be listed under the Grove whose aegis you are under. We do have word of a proto-grove in Alberta, Canada. Eugene Plawink is organizing it in connection with the SCA up there. They seem to have several members, and are meeting for New and Full Moons and High Days. Berkeley/Mother Grove seer; to have them under their wing so far, but things are flexible. Any others out there? Write the Druid Chronicler before Midsummer with news, or report through a Grove. Let us know you're out there! In your heart, you know you're Druid!

Archdruid Emeritus??:

Isaac Bonewits has retired as Archdruid of the Mother Grove, so that he and his wife Selene could move down to Santa Cruz. Joan Carruth, Matriarch of the Order of Dian Cecht, is now the Co-AD with Stephan McCaully of the combined Mother Grove and Hazel Nut Grove merging. Isaac has kicked himself upstairs to the previously nonexistent position of Archdruid Emeritus. He swears up and down that he will not start a grove, coven, lodge, temple, or koffeeklatsch in Santa Cruz for at least another year. (No one believes him.) He sends this following letter:

Dear Druidic and other Neopagan siblings: It's true. I am now living near Santa Cruz, California, in something vaguely resembling a state of magical retirement. While Selene goes to the University (to get her B.A. in Modern Ritual!), I'm working in the book composition field (typesetting, layout, camera work, etc). and spending what spare time I have reading studying guitar (so I can actually start playing some of the songs I've been writing) and working on a couple of new books. As Archdruid Emeritus, I get to take a break for a year or so. This means that people interested in knowing what's going on with the current Neopagan Druid movements should write to Joan or Stephen, not me. I'm on "sabbatical."

One of the projects I'm working on this year is a sort of "Druidic Handbook." I'm rewriting a lot of the material I originally wrote for The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) and adding a sizable amount of new stuff. The book will include history, polytheology, philosophy, rituals, liturgical customs, music, poetry, organizational structures, and everything else necessary so that any qualified reader can use the book to start up his or her own Neopagan Druid group--with or without any "apostolic succession" from the Reformed Druids of North America. It will be written and published in such a fashion that it can be taken into any court in the country and presented as "sacred scriptures" for legal purposes. Whether one wants to start up a Druidic group or not, it will still serve as a source of ideas on how to start a new religion.

The reason I'm mentioning all this is not to promote advance sales (it won't be available for at least a year or two anyway,) but to ask for help. I want to include the best and most usable materials from any and all Druidic, semi-Druidic and pseudo-Druidic sources. I'm looking for copies of Masonic (Mesopagan) Druid ceremonies, remnants of old Celtic folksongs and dances, experimental liturgies from current Neopagan groups and individuals, even people's "past life memories" of Druid lore. Mind you, I will footnote everything properly, and I'm not going to present something as historical fact unless it can be pretty well documented. But there are many kinds of truth, and each can be presented on its own level of reality.

So if you would like to get involved in helping me create a new Neopagan Druid religion, feel free to send me whatever you've got to offer. Items that are copyright, or which you refuse to let me change, should be marked clearly as such. I won't print much of either kind of item, since I plan on altering, merging, and otherwise transmuting 95% of everything I can get my hands on.

As soon as I have working drafts of various sections of the handbook, I'll circulate copies among the dozen or so people who have shown the greatest interest, including members of as many other Druidic movements as I can find. With luck, we can come up with a consensus of what Aquarian Age Druidism might be like.

If you'd like to help, send your stuff to me at Box 9398, Berkeley, CA, 94709. Please mark your envelopes "Druid Handbook," so they won't get mixed up with the regular Pentalpha mail. Oh, and I should point out that I am terrible at answering correspondence, (I'm about nine months behind on my current pile of letters,) so don't think I'm not appreciating your stuff if I don't write you a letter back immediately. I will try and send postcards out to acknowledge receipt of your materials.

From time to time, bits and pieces of this project, as well as questions for people to argue about, will appear in The Druid Chronicler, along with occasional progress reports. But don't expect anything in a hurry, at least not from this Archdruid Emeritus. After all, folks in the magical community should be able to handle a little A.E. wait!

Musings of an Ancient Religion in a Modern World

By Shirine Ann Morton

Today, as a necessity, I woke up, took my Javacruian drug, (i.e. coffees, saluted the Sun (eyes scrinching at the early AM light) through the walled and windowed barrier to the outside world, and proceeded to journey to the marketplace where I could buy a few volumes of printed matter. As I fumbled for my pen to write the check to purchase words on myth and symbolism, the thought occurred to me at how far we are from the reputed ability of our ancestral religion where learning began at birth and the history and knowledge was reputedly all orally learned.

I think about the lack of oral traditions we are faced with in our society. If I want to know something, I have to resort to the printed word. If I were a survivor of a great calamity, there would be no way I could relate the history of my culture from memory to the new generation, yet we see this ability time and again in groups of people who did not rely on writing for scholarship. Who is more scholarly--I who have a large library and can research obscure facts of knowledge or the Navajo

Indian who can walk out into the dry prairie and find means to survive and teach the tradition to the new generation? A sandchanter medicine person has to have the history of the clan in his/her mind along with the myths about the healing, along with complicated mandalas of sandpainting and all the herbal knowledge to compliment the ceremony.

This tradition is completely oral and visual, whereas mine is all written. Admittedly as the young lose interest in the clan, parts of the system may be lost as has happened. It seems to me that many who claim to follow the old ways should begin looking within and studying techniques of visual and oral retention. When I look about me and see people doing rituals they have to read, working up ceremonies from written works, and reading them, I wonder about whether our so-called primitive ancestors were all that primitive.

Stonehenge Midsummer

Many people in America are curious about the sorts of ceremonies performed by Druid groups in England. The British Circle of the Universal Bond is one of the more established Druid movements and is well known for its annual rites at Stonehenge. They are Masonic/Rosicrucian (or "Mesopagan") Druids, and were described in an article by P.E.I. Bonewits in a previous issue of Pentalpha Journal (Number 10).

Although their literary style may seem add (or in some cases offensive) to Americans, it should be remembered that these Mesopagans have a tradition that goes back at least a couple of centuries, far longer than most modern American groups can legitimately claim. The concepts and phrasings used in their annual Summer Solstice ceremonies may well be older than anyone now living. American Druids especially may wish to take inspiration from their elder brothers and sisters in the B.C.U.B., adapting as always for the Aquarian Age.

The Midnight Vigil

An informal procession is formed and proceeds towards an ancient mound to the south of Cathoir Ghall using the old trackway to Salisbury.

This traditional vigil is held around the rim of the earthwork, as preparation for the coming assemblies. It is equivalent to the vigil which a night must have undertaken prior to his receiving the accolade.

Those of the distant and near past, who have handed; on the traditions and concepts of wise counsel to the Druid Order, are remembered. Past and present are united in a silent communion of thought by which inspiration is engendered. The Companions of the Druid Order renew the Covenant, and draw strength to assist them in continuance of their work.

By joining of hands, a great circle is formed, into which visitors are invited.

After a short, informal address, the participants return from the assembly, to rest until the dawn.

THE AWEN CEREMONY

This rite celebrates the advent of the longest day of light in the year. The sun is hailed as a symbol of the return of the Golden Age, when darkness will be banished, even as the sun's first rays dispel the dark mantle of night. These flashes of the sun's light symbolize the descent of the "Awen," a symbol of the Divine Name of which the three bars of light is the outward expression.

The companions assemble, prepare for the ceremony, and in procession gather up the symbolic elements on their way to the point of the ascent of light.

The symbolic representations are temporarily discarded--their sacrifice--while the Companions affirm their adherence to the Druidic principles. The circle is entered and, after reaffirming their unity of purpose, the Companions greet the rise of the golden sun. They proclaim their beliefs, and the Words of Gold and of the Triads are made known to all. Purification by water and consecration by fire is followed by prayer. The benediction is then bestowed. This ends the ceremony.

Procession of the four elements

The four Symbolic Elements borne by the Element Bearers, (Dionachs) escorted by the Herald, are taken in procession and laid on the East, South, West, and North points where they remain in the care of the "Dionachs of Without," until collected by the main procession.

The Assembly

The Companions gather before sunrise near the Southern Mound to prepare themselves for the ceremony.

OFFICERS:

INNER ORDER (A.D.U.B.)
ARCHDRUID, (1); ARCHBARD (2); ARCHOVIATE (3).
OUTER ORDER (B.C.U.B.)
DRUID (4); BARD (5); OVIATE: Earth bearer, (6).

AWENYDDIEN (COMPANIONS)
TEINE: Fire bearer, (7); USIAGE: Water bearer, (8); AYRE:
(AIR): Rose bearer, (9).

THE ASSEMBLY

(4) Let us open with contemplation.

(1) Let us contemplate the super-essential light of lights the unconquerable sun of suns;
the unquenched flame within all life.

ALL May we receive enlightenment from that great source.

(4) We are gathered within this place of Light and have left outside all disturbing thoughts. Let us consecrate our every thought within this sacred place to the uplifting of humanity and to the attainment of knowledge.

THE INVOCATION

(1) Universal Majesty, Verity, and Love Infinite; all reverence to the Holy One, the World-Enlightener; all reverence to the holy, the Pure, the Liberating Doctrine; all reverence to the brotherhood of the elect, and to all that is noblest and best in mankind.

(5) and (6) collect the rose from the Eastern Stone

THE PROCESSION

- (2) Know why we are gathered together into this sacred meeting?
- (6) To bear witness to the power of Universal Majesty, Verity, and Love Infinite, according to the commands of the Sacred Five, and of the Servant Messengers to the sons of Men.
- (2) And why do we stand at this ancient mound?
- (6) To do reverence to the Word that was made known to our forebears, and to acknowledge our indebtedness to those who preserved the truth of the Universal Bond, and passed it on to us as a heritage:

(6) and (3) return to procession. The procession led by (5) hearing the Rose, followed by (3) bearing the Fire, moves sunwise First to the western stone, from whence in silence, Bread and Salt is collected by (9), then to the Northern Mound, where (8) collects the Water.

The procession advances to the Stone Circle but on reaching the northeastern gateway, turns towards the Recumbent Stone, where it divides into two columns. The symbolic elements are placed upon the stone, where they remain in the care of the Dionachs, while the columns move on to the Sun Stone. (1), escorted by (6) and the sword-bearer advances to the Sun Stone and place his right hand upon it.

- (1) I make and renew the very covenant that is made between heaven and earth. This I do in reverence to my father, and make adoration to the spirit of supernal fatherhood.

The Companions in processional order each touch the stone in silence. The procession passes once round the Recumbent Stone, the Dionachs retire to the columns, and the symbolic elements are collected. (8) takes the Chalice to (1) who sprinkles himself:

- (1) This I do in reverence to my mother and to the spirit of supernal motherhood. Purify and strengthen all by the vibrations of health!

Element In. Lit Bearers return to the Columns.

- (4) Let us make our way to the dwelling of light.

The procession forming one column enters the circle from the north, east, and the Companions proceed to their appointed positions. The page to (8) places a square of linen in the circle center. The tiles are placed. The Four Elements are placed upon the square of linen.

- (1) Why do you bear the branches of the sacred tree in your hands?
- (4) As an offering to the Ineffable One, We have plucked these branches that we may feed the Sacred Fire with life that comes from the fairest and strongest of the trees. As our forebears have done in their wisdom, so do we in our day of greater growth.
- (1) It is well! Let the sacred circle be remembered as ye lay your offering upon the Sacred Fire!

The oak branches are placed upon the Fire.

- (1) May you all receive throughout the coming year the courage divine that conquers all fear.
- (4) Let the Sacred Word reverberate within the soul!
- (2) From whence has come the mystic Word? -
- (1) From the Most High, in the Golden Age, when the mysteries were revealed to the sons of men.

The circle is formed by joining hands.

- ALL We swear by peace and love to stand heart to heart and hand in hand. Mark, O Spirit, and hear us now confirming this, our sacred vow.
- (4) We who are drawn by affinity to this sacred place, mark the symbolic circle as of yore, and measure, as did our forebears, the lines of the eternal plan. While so doing, leave all earthly desires behind.
- (6) Let all mankind prepare for the restoration of the inheritance that has been withheld from them by the power of darkness. Let the earth be prepared for the coming of the great peace. Look forward to the all-illuminating day, flooded with mercy, wisdom and love, that we may go forth from this sacred place reflecting its light on all we meet.

Fanfare to the four Quarters, all turn to the Northeast

- (6) Now is the dawn!
- (1) Arise, Oh Sun! Let the darkness of night fade before the beams of thy glorious light. Our forefathers discovered the existence of divine purpose within all that is. They found no disorder or wrong within nature which they regarded as the reflected majesty of The Powers, and of the Almighty Power that lies beyond all. They knew that within the divine purpose all is created, preserved and transformed, through mercy and through love. From them came the great concept of the Infinite-universal Majesty, Verity, and Love Infinite, which dwells within the heart and life of all that is controlled by the wisdom and purpose of the Great Designer--the Godhead--The High Trinity, composed of the Builder, the Preserver, and the Transformer, the wise servants of the AD-Wise. They knew of the guidance of the Sacred Five, the Servant Messengers of the Highest, and they taught the purposed evolution of all things towards the better and the best.
- (6) Thus I proclaim the ultimate growth of all things into good; the divine harmony that is all-embracing; the eternal mercy and undying love; the eternal justice pervading the word of the cosmos; and the final purification of all!

All face inwards

- (4) Let the Words of Gold be heard!
- (8) In right submission and in humility there is the seed of Peace.
In peace and simplicity, there is the flower of Love.
In love and contentedness, there is the life of Joy.
In joy and intelligence, there is the light of Hope.
In hope and nobility, there is the heart of God.
And in good and sublimity, there is the smile of God.

- (4) Let the Words of Wisdom from the past be read! What are the three desirable objectives which all Druids strive to uphold?
- (8) The cultivation of expression. The cultivation and presentation of our ancient wisdom. The enlightenment of the people.
- (4) What are the three concepts of Druidical instruction?
- (8) The development of the mind. The cultivation of the intuition. The engendering of true manliness.
- (4) What are the three essentials of good discipleship?
- (8) Keen observation. Veneration of truth. Retentive memory.
- (8) collects the water and (3) deflects the Fire. In unison the circle is purified and consecrated. The Four Quarters are treated and the Elements are returned to their former positions.

THE DRUID PRAYER

- (4) Grant, O God, Thy protection--And in protection?
- ALL Strength.
- (4) And in strength?
- ALL Understanding.
- (4) And in understanding?
- ALL Knowledge.
- (4) And in knowledge?
- ALL The knowledge of justice.
- (4) And in the knowledge of justice?
- ALL: Love.
- (4) And in the love of it?
- ALL The love of all existences.
- (4) And in the love of all existences?
- ALL The love of God, and all goodness.

THE BENEDICTION

- (1) May you all go forth with wisdom and understanding to welcome come the day of deliverance, when brotherhood and love win be established amidst the plenty and gladness of the kingdom that is to be restored.

THE CLOSE

- (6) This ceremony is now ended.

The four Element-Bearers step forward in unison and collect the elements from the center of the circle, and return to their positions.

The page to (8) then removes the square of linen.

- (4) In peace let us depart; and may there be peace amongst us until we meet again!
- (1) Eternal wisdom be with us.
- ALL And with all beings!

The procession leaves the circle by way of the Southern Arch.

HIGH NOON

Many Druidic precepts are embodied in the celebration. The high honor accrued from expressions of talent should engender finer works by the possessor of that talent. Talent should be recognized and acknowledged. Honor bestowed implies bestowal from honorable sources; thus honor is equal, but since no man may reap where another has sown, privilege is not equal.

This teaching is well exemplified in the crowning of one of the assembly, and in his sharing of the honor by passing the crown on to his companions. Further thought could well be given to the allegory of the withdrawal of the sword and the subsequent collection of the rose.

It was ever the Druid custom to offer hospitality, a characteristic that is not confined to material matters; and hospitality received is acknowledged by blessing--that we "send them of their way, rejoicing."

As may be seen from the accompanying diagram, the procession in this ceremony completes the sun circle.

PROCESSION OF THE SWORD and the FOUR ELEMENTS

(1), the Sword Bearer, (6) and the four Element Bearers, in procession, place the Sword in the Sun Stone and lay the four elements on the cardinal point, where they remain in the care of the appointed "Dionachs of Without, " until collected by the main procession.

Officers the same as the Dawn with the addition of:

The Lady (Cerrid wen) Two Maids (Ladies in waiting)

THE HIGH NOON CEREMONY

The Companions gather at the Southern Mound in semi-circular formation.

- 4) Companions--the proceedings throughout the coming ceremony are symbolical and pervaded by a profound reverential spirit. Remember, the Druids of old knew no sharp line of division between the secular and the spiritual.
- (1) It is good that, from time to time we should unite ourselves in spirit and by our efforts draw near to the circles of the blessed immortals; in this manner, we prepare our Sanctuary within. The fire is lighted. The bowl is raised and lowered in witness.
- (4) Let us proceed.

(3) escorted by (6) returns with the Fire-bowl to the procession. The procession moves sun-wise to collect Bread and Salt from the Western Stone and Water from the Northern Mound. These three elements, (Fire, Air, Bread and Salt, and Water) are laid upon the Recumbent Stone, and the Hele Stone. (6) and the Sword-Bearer escort the Presider and the Triad to the Hele Stone, The Presider withdraws the Sword. After a pause, the Presider hearing the Sword leads the procession to the recumbent Stone. The Dionachs retire to their positions in the Columns.

- (4) Let us, in contemplation, enter the world of beauty as was the custom of our ancient companions who, with the whole force of the soul, sought union with the supreme source of life in profound respect and contemplative silence.

The Sword is sheathed by the Presider and laid to rest upon the Stone.

(5) (7) (3) and (9) take up their positions at the Recumbent Stone.

- (4) Which other 'stands without the Portal, and for what purpose has such a one come?

LADY I am come on this day of longest light to bear the offering and augury of plenty to the Presider and the Chief Elder of the Druid Order.

- (6) It is the Lady of Cathoir Ghall who is come, bearing the augury and offering of plenty, in her symbolic representation of Cerridwen, the Earth Mother.
- (4) Bid her enter and welcome. Now do we invoke the Supernal Word; the manifestation of the one Divine Spirit; the Triune Intelligence of the World.
- (1) Be with us now. The One spake, and the Three came forth; thus will it ever be.
- (4) And the Three became the many, and the many lead us back to the Three, and the One. Thus will it ever be.
- (6) The Word is uttered and ended.
- (1) The Holy Word has descended; behold the fulfillment.
- (4) Let us earnestly unite ourselves in spirit to the Golden Chain of the Druid Succession. May those who keep watch over the Stream of truth and the holy place of the mysteries, watch over us and the teaching of the most ancient Druid wisdom. Let us give thought for any who are sick, or in distress.

Silence is kept for a space.

Let the scroll be read.

(2) reads aloud the names of the departed, whose presence, together with all those unknown, is accepted in reality.

- (1) All reverence to our ancients and to our departed companions.
- Reverence to all in the Unity, past present, and yet to be.
Peace to all beings.
Eternal Wisdom, be with us.

THE SYMBOLIC FEAST

Staffs proceed to the Elements and take them up, the one hearing the Wine, his page the Bread and Salt, while the other two attend him hearing Fire and Water. (1) and the Presider partake first and serve all others, who advance as directed by the Herald (7) moves forward to take the Water Chalice. Fire, Bread and Wine from the three staffs so that they can partake. The Lady, her attendants, and banner bearers partake.

- (6) We proffer hospitality to any who wish to partake. By your leave, Gracious Lady, we will advance.

LADY Go forth--and I will follow.

- (6) followed by Lady. attendants and Sword-Bearer, proceed to (1)

- (6) Behold the bearer of the Horn of Plenty stands before you.

LADY I offer, Oh Druids, the fruits of the earth of this region and their nectar, in homage to your Order and this sacred place.

- (1) Benediction, I take from you the offering of your region.

Partakes, offers to Presider and (4). Then the Presider make the libation to earth, saying:

- (1) Blessed be; the fruits of your earth for ever, and we give thanks for the abundance of the harvest which is seen to be gathered.
- (1) returns the Horn to the Lady, who is then escorted to the West.
- (4) Let the Sword be presented.
- (1) addresses each of the four quarters in turn, partly unsheathing the sword and demanding:
- (1) Is it peace?
- ALL It is peace.

Same statement is made to the four quarters in turn, partly unsheathing the sword and demanding. All Companions and members will respond in like manner. The sword is sheathed at each demand.

- (4) Let us formulate the Triad.

The three with rods stand: White Staff to the West; Blue Staff to the North; and Green Staff to the South Apposite the Presider. (1) takes the crown of leaves from (4) and places it on the head of the Presider.

- (6) Let it be known; there has never ceased to be they who have transmitted the divine wisdom; for indeed will the immortals ever permit the link to be broken;
- (6) Let it be known; there has never ceased to be they who have transmitted the divine wisdom; for indeed will the immortals ever permit the link to be broken.

The feast concludes with (6), who drains and inverts the cup, saying:

- (6) The unity is accomplished.
- (4) May we be thus united in being.

The three staffs return the Elements to the center of the circle, collect rods, and return to their places. The Presider moves to the center of the circle, removes the crown and Rose from the linen square and places them on the Stone of Measurement.

THE DRUID PRAYER

- (4) Grant, O god, thy protection
And in protection -strength
And in strength -understanding
And in understanding -knowledge
And in knowledge -the knowledge of justice
And in And in the knowledge of justice -the love of it
And in the love of it -the love of all existences
And in the love of all existences -the love of God and all goodness.

- (1) May the power of the One Life sustain all true seekers. May the love of the One Light pervade all who seek to serve. May our souls be united thereby.
- (4) In peace these rites began. In peace we bring them to a close.

(3) (8) and (9) step forward in unison, collect the Fire-Bowl, Water Chalice and Bread and Salt, and step hack into the circle. The bearers of the wineglass and wine-jug then step forward, remove them from the center and return to their places. (7) removes the square of linen.

- (1) May all beings receive Eternal Light.

After a pause, the procession, led by the Sword bearer and the Presider, leaves the circle through the Southern Arch. The remains of the bread and salt are scattered to the four winds outside the circle.

HERE ENDS THE SUMMER SOLSTICE CEREMONIES

Now About those Human Sacrifices

by Polifonix Armorica

We Celts have been spread over a wide area, and you can never be sure about some tribes, especially those exposed to the influences of other races. Therefore, when confronted with the accusation of practicing human sacrifice which happens whenever I mention that, as a Bard, I belong to the order of Druids. I have until now countered only with the reply that we haven't been doing it in my village for as long as even the oldest inhabitant can remember and that we don't know of any villages that were doing it, even before Caesar came through. But it grows tiresome to hear such statements as, "I don't go along with burning people up in wicker cages." so I decided to investigate the matter.

To this date, even in the New Middle Ages, virtually the only formal sources available to me are those of the mundane world. In the New Catholic Encyclopedia I find: "Although there are references to human sacrifice in Gaul and Britain, it must have been rare. At any event, there is no evidence that this practice was approved or conducted by the Druids. The Catholics of the mundane world have been showing, signs of ecumenism lately, but if they have any ulterior reason for denying or even toning down evidence about pre-Christian Druids, I fail to comprehend what it could be.

However, one encyclopedia doth not an argument make. Turning to Man, Myth & Magic, an illustrated encyclopedia of the supernatural (because it was handy,) I found the statement: "The Celts practiced human sacrifice. The Romans considered this ritual to be barbarous and caused it to be discontinued. They also struck a lethal blow at the Druids whose power and political influence was a threat to the success of Roman campaigns in the Celtic areas. Caesar, referring to the practice of human sacrifice, describes the great images of interwoven branches which were filled with men and set alight..." Now, Man, Myth, & Magic is patently aimed at a popular, even sensation seeking market, and if it can find any gruesome lore to repeat, it probably will, and not worry overmuch about strict accuracy. Of the two, I'd be more inclined to accept the New Catholic as an unbiased encyclopedia. Even so, notice who described the sacrifices--Julius, who was out to conquer us. And notice that we Druids had political power which the Romans could not tolerate if they were to rule us. Can you begin to suspect there was a certain amount of propaganda in those tales about wicker baskets? One of the best ways to enlist opinion against your enemy, especially when you're the invader out to get his land, is to spread stories about the really ugly things he does, whether he does or not. And the Romans had some grounds to talk about us, with the way they threw people to the lions?!

Turning to a source which I hoped would be more authoritative than Man, Myth, and Magic, I opened the third edition of Sir James Frazer's venerable The Golden Bough. There, human sacrifices were the Beltane fires in the 17th or 18th century in the Scottish Highlands. Unable to understand quite how Frazer arrived at the unequivocal decision that Gauls practiced human sacrifice because Scotsmen lit bonfires eighteen centuries or so afterwards (couldn't we just as easily argue that Weenie roasts are unequivocal proof that the ancestors of the picnickers indulged in cannibalistic feasts of "long pig"?) I read on and found that "The earliest description of these sacrifices has been bequeathed to us by Julius Caesar." Julius again! As conqueror of the hitherto independent (!) Celts of Gaul, Caesar had ample opportunity of observing the national Celtic religion and manners, while these were still fresh and crisp from the native mint and had not yet been fused in the melting pot of Roman civilization." "Fresh and crisp" seem odd words to describe a centuries old religion and it is strange that Frazer does not seem to realize that Julius was not exactly the most objective observer. "With his own notes, Caesar appears to have incorporated the observations of a Greek explorer, by name Posidonius, who traveled in Gaul about fifty years before Caesar carried the Roman arms to the English Channel."

The Encyclopedia Americana describes Posidonius as a Stoic philosopher and statesman, ca 135 to 51 BC, who went to Rome as ambassador at the age of 50, initiated Cicero into the Stoic philosophy, wrote many works on history, astronomy, and geography, and in his physical investigations was largely a follower of Aristotle. It does not deny that he might have traveled in Gaul, but neither does it stress travels in Gaul as any important part of his life. Besides, if Julius had such fine opportunity of studying us at first hand, why should he fall back on Posidonius in the first place? Sir James goes on: "The Greek geographer Strabo and the historian Diodorus seem also to have derived their descriptions of the Celtic sacrifices from the work of Posidonius in the first place; Sir James goes on "The Greek geographer Strabo and the historian Diodorus seem also to have derived their descriptions of the Celtic sacrifices from the work of Posidonius, but independently of each other, and of Caesar for each of the three derivative accounts contain some details which are not to be found in either of the others. By combining them, therefore, we can restore the original account of Posidonius with some probability, and thus obtain a picture of the sacrifices offered by the Celts of Gaul at the close of the second century before our era." That is, assuming that Posidonius wrote such an account, and that Strabo and Diodorus were not quoting parts of the tales that Julius spread but did not include in his own books. Frazer begins by saying that Caesar

"appears," and Strabo and Diodorus "seem to have used" Posidonius, but, since human sacrifices fit his own theories, he doesn't belabor the uncertainty of this point.

Strabo, according to Americana, lived from 64 BC to 19 AD and traveled from Armenia in the East to Sardinia in the West, and from Pontus Euxinus on the North to the borders of Ethiopia. I'm not exactly sure whether this territory includes Gaulle but if so, Strabo traveled through it after Julius had already subdued most of it and, presumably, crushed out the supposed human sacrifices. As for Diodorus Siculus, the Encyclopedia Britannica, Eleventh Edition, says: "He asserts that he devoted thirty years to the composition of his history, and that he undertook frequent and dangerous journeys in prosecution of his historical researches. These assertions, however, find little credit with recent critics." Collier's Encyclopedia adds: "There are no references to it (Diodorus' history) in pagan literature for it was less a scholarly undertaking than a business enterprise. Diodorus used other but good authorities frequently..." Moreover, those parts of Diodorus which describe Julius' Gallic War and therefore, presumably, our religious activities, have apparently been lost and exist "only in fragments preserved in Photius and the excerpts of Constantine Porphyrogenitus," to quote Britannica again.

But back to Sir James: "Condemned criminals were reserved by the Celts in order to be sacrificed to the gods... If there were not enough criminals, captives taken in war" were added, some being shot with arrows, others impaled, others burned in the famous wicker cages. Even Frazer, who blandly assumes every word Julius and his rough contemporaries wrote about us is true, credits us with sacrificing only criminals and prisoners of war. "Executions" these would be called if Sir James' own culture were doing it, "sacrifices" only because he is writing about somebody else's culture. He next spends eight pages or thereabouts describing examples of wicker cages and bonfires of Christian times, in which animals, usually cats or snakes, might or might not be burned, and argues that because Christians of later centuries burned cats, snakes, and bonfires, therefore, we Celts burned people.

Sir James provides irony as to why we did it. "If we are right in interpreting the modern European fire festivals as attempts to break the power of witchcraft then we must suppose that the men whom the Druids burnt were condemned to death on the ground that they were witches or wizards" and fire was simply the surest way to get rid of them. Animals sacrificed were thought to be witches in disguise. Witches were believed to blight crops and cast unpleasant spells on people, so that exterminating them was protecting the rest of the populace, not persecution. Even Frazer considers this the most likely reason why witches were done to death the most likely reason why witches were done to death. "On this view," he continues, "the Christian Church in its dealing with the black art merely carried out the traditional policy of Druidism, and it might be a nice question to decide which of the two, in pursuance of that policy, exterminated the larger number of innocent men and women." It might also be a nice question to decide how many of those so executed were innocent in their own opinion. Sir James, taking the stance of the sober and non mystical side of the early 20th century AD considers that anyone accused of witchcraft had to be innocent, because there's no such thing. Self-proclaimed witches seem themselves to protest against that line of reasoning. To say that a culture which did believe in witches should not have taken steps to protect themselves because your culture does not believe in witches is to apply a retroactive scale of justice. More to the point, any Christian who shakes an accusing finger at us Druids on account of Frazer's arguments, had best be prepared to defend the actions of his own church in later centuries.

Yet according to my friend, Lady Frytha of the Marches, Christian witch burnings were almost exclusively a feature of the late medieval and early modern times, not of the early medieval period. ⁴ This would mean that the Druidic tradition was revived again after a millennium or so of attempts at obliteration which were effective enough, at least, to wreak havoc with our literary works. But the whole "witchcraft" theory (of Druid sacrifice) depends on a few assumptions of less than proven reliability: that we couldn't find any other criminals except witches (witchless centuries don't seem to have any noticeable lack of un-supernatural criminals,) and that we did, in fact burn and otherwise sacrifice them.

The Larousse Encyclopedia of Mythology, that majestic tome, states: "Allowing for literary license, there seems to be no doubt that the Celts practiced human sacrifice, perhaps not as a frequent part of their ceremonial, but certainly in times of trouble and possibly, in the earlier period at least, at certain annual ritual gatherings." Larousse seems to base its argument on our own oral tradition, arguing that such and such an ordeal is an allusion to ritual blood letting. At first sight, this looks more damning than the non-Celtic propaganda discussed above. However, most of the traditions known to Larousse appear to be Irish and Welsh; Julius did a fairly thorough job of obliterating Gaulish traditions. What lore has survived in any area was only written down later, a good part of it in Irish monasteries, and subjected to a good bit of re-copying over the centuries, by adherents of another than the original religion. And long re-copying has been known to do strange things even to texts of a single author's literary creation. It can hardly be an easy task to figure out exactly what tales we really told, and when and if that is done, the matter of interpretation still remains. Having watched respected critics almost batter each other over the heads arguing about whether or not Arthur took a swipe at the Green Knight in a comparatively late poem which survives in only one known text, and considering the confusion of symbols which the Mabinogian surely must present to the uninitiated mind, I feel some doubts as to how authoritative a case can really be built against us on such grounds. Still more important, this body of tradition was already ancient when scraps of it were finally put down on parchment; already ancient centuries before Julius came through. Possibly, once, human sacrifices may have inspired some things in the tales; there may turn out to be human sacrifice in almost every people's history, if you go far enough back. (Judeo-Christians are not exempt. In the Judeo-Christian holy writings, there are not simply possible allusions to human sacrifice, there are out and out statements of it.) That hardly means we were still doing it within anybody's living memory by the time of Caesar, nor that anybody by the second or third century BC had any idea that our traditions contained possible allusions to human sacrifice. Long ago and far away I once found a scholarly collection which included an Irish folktale in which a "hung-up, bloody man" came down from a tree to play the role of villain. The notes theorized that this man was the Christus, who had been put into the story as villain by some stout old Pagans resisting conversion, but the Christian generations had long been retelling the tale in total ignorance of the bloody man's identity. And this happened within a short time, compared with the centuries in which our lore had had time to develop! There remains, also, the question of symbolism. Future centuries may read The Lord of the Flies and suchlike, and decide that 20th century rituals included human sacrifice. And The Lord of the Flies is certainly no more symbolic than the Mabinogian. It looks to me as if we could just as easily rephrase this sort of "traditional" evidence and say: "Allowing for literary license, there seems to be no doubt that the Jews slaughtered Christian babies."⁵

We've heard there is a novel in which Druids are described as committing a particularly revolting sacrifice, something about stuffing a young girl with oak leaves. This sounds to me like the work of some thrill-seeking novelist out to out-Julius Julius. The worst that Caesar, Frazer, and their more serious followers (excluding novelists) say of us is that we executed criminals and, at need, war prisoners. Almost every culture has done such things, many cultures in more painful methods than the grisliest we have been soberly accused of practicing. The great difference is that, according to Julius and Frazer, we saved up our executees and did it at certain times and in possible connection with religious rites. Since Druids were political as well as religious leaders, even Sir James might have some trouble deciding how much of the execution was religious and how much merely legal. The line between politics and religion was not always so clearly defined as in the last few centuries of mundane history. And yet, the highest religious rites are almost universally secret, open only to chosen believers and therefore, if Posidonius and Julius witnessed anything, it was probably an execution more "legal" than "religious" or else they would have to have been sneaking and spying and in the latter case, if we were the barbarians they have made us out to be, they would have been lucky to escaped with their lives.

Julius liked to think of himself a great tactician, and if he witnessed a criminal execution or two, he would have been only too happy to embellish the details and report it as widespread religious practice. These Romans, our earliest accusers, did a few things that make the worst they said of us look almost gentle. I have not yet uncovered any story to the effect that we used torture as part of our legal processes in gathering evidence and confessions--but since torture was accepted juridical process in the Graeco-Roman world, spreading such a report about us would have had no propaganda value. If according to the picture Julius and Sir James paint, we had been less thrifty about combining ritual with criminal processes, we might have gone down as "civilized."

So far, the burden of evidence that we did even this much rests on Julius, who had good motives (after his own peculiar ways of thinking) to use all the propaganda against us that he credibly could, even if he had to manufacture it; upon Strabo, whose independence from Julius' tales or the effects of them is questionable; upon Diodorus, who seems to have been a popular writer and something of an opportunist, capable of taking the goriest and, therefore, most salvable material and treating it as utter truth; and upon Posidonius, who may or may not have written an account which Julius, Strabo, and Diodorus may or may not have used; and upon a few scraps of mangled Celtic traditions, long transmitted and interpreted by adherents of newer creeds. Until better evidence turns up I am inclined to dismiss the whole case.

Now About Those Human Sacrifices...

1. No connection to the Reformed Druid movements.
2. It doesn't. Pontus Fluxinus is the Black Sea. Strabo's travels include almost none of what is generally thought of as Western and Northern Europe, and only the eastern half of Southern Europe. The only "Gauls" he could have had any contact with were their distant cousins who settled "Galatia" near the southern shores of the Black Sea.
3. That is to say. "witches-as-evil-doers."
4. The biggest persecution period ran roughly 1450 to 1750 or so.
5. Especially if, for example, some future group of Nazis were to (Gods forbid!) conquer the world, murder every Jew and destroy every book about Judaism except their own. Now--consider what our current sources of information about non-Christian religion in Europe and Russia are.

The Druidic Cross Tarot

By Stephen Abbot McCauley and Steven Goldstone
-Summer 1980

This Tarot layout is the second of a series planned for publication. It first appeared in Gnostica News issue number 45 and was called the Pentacle Layout. The present article should be considered as only a bare outline of the Druidic Cross Layout. It has been developed in conjunction with the: Celtic Pagan Tarot Deck, a set of designs soon, hopefully, to be published. They are beautiful cards, designed by David Weiss, a Los Angeles artist, and myself, using Celtic divinities as archetypes.

The Pentacle Layout was designed to be used for questions dealing with deeply personal and spiritual matters. As most of you are aware, the pentacle symbolizes the microcosm--a mini-universe--a personal frame of reference which extends from within us all as individuals. The Druidic Cross layout is a logical progression from this: it represents five manifested, exteriorized spheres of Being which emanate from the microcosm of the Self.

These five circles correspond to the five traditional elements: fire, air, earth, water, and spirit. And, as in our Druid tradition--they also represent the five directions: north, south, east, west, and the Center. The relationships of Element to Direction are those of the Golden Dawn System familiar to most students of occultism. Fire is South, Air is East, Water is West, Earth is North, and Spirit, or Akasha, is the Center.

In our layout, each circle is given a letter. The center circle is Letter A, and is considered to be the first sphere of influence - the realm of Spirit. Letter B, the second circle, represents Earth; Letter C, the third circle, is Fire. Letters D and E are Air and Water, respectively. This completes the basic circle of the elements. Much can be inferred from this pattern about the nature of energy-flow being shown.

In addition to the Elements, certain ancient Celtic deities hold sway over the Five Circles. These can be invoked as guides by the diviner, or their spheres of influence seen as centers of the body in a psychic sense, or simply studied in terms of how their energies influence a manifestation. The object is to develop a personal relationship with the elemental divinities of the Celtic pantheon, to get close to them, and to listen for their prophetic voices as did the ancient Bards. This guidance from the Gods is the essence of divination.

This list given of Celtic divinities is not intended to be complete, however, it is a suggestion, an outline, of what might be possible. Many other implicit concepts will present themselves to the serious student.

A final set of corresponding images for the outer circles are the Four Magical Treasures of Celtic Tradition, as shown in the diagram.

Some ideas for this layout came from an excellent book by Virginia Moore entitled The Unicorn. In it is given some material from unpublished diaries of W. B. Yeats, written at the time when he was still a member of the Golden Dawn. (After his death, it is believed that most of his diaries work was burnt by his fanatical widow, who considered magic to be of the Devil. A similar fate befell the diaries of Sir Richard Burton, much to our loss.)

Other ideas come from a multitude of books of Celtic Mythology; and still others, from personal experience. Complete bibliography will accompany the Celtic Deck when it is published.

Special thanks are due to David Voight for his fine artwork on the Layout.

This Layout is especially designed for Tarot students who wish to explore the influence of divinities of the ancient Gaels in their lives, and to communicate with them. It can bring more scope and dimension, however, to anyone seriously interested in Paganism and Magic.

Gods	Circle	Elements
Tailtu & Tethra	A	Spirit
Danu & Dagda	B	Earth
Bridgid & Lugh	C	Fire
Cendwen & Mannan MacLir	D	Water
Rhaiannon & Camelos	E	Air

Gods	The Legend	Treasure
Tailtu & Tethra	Center Indigo	Symbol of the Triple Goddess
Danu & Dagda	North Brown	Stone Lia Fail
Bridgid & Lugh	South Red	Spear of Lugh
Cendwen & Mannan MacLir	West Silver	Cauldren of Inspiration
Rhaiannon & Camelos	East Blue	Sword of Nuada, Fragarach

Table 1 summarizes the five circles of being. Only Circle A will be treated in detail here.

At ancient Telltown was held the annual celebration Lughnasadh for here Lang the (God of fire, married the land of Eirin (Ireland). Watching over this sacred spot is Iailtu, or Telta, who had her palace here. Also, a great battle for the control of Ireland was fought here.

In Celtic religion the center of a particular province was considered the most magical and sacred place in that province. All of the most important Druidic and magical rites were performed and celebrated at the sacred center point. It is appropriate for Tailtu, who watched over such a central and important point in Erin, to be honored here.

Beneath the sea the Fomoire, whose king was Tethra, plotted to take Erin by force and bring her under the sea. After years of preparation, a great battle was fought at Telltown in which the Fomoire were defeated. Tethra has also been a major force in Stephan's personal work and is honored in the center here.

The Gods do not guard their own treasures, but assign the task to their priests. In this case, the priests are called Druids, and their worship is of the deities of nature and the ways of nature. This particular guardian is called the Druid of the Center, the Druid of the Mystic Center, the Keeper of the Mysteries of the Spirit. The guardian wears a robe the colour of indigo, the elemental colour of Spirit.

If his guardian is to be called upon when you wish to perform a reading which deals with the weighty or deeply spiritual matters. Being a priest, the guardian can contact the deity forms of this (the spirit) plane of awareness if the question is dire enough.

The magical treasure of this centre circle is the symbol of the triple Goddess, the circle of spirit with two lines crossing it. The circle is a symbol for the concept of "peace," for only with peace of mind and the calm feelings which it brings can anything be done successfully of a spiritual nature.

Comments and criticisms of the Druidic Cross Layout are welcomed. Please send all correspondence to the authors at 3215 Brookdale Avenue, Oakland, CA 94602. We do not know when the Celtic Pagan Tarot deck will be completed (hopefully during 1980,) but we will gladly answer correspondence on it when we find out more precisely.

Chakra Number Three... POWER!

This is the fourth in a series of articles on the chakra system. Chakras, in this system, are defined as energy centers in the body that correspond to levels of consciousness, bodily processes, and categories of "external reality." The basic seven chakras, from bottom to top, are as follows: One - earth, centering, survival instincts; Two - water, sex, emotions; Three - fire, power, active energy; Four - air, love, affinity; Five - ether, communication, creativity; Six - time, light, clairvoyance; Seven - cosmic consciousness, Godhead, spiritual information.

These articles represent some original conceptualization on the part of the author from her research and experience of these gained through reading, administering body therapy, doing psychic readings, and teaching and practicing various forms of yoga. This system is mystical rather than intellectual, and the reader is asked to look beyond logical inadequacies, and instead, turn inward to personal experience for the understanding of these centers. Xeroxes of the previous articles are available from Pentalpha.

Power! The very word has a charge that describes itself. A burst of energy, an explosion; fire, light, heat, wisdom; a feeling of mastery, confidence, control.

We all want it, we all need it, and there are few who feel they have enough. Those who have it, guard it carefully, and those without try desperately to take power from those who do.

We all know what it's like to feel powerless, to have our energy blocked, manipulated, controlled. What is often the case, however, is that we don't realize the power we do have within ourselves; we don't know how to release it and much of it remains unused, checked, withheld.

This article will focus on power and energy as aspects of the third chakra, and how they relate to us in mind, body, and culture. The basic arguments are built on an assumption of "As within, so without"-- that the condition of our own power chakras are the reflection and cause of the use of power and energy externally, and ultimately collectively and politically. This is a very broad topic there is so much one could say about power, and needs to be said, that my own chakra quivers at the implications. Please bear with the length of this article as well as the brevity of some of the subtopics. Any questions are welcomed and can be directed to me through Pentalpha.

Theory and Metaphysics

We began in the first chakra with the element earth, and defined this chakra as the level of manifestation known as matter. From the second chakra, we looked at that matter in terms of its differentiation or polarities, and finally, movement. Numerically speaking, one and two make three, and it is just so as we approach the third chakra. The "matter" of chakra number one, when put into "motion," (chakra number two) reacts with other particles of matter contacted through this movement. This causes changes in the structure of the molecules as the particles within form bonds, split apart, reform, etc. Energy is then given off, or released, as more efficient bonds are made.

Our sun is the prime manifestation of this: The sun is basically hydrogen atoms, which are the simplest, smallest and most abundant atoms in the universe. The sun produces power, light, and heat by way of nuclear fusion. Nuclear fusion occurs when the nuclei of certain light elements collide, mutually rearranging their constituents so that a more stable less energy-rich combination results. This releases kinetic energy. Since the nuclei have a positive charge, they must possess sufficient kinetic energy to overcome their mutual repulsion, so that they may approach closely enough to undergo a fusion reaction. In the sun, this energy is supplied by extreme heat (100,000,000 degrees C) ² which stimulates enough movement to insure that one atom will hit another, and hit it with enough force to fuse.

Electricity is still another example of an energy/power that is based on movement between polarities. The polarities build up the charge (imbalance of positive and negative particles) which then seeks to regulate itself. From this we derive power.

These are all examples of energy production in the physical world. The third chakra is responsible for the production and regulation of energy in the body, and the conscious channeling of this energy to create power (defined here as directed energy). The various aspects of the chakras combine to bring this miracle about.

Let me express this by comparing the lower chakras to the gasoline combustion engine. An engine is a physical thing, made up of hard, solid metal (matter is the first chakra). But an engine without gas (liquid) will not run. Gas alone will not generate power, and an engine and gas together will not run until it is turned over, providing movement (second chakra) to start the whole process. But once these elements combine, (given a little air, space, and time to exist in) the process of combustion occurs and perpetuates itself. This combustion is the essence of the third chakra on a physical level. Our own energy serves to help the organism obtain what it needs to continue its existence. Energy perpetuates energy, through its manipulation of matter, (which is only dense energy, see Chakra One Issue No. 11).

The first three chakras form a basic interwoven trinity upon which we base our existence in physical bodies, and our life on this planet. None of these groups are isolated, and each are interdependent with other chakras. The element of the third chakra is fire, and for fire to burn it needs not only fuel, but air and space, (or volume,) a function of the fourth chakra directly above. To say nothing of an overall consciousness which has the intelligence to create and maintain the energy generating situation.

The engine also needs air to compress. The volume containing the air is of concern here; when the space within the cylinder decreases, the air heats, exploding the fuel, thus creating more volume for itself again. The bigger the volume within the cylinders, the greater the power of the engine. Combustion is often a matter of oxidation.

Our lives are no different. If we have plenty of room to ourselves, time, and freedom (known in California as "space,") then we have a greater potential for power. Like the engine, if our "space" is infringed upon, we are likely to "heat up" at a certain point, get angry and exert some effort to getting it back.

This chakra is called Manipura in the Hindu system, meaning "lustrous gem." It is described as having ten petals, which I correlate to the power that comes from having hands, ten fingers each. (The first chakra is four petals, the second is six, the fourth, twelve, etc.) I feel that crystals and gems play a significant role in the psychic development of power, and though the name probably refers to the star-like quality of chakras when seen clairvoyantly, I cannot help but think its connection to crystals is more than coincidental. This is certainly a topic of its own, and one which is only beginning to be explored, let alone understood. ³ I see crystals as amplifiers of psychic energy, in the same way as a magnifying glass amplifies or focuses light. Often around a crystal, one may see little spots of light, refracted by the crystal. These are similar to the vitality globules described by C.W. Leadbeater in his classic book on chakras.⁴ According to Leadbeater, these vitality globules are a force within the atom that gives it a power of attraction, so that it draws around it other atoms. Leadbeater attributes these globules to the "will-force of the Solar Deity." This vitality is the same force that Hindus speak of when they talk about the life force in breath, called Prana, or the Chi in other systems. To me, it is structure with consciousness in it. By lining up the "charged" points, we can direct our psychic energy.

THE VITALITY GLOBULE

Manipura is also associated with the intellect in most systems, as is its color, yellow. It is what I call the "lower" intellect--that body of knowledge dealing with things of the physical plane, such as science, technology, medicine, and factual information. Wisdom, conceptual, abstract, or intuitive knowledge are generally functions of the upper chakras.

Ever hear the expression, "knowledge is power"? It is here that the intellect, by virtue of what it knows, sees, and understands, combines with the body's energy and desire, giving us will, the conscious force that directs action. This is the most important aspect of the third chakra and a crucial element in magic. It is through the will that this chakra says, "I can."

Will is easiest to understand by examining the flow of energy in and out of the third chakra. Moving from the bottom up, we have matter changing to spirit; we have combustion a rearrangement of matter which 'produces force. This is the kinetic energy utilized by the will.

Manipura, when approached from the top down, however, brings consciousness to this force, giving it form. It is this aspect of will which gives manifestation to that which the mind conceives and the energy generates. The upper chakras bring information, inspiration, conceptualization, visualization, communication, and love down to this center.

The lower chakras produce energy, while it is the upper chakras that channel this energy, and create power. It is a matter of consciousness putting form to force. Combined, they create will.

Within the body, the third chakra is situated in the solar plexus over the adrenal glands. It is responsible for metabolism and energy distribution in the body. The adrenal glands make adrenaline in the form of norepinephrine and epinephrine, chemical transmitters of impulses across the nerve synapses. As related to metabolism, this chakra also correlates to the digestive system. Problems in these areas would indicate third chakra blockage or exhaustion.

Physically, our bodies express power in terms of energy expenditure. Our nerve synapses are firing constantly, our bodies are always metabolizing. This is a characteristic of being alive. How smoothly the energy is metabolized and distributed through the body, however, depends on many things:

1. What we allow ourselves to do with this energy--where we allow it to flow and how. This is the psychological aspect, or the force from within,
2. What others allow us to do with this energy. This represents authority, social structures, and cultural conditioning that dictate our freedom. This is the political element or forces from without.
3. The state of our health is effected by what we put into our bodies and what we put out with our bodies in the form of exercise or activity. Aside from the physical effect on the body, this is also part of the energy we generate in the outside world, and part of the energy that returns to us.

The specifics of physical, psychological, political, magical, and spiritual power are each worthy of an article of their own.

The most important point about them all is that they are interrelated. The food you eat is the matter you combust. It is the fuel for your physical energy. If you want to feel good psychologically, you must take care of yourself physically. But even if you are meticulous about your health, you may still suffer from low energy if you are the victim of oppressive politics, or unresolved psychological conflicts.

Psychologically, the greatest oppression occurs within our own minds. It is not so much what we do that may oppress us, but more often what hits it with enough force to fuse. These are all examples of energy production in the physical world. The third chakra is responsible for the production and regulation of energy in the body, and the conscious channeling of this energy to create power (defined as how you treat others, and if you are in a position of power, your own tension, whether due to poor diet, psychological blocks or some other cause, may result in someone else's oppression. Thus, the cycle continues. "Energy" does not have the boundaries that are definable in terms of matter. One form begets another, and truly, we are all in this together.

Magically, we can perhaps change some of the circumstances in our lives to our own advantage, (and thus increase our power) but the ability to do strong, effective magic, depends on the clarity and focus of our state of mind; as well as our ability to control circumstances to a degree that allows us the time and space to do magic. This powerful art can be hardest to perform when it is needed the most.

So what do we do about this incredible tangle of events we seem so hopelessly caught up in? Where do WE begin to take the power and what do we do with it when we have it? How do we break the cycle of going to our oppressive job everyday, which wastes paper, gas, and electricity, while keeping us too busy to develop something that would be more satisfying, and more energy efficient? What do we do about the people who don't even realize that other possibilities exist? How do we stop the oppressive political thinking, and well formed habits that keep our country, the world, and ourselves in a constant energy crisis?

The only answer I see is that we must work with our own power chakras. The world is far too big for any of us to change it alone especially without any power to begin with. What we can change is ourselves--and perhaps as a result of this, change some of our immediate environment. If enough of us do this, does that change the world?

The rest of this article will focus on some of the ways we can increase our own personal power. There is no easy, instant solution. The third chakra is a very complex one--perhaps the most complex of them all. Power is created a little at a time, as our own energies gradually evolve to higher and higher levels.

GROUNDING

First things first. Before we can do anything, we have to have bodies to do it in, and we have to be able to move those bodies. This requires contact with the earth or something from the earth plane. If you want to get up out of a chair, the first step is to put your feet on the floor, your hands on the chair and then move.

The first chakra article dealt with grounding in depth, so I will only include a quick review:

Where are you right now? Where is your body, what is it doing, and what is it feeling? What does it feel like in the room you are now occupying? Where is your energy? Connect yourself to the here and now: imagine a cord going from your spine to the ground and hook it into the earth like an anchor. Grounding is simply increasing our awareness of our connection to the earth, or physical plane.

Grounding also connects us with our bodies. Our bodies can be seen as homes for our "spirits," just as our houses are homes for our bodies. We come and go but return to the same place each night. The difference is that we cannot change bodies, move away or rent them out when they no longer serve us well. So we have to take care of them.

NUTRITION

The food we eat is the matter we combust. However, the body runs, not on matter, but on energy. To run the body most efficiently, we want to ingest the combinations of food that burn most efficiently.

This is true to a certain extent. As mentioned above, we use our bodies as physical homes for ourselves. Therefore, they must be fed structural material as well as combustible material. And like our homes, they also need to be cleaned once in a while.

Yes, we need energy producing fuels, but if we try to produce more energy than our bodies are capable of handling, we begin to burn our own structural tissue. One wouldn't want to burn the studs in their walls for firewood!

Drugs such as caffeine and refined sugars do just this. They tell the body to produce more and the body has to take the energy from somewhere and produce. Going one step further back in time, the need for these drugs was probably due to the fact that your body got orders from someone (was it you?) to produce and the body had to call for an "energy fix." So we grab for drugs or simple sugars, which give us quick energy, but in the long run, weaken the body further. As we weaken the body, we are more vulnerable to the psychic hurricane forces around us just as one is more subject to colds if they live in a house with holes in the walls. (especially with no firewood!) When this happens, there is either a need for more protection and/or compensation, or a total breakdown of some sort. This then requires more energy from the outside world, and more energy from the spirit/body in order to obtain it. This weakens the third chakra.

All stimulants have this effect on the body to a certain degree--coffee, sugar, nicotine, (which releases sugar from the liver,) alcohol, and even marijuana affect the blood sugar levels. Therefore, if ingested at all, extra attention should be given to see that the body meets its need in the way of vitamins, proteins, and slower metabolizing starches (such as whole wheat bread or rice).

Ideally these drugs should be avoided altogether, but this is much easier said than done, for usually our activities and environment are as dependent on the stimulants as our bodies are. In a deeply competitive society, where financial security and personal appreciation seem to be based on production, it is hard to compete with the heavy coffee drinker who is full of energy all day long. This forces all of us to "step up" our energy day after day, just to keep up with the demands made upon us. Often this is created by taking on too much in the first place, and then having to work twice as hard to pay for it. However, it seems to be a cultural addiction, and the resulting frustrations and dissatisfactions only make us want more.

EXERCISE

In order to have energy or power, we must overcome our own inertia. Most joggers claim, and I agree, that the more they run, the more energy they seem to have. Again, energy perpetuates energy--once the inertia is broken and the momentum begun, the cycles are easier to maintain (provided it doesn't go too fast--then it's time to ground and center again).

Aside from running, any physical exercise helps to stimulate the third chakra by stepping up metabolism and oxygen intake. Chakras are like muscles; the more you use them, the stronger they become.

PERSONAL POWER-

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL LEVEL

How we feel about ourselves greatly determines how easily our energy flows and how we manifest our personal power. And again, how we feel about ourselves can depend on many different things.

Rather than continue philosophizing, I would like to merely list things that can be done to increase one's power psychologically, the most important place to begin. Some of these things may seem obvious, but I find these are the things most often overlooked by those who complain of powerlessness.

1. Give yourself time alone. Energy blocks can be caused by your own limitations or by limitations put on you by others, consciously or unconsciously. At least when you are alone, you can sort out which is which. Grounding is easier alone anti one has more time to think things through. If you desire to make changes in your life, it is much easier to do it alone. Get rid of people who undermine your energy.

2. Love yourself. If you don't no one else will. You know best what you need and if give it yourself, you don't need as much from others. Need is conversely proportional to power. You can also give more to others this way.

3. Avoid invalidation. Criticism can be helpful but negative energy from others, especially when one is trying something new and uncertain, can be one of the greatest power cripples I know. It works on a subtle psychological level and is easiest to spot when one is very centered within themselves. Remember new ideas meet their greatest opposition from those who misunderstand them.

4. Balance. To get from the second chakra to the third, the dual forces within ourselves must be balanced. Check input and output, male and female energy, intellectual and physical, work and play, and activity-rest cycles for any energy draining imbalances.

5. Wiring and resistors. Make sure your energy travels in complete circuits--that what you put out does eventually come back. Make sure it is not caught up in resistance. Directing the cause of your life is one thing, but resistance to situations probably created by you for your own growth is a waste of energy and exhausting. If your energy is low, ask yourself if you are resisting something and why.

6. Anger. This is best done in conjunction with grounding and balance and is an excellent way of using the energy within you to bring about change. Blocked power is very often blocked anger. In my experience of administering bio-energetic therapy, most of the self hatred, overeating, and drug abuse is due to blocked anger, which has then turned inward. Anger is a potent and cleansing force--a red serpent of returned karmic energy. It is hard earned and should be spent wisely.

7. Sex. Sex can be healing and energizing, giving validation, support, pleasure, and tens on release, giving that second chakra movement to catalyze combustion in the third.

8. Breaking attachments. Energy that is directed towards something that is not manifesting is energy that is hung up, caught, or otherwise useless. If, after reasonable effort something is not working, let it go. The energy you feel when the attachment no longer has control over you will be exhilarating. The more you release, the less friction you have on your energy flow.

9. Attention. Attention is focused energy. Give it to yourself. Give and accept it from others. Pay it when it needs to be paid.

10. Love. Love is that unifying force that ties us all together, inspires us and gives us a strength to keep going. It is exhilarating, cleansing, energizing, healing, and growth producing.

11. Wisdom. Knowledge is power and the more we learn the fewer mistakes we theoretically make. Wisdom and power both develop slowly, and are wonderfully coupled.

12. Laughter. Taking things too seriously can really make one lose touch with their own power. Whenever things seem at their worst, remember to be amused at the situation.

POLITICAL POWER

Just as our beliefs direct our own energies, so do politics form a kind of megastructure for directing our energies as a group or society. Unfortunately, the politics don't always serve the personal energies of the people involved as well as they might. We have so little direct control over the larger political structures that control us that I choose not to discuss them here. Instead, I wish to illuminate the subtler structures that affect us everyday--structures that we and only we can change.

Politics can be overt or covert. An oppressive situation which is obvious can often be a generator of power for it forces people to join together and realize their strengths against the opposition. However, covert political oppression is quite a different story.

Oppression is the key word here--something that is controlling or subverting your energy. Something that says you can't do that you can't go here; you can't have that. And in this case, the something is more often a nonverbal, commonly held belief rather than a law. Oppression blocks our natural energy flows and if the source of the oppression is mystified, we turn this blocked energy against ourselves. Once we do this, we have blocked our own power and we no longer have enough to stand up against these situations.

Sexism is the clearest example of this. The woman who is superficially granted all the rights and privileges of any man while still facing social rejection for being aggressive, or powerful, faces a greater enemy than mere job discrimination. When she tries to "make it" in a world of men who are conditioned beyond their own awareness to be threatened by her success, the obvious drawbacks due to lack of experience or conditioned passivity become even more insurmountable. Especially when you consider that it is these men who are in the positions of power. Most of "Feminist therapy" is spent re-channeling the woman's self-hatred and depression over her repeated failures at impossible tasks, outlining some of the real problems, and building enough self-esteem through support, for her to have the confidence necessary to overcome them.

I am reminded here of the Radical Therapy maxim, "Awareness plus contact equals liberation," or from another source, "True revolution is revelation." But in this case, the revelation must be grounded--must be applied to the real world so that a change takes place or the awareness is worth little. However, the first battle is the realization of the oppression, and then to find others who can lend strength and support in a common struggle. We create power by supporting each other.

In fact, we create more of our own political and cultural environment than we realize. We have already shown that what we eat, think and do affects how our energy flows. How we use this energy then effects everyone around us. If we stay up late at night, making noise our I neighbor will not sleep either. We all set living examples for each other, whether this is conscious or not. Multiplied out, this becomes how we use our energy as a culture. Are we addicted to madly running errands in our cars and dashing about at a moment's notice, or are we a culture that meditates and does things slowly? What is the result of our increased technological power and the increasing rapidity with which everything occurs? What kind of power do we want to depend on and what kind of power do we want to generate?

Energy travels in cycles, rhythms, and movements; each one begetting the one which is to follow. Just as you cannot drive a locomotive with the steam from a teapot, you cannot do very much with your power if it is constantly squandered on little things that break down your concentration and natural rhythms.

Most of us in this urbanized culture cannot get away from this. The mass of our population gets up every morning, works, comes home, watches television and becomes further programmed without ever having the time to really learn who they are, or what the earth is like outside of "carsville." They become astoundingly ignorant that other possibilities exist--so much so that they are vehemently opposed to any ideas that suggest it. It is important to understand why this occurs.

We are culturally bred into powerlessness, through obedience to authority and through positive reinforcement for conformity. This makes the system "work." Just as the combustion within the engine cylinders perpetuates the cycle of the engine, the processes of our political machinery perpetuate the state of our present society. To fight this, it is important to constantly ask ourselves if we are really following our heart, or are we following programming that was put there when we were too naive to recognize it? How much of our actions are geared by the tendency to conform, and how afraid are we to break that conformity? What are the ramifications?

The most serious problem is that we are so caught within "the system" that supports us that we are too dependent to change it. I have "ecologically-minded" friends who commute many miles each day to work and back, disliking it intensely. They feel trapped into a behavior they do not support, and powerless to find a better way to pay their rent and food bills. It's the old "if you can't beat 'em, join 'em" syndrome. How many of us buy clothing, drive extra miles, ingest "energy raising" drugs, and do many other things we don't really believe in, just to fit the expectations we must meet in order to make a living? How much do these expectations really fit our own values?

Unfortunately, there are no simple answers to this problem. None of us are going to change the system alone or overnight. The only thing we can do to help is to be aware of all this--of the ramifications of our own actions; and to raise our consciousness to a point where the "goodies" of the "system" no longer appeal to us, and to put our energy and support elsewhere. Only we can prevent forest fires! Only we can prevent the destruction of the earth through the misuse of power.

Power is the ability to create change at will. It is the ability to overcome inertia, to combine matter with intellect, to manifest ideas or to change reality to fit those ideas. Magic is defined as the ability to create change in consciousness and/or reality at will (depending on which definition you use).

The key word here, however, is WILL. After all is said and done, it is our will that combines the matter with the intellect, that creates the change, and that dispels or ignores counter-productive forces.

Will involves intellectual understanding; will involves force and form. By putting ourselves at the crossroads for these energies, and applying a sensitive enough consciousness, we effect change in our surroundings.

Power is everywhere, because everything is in a constant state of change. That which is still has stored power; that which is moving has kinetic power. The trick is to align ourselves with power as it exists, and to use this power to bend and to shape, according to our will, our desires, feelings and knowledge. This can be a dangerous thing, and I see it as involving a great deal of responsibility, hopefully accompanied by equal amounts of wisdom and clear consciousness.

This "willed change" is the essence of both magic and the third chakra. It is a transformation of energy and Manipura is a transformation center. Magic is basically a third chakra activity, (although it clearly involves all the chakras) and as such requires a synthesis of many elements and planes.

Power and magic must be utilized in order to be evident:

"Who has seen the wind?

Neither you nor I,

But when the trees bow down their heads,

The wind is passing by!"

The wind is a power that can be harnessed by being in alignment with it. Through manipulation of matter, according to a specific knowledge this power can be harnessed (in the shape of a windmill) to do work or to create more power. It is a matter of placing the correct things in the correct way at the correct time anti place or a matter of consciousness putting from to force. This is exactly how magic is done, and magic, like power, operates under certain observable laws. These laws are too numerous to list here, but suffice it to say that they fall under the heading of knowledge, and any knowledge, perceptively assimilated, can increase one's power as a magician. (or anything else for that matter). Knowledge, placement, movement, and win equal power

The key to magical power is in the synthesis of the different planes. This is where the chakra system--(among others) comes into use. Each of the chakras are associated with different planes, elements, numbers, colors, sounds, thoughts, Gods, body functions, and levels of consciousness. Magic is essentially a willed synthesis of these planes, achieved through an understanding of their common links.

We, as persons, also utilize power by being in alignment with it. One place of power we all occupy constantly is in our bodies--in our spinal column, our muscles, our perception, and consciousness. By paying attention to this body and developing its sensitivity and the healthy now of our own energy, we develop our power. As we come closer to knowing who we are, we become more centered, and therefore, more powerful, as masters of our own energy.

If we are going to practice magic if we are going to unleash our will upon the world around us, we need to be pretty sure we know what we are doing, if indeed, such a thing is possible. Just as we are subject to the energy levels around us, so is what we do subject to our own levels of consciousness. We are manifesting our own energies, and if these energies are not clear, then our products will not be clear either. This is the reason for the "moral" tone of this whole article. When a great deal of power is exerted, all the aspects of the magician (or politician, etc). are multiplied, both the good and the bad. In this case, mistakes can be a very serious thing.

Therefore, after all the previous considerations have been met, we break through to the "top" of the third chakra, and come at last to what I consider the most important and the most rewarding side of power--that of "spiritual power"-the power of higher consciousness; of spirits, Gods, and cosmic entities.

As I said earlier, we cannot do much with our power if it is squandered on little things. Exerting power can be such an intoxicating and exhilarating experience that few of us pass up the chance when it comes by. But equally gratifying, can be the experience of remaining calm and grounded, doing nothing until the energy builds naturally. The next time the chance comes, we may be able to do more with less effort. This is analogous to not spending your money as soon as it comes in, but saving it for something really worthwhile that may cost a little more, or saving so that you are not flat broke after the purchase has been made. We have all experienced this depletion after an especially trying magical working.

Effort is a key here--if something takes a great deal of effort, it may not be in line with the greater, flow of things. It will also drain your own energy.

Meditation is, among other things, an energy consolidator. Calming yourself and calming your mind will conserve your energy and increase its potency when being spent. Often, if something can be completely planned out in the mind ahead of time, a great deal of energy can be saved when it comes time for manifestation. Often, if one thinks about it a little it may not need to be done at all, or perhaps a better idea will come along.

Kundalini is a spiritual power released by opening the chakras. It rises from the base of the spine and move upward (sometimes). It connects and transforms the various planes of energy as it moves through the body, and is often experienced as a burning sensation. (Kunda means seat, and lini means fire.) This burning is really a purification process, preparing the body for receiving the intense experience of higher consciousness.

Kundalini comes from an unbroken connection between all the chakras. This connection, is, I feel, the essence of power itself--the bridge between matter and consciousness.

The chakras are basically consciousness centers, each reflecting consciousness of a particular sort. Therefore, the greatest tool for increasing power is to bring about an increase in consciousness, in awareness, an increase in knowledge, strength, grounding ability, and efficiency in our actions. And likewise, a decrease of unnecessary defenses and resistance.

If we postulate that we, as human beings carry a positive ionic charge, (and it is said that we do,) then we, too, must be light enough to overcome our own inertia and mutually repelling forces. Only in this way can we undergo a fusion reaction--whether it be with a group, an experience, a job, our environment, or simply the moment at hand. If we carry too much of our own energy with us, we lessen our chances to fuse, to synergies, and to really receive from a situation. If we bring too little, we may not have enough force to fuse. A balance is indeed, necessary.

This fusion experience, and the "power" it produces is the basic essence of love, and brings us to the fourth chakra. I believe that as we learn to drop defenses (or drop our egos,) we open and fuse with greater and greater structures. We approach a more cosmically oriented reality, gaining greater and greater understanding and grandeur. This lack of defenses may not create that awesome and fear inspiring type of power exhibited by those who remain cold, detached, and manipulative, but is instead a greater, more stable and more spiritual power, having beneficial effects on ourselves and our culture as a whole.

Children's Page

Dear Friends

This is a plea to other Pagan parents in the area. I desperately need some input on religious instruction for children. My nine year old daughter is showing a great curiosity about religion and I am stumped. There are no clear, easily read books or stories dealing with Pagan beliefs, and as yet we don't have the equivalent of a Pagan "Sunday school" where their questions can be dealt with, and basic instruction given. I feel sure that other parents in the various craft groups have faced this situation, and I would love to know what people have come up with in response. My daughter is already encountering harassment from the other children at her school about her non-Christianity, and I have tried to give her reassurance and direction on how to handle taunts and such. Any input from anyone on this subject would be gratefully received and acknowledged. If I could put something together all by myself, I would, but I do not have the energy or expertise to do it all myself.

BLESSED BE!

Linda Von Braskat-Crowe P.O. Box 4326 Berkeley, CA 94704

This letter isn't the first communication Pentalpha has received about the lack of organized activities for children of Pagan families. It's very distressing to contemplate the fact that our children, growing up with access to Pagan ways, (which our generation had to find for itself) haven't been given enough opportunity to learn the Old Religion's teachings. We think that a children's page in the magazine is necessary and we hope that some of our readers (young and old) can send in ideas to help us.

This time we have an interview with Cari Von Braskat, daughter of the woman in the letter above. She is nine years old and a very forceful Aries woman. I wanted to get an idea of how she actually feels about being in a Pagan family. I was amazed to learn about the criticism she gets at school, and also that she hasn't had much of a sense of belonging to something special. I'd like to connect her with other young Pagans and talk about what we could all do together. Maybe this interview will inspire some of this discussion:

Cari's name is Cerridwen--her mother named her after the Goddess.

CARI: She is a Viking Goddess of the Bonn. I believe in Her.

SALLY: Well, what do you believe about Her? Do you talk to Her?

CARI: Yeah, on special holidays, and sometimes during my ordinary life, when I need to talk to somebody.

SALLY: Do you ever have dreams about her?

CARI: Yes, She's the same as I described before. She just sort of appears from a mist. A white mist, like the rays of the moon.

SALLY: Do you feel like she's your Mother?

CARI: Yes, sometimes. I think I dream about Her about once a week. If I have a problem, I dream about Her and She helps me think of a solution to the problem.

SALLY: How do you feel about growing up in a Pagan family?

CARI: I think it's a dream sometimes. Sometimes things are very strange, because the other kids ask me if I believe in Jesus, and God, and I say I don't and they tease me. They tell me I'm going to Hell. They say bad luck's going to come to me, like someday I'm gonna get killed.

SALLY: So what do you say?

CARI: I tell them it's my problem. I tell them if I die I'll be able to see what I believe before they do. I don't believe in Hell, people made that up so that people who don't believe in God will get scared and believe in God. People can do what they want, as far as I'm concerned, but they should let me alone to believe what I want to believe and not hassle me about it.

SALLY: What kinds of Pagan things does your family do that you like to do?

CARI: I like going to Bardic Revels and singing with people. And to Druid services with my Mom in the liars and I enjoy it, and sometimes I give flowers and leaves to the Goddess.

SALLY: Would you like to get together with a group of kids and do your own services?

CARI: Yeah. I would like to do different kinds of services. Or just have a party and celebrate and sing and dance. I could learn how to do spells, maybe, if someone would teach me.

SALLY: Do you think you will be a Pagan when you grow up?

CARI: I don't know. I might change my religion. I can't tell yet, because I'm not there yet. It's fun being a Pagan sometimes, but I get a hassle from people about it.

Parents could really help by writing down a list of things their children can learn. If you have a particular deity you're close with, present it to your child as a friend, an ally, a helper.

Maybe the old church notion of patron saints is one that could be adapted—saints have always been disguises for the real Gods anyway. Make the deity personal—let your child have a real relationship with Her.

Help your child set up a simple altar. Choose a cloth, some candles, maybe a statue or picture (he or she could draw one, too) and put flowers or a cup of water on it. Teach the child to interact with his/her personal divinity, and to notice ways in which this divinity manifests (dreams, flashes of inspiration, help in trouble, etc). I personally am not against letting children experiment with simple spells; healing, protection, and defense. A child NEEDS a sense of personal power just as much as she needs to learn to respect other people and their feelings. Letting Saint George slay all your dragons for you is a great imposition on him—better his devotee should learn to wield her own flaming sword. My advice to Cari in the case of her schoolmates' prejudice would be to let them know that the Goddess has ways of teaching folks to respect the religious freedom we have in this country. I also said it might be good for her to spend more time with other children who share her beliefs and are interested in the Old Ways.

Children are natural Magicians, living in a world full of magic, extending all the way from fairies, to imaginary playmates, to the Bogie Man. It is only as we "grow up" that we are told that magic doesn't exist, and to put away our fantasies and devote ourselves to the "real world." If a parent does nothing but preserve and encourage their child's natural sense of awe and wonder about the universe, then they have done that child a great favor by nurturing the most important tool a magician can have.

O Danny Boy

O Danny Boy if words could o'er recall you
To walk again 'neath Pagan Irish skies
Then would I sing, 'til voice be taken from me
And light and life be faded from my eyes.

Too long, too long, your blood's been wasted flowing
To water seeds of wars that have no name
Where brothers die for quarrels past recalling
Nor caring aught for Ireland's agony and shame.

So turn again, the silver Stag is running
With blooded eye in groves beneath the moon
The songs of old still whisper through the oak trees
Where ancient breezes pipe our long-forgotten tunes.

O. Danny Boy, if words could o'er recall you to walk again 'neath Pagan Irish skies
Then would I sing, 'til voice be taken from me
And light, and life itself be faded from my eyes.

The Lair of Great Cthulhu

(Tune: Chattanooga Choo-Choo)

Pardon me'boy-- Is this the lair of Great Cthulhu? In the city of slime, Where it is night all the time.

Bob Hope never went Along the road to Great Cthulhu, And Tripple-A has no maps And all the Cho-Chos lay traps.

You'll see an ancient sunken city where the angles are wrong.
You'll see the fourth dimension if you're there very long

Come to the conventicle.
Bring along your pentacle;
Otherwise you'll be dragged off by a tentacle.

A mountain's in the middle, with a house on the peak:
'A gnashin' and a thrashin' and a clackin' of beak.

Your soul you will be lackin' '
When you see that mighty kraken.

Oo-oo! Great Cthulhu's starting to speak.
So come on aboard,
Along the road to Great Cthulhu.

Wen-di'-gos and Dhols will make Big Macs of our souls.

Under the sea, ~
Down in the ancient city of Rilyeh,
In the lair of Great Cthulhu,
They'll suck your soul away!

(Great Cthulhu, Great Cthulu, Suck your soul! Great Cthulhu, Great Cthulhu) In the lair of Great Cthulhu, They'll suck your soul away.

HUNTRESS

A huntress is She.

In virginal white She fares the pale of night

With carnivore intent: All innocent
Of praise or blame or any virtue bearing mortal name or measurable dimension....

A moonlit mist-wrapp't rose is She, or so appears to be, Who Flowering, reveals some wild and iridescent thing that waits in coiled repose and quite conceals: Intention.

—She'd seem to yield—a White Queen's gambit leading surely to checkmate.

—And lo! springs forth some fool or hero glad to seize upon such bait

He's lost! His heart

'twill cost him, for:

She feasts upon such things

And mayhap, "Pass the Salt" She sweetly sings to one of Her exalted company the whiles She dabs Her dainty lips with samite spun of spider-silk

She's of that ilk at very least that things the world a toy or shake they sky

But it's Her special Joy, to Take whatever beast may catch Her Eye:

Her taut bow bent like crescent moon,

Swift arrows, then the boon, She grants, with glee A huntress is She.

Winter

By Deborah Frankel Bender

Then you come before the old woman. Who is the true head of your coven. Blindfold, hands bound, naked, (It is lawful for me to tell you this, since You know it already) And she says to you "Please me."

Women have a better chance of getting through it.

We've had more practice

Coping with unreasonable demands,

Our resources always inadequate.

Men get bad habits

Dealing from strength:

They tend to stick at the first step

("Define the problem")

Few come out of that room with their own bodies on them.

You come before the old woman Who is the true head of your coven. Blindfold, hands bound, naked. She is waiting for you. Small talk, charm, and habits will not help you with her. She has seen it all. She knows more than you do. She is easily bored.

You must come before the old woman

Stripped naked,

And she says to you,

"You're back. What did you bring me?"

What will you offer her? Clean hands? A pure heart? Hers are not. She is not. She is an old woman. She has seen everything done everything, endured everything. She is responsible for everything.

Then your least fear Is knowledge Of the whip by her hand.

Witch, what was your training? Embrace everything. Use everything. Cherish everything. Fear nothing.

So you come before the old woman and dance before her Made to improvise. Hobbled by the rope. Tough to keep your balance. Naturally she laughs. At you wobbling and whistling.
She laughs, reminded of the juggler she loved once. She sends you out again.

Goddess Gift

The bodies entwined appear as one,
 For this, indeed they are,
 The song of love escapes their lips,
 Is carried near and far

On the wings of ecstasy,
 They rise and they do soar,
 This feeling it wit never end
 For love will e'er endure.

Two bodies—God and Goddess are United perfectly.
 Their joy exposed, so openly,
 For all the world to see.

Their feelings are eternal

The same they'll always be,
 From dawn of time to man's demise
 United—Perfectly.

The fire of Life flows through their veins
 Their voices rise and fall,
 Their ecstasy—adrift of Love
 From she who created all.

Winter's Ending

-Jeffrey Andrew Young

Come the goat-man, man of Springtime,
Savior of the Winter's ending.
Come from mountains, come and enter
This, the sad, stiff human figure,
For his mind is numbed with Winter,
Lain neglected since rememb'ring,
And his hands are stiffened branches,
Frozen bones that have no feeling.
Strike the fire deep within him,
Fire to melt this icy thinking.
Passion sings within him somewhere,
Laughter lies awake, awaiting
Some necessity inside him:
To awaken him from slumber.
Now the dead man's mind grows restless,
Fingers yearn for warmer flesh,
Rememb'ring souls that once had touched him,
Breathing bodies he was near to.
Goat-man draw him ever onward
Through the slush of dying Winter
Where his memories await him
In Spring's gentle restlessness.

Lament of the Witch

-Morning Glory- Ohoyo Cjsh Chishba

I may not go to the festival...
All this month I have sewn costumes.
Gathered nuts and baked cakes.
I have strung beads and berries for the children to wear.
All this my people have taken from me
And they have said: "It is good."
I have borne children, I have woven mats
'I have carved masks, I have washed clothing,

All this my tribe has taken from me and they have said: "It is good."

But when the sea change comes, my body begins to flow. My woman spirit to gather power and force.
Large drops of blood drip slowly and then gush forth.

My magick is strongest, my feelings are deepest; my knowledge is surest..
Now, more than ever I am
A woman of power.
All this my tribe has refused--and they have said: "It is bad."
And when I touched my genitals to give myself pleasure..
When I made images to call the spirits..
When I refused the husband chosen for me..
And every, every moon when my body know its bloody power..
All this my tribe has refused me -

My shadow pollutes, the rainbow serpent is angered, my lover shuns me,
I am cursed, diseased, reviled. Men retch at my scent;
avoidably footprints.

Banished from my home, forbidden the festivities..
I remember the medicine
The man's words to me at my puberty ritual: "You must be as Mother Earth..
Humble and fruitful.
You must not touch any holy thing or a man's possessions.
You are dangerous to yourself and to the tribe;.. to bleed is to be sick..
you must be set apart for your moon and give thanks to God that He has spared you life when you cease to bleed."
Hog.
So spoke the wise man.

Old fool! I AM like Mother Earth, she who bleeds and does not die.
Only for men in blood linked with sickness and death.
I am a woman...
my blood

The sacred tools...our foremothers made them.
Once the houses were ours...we built them.
Once the rituals were ours...we wrote them.
Once the moon hut was for our own seclusion...we sought it for privacy.
Now, the tools are forbidden the houses belong to our fathers the rituals are led by men the moon hut is our prison and our bodies are the source of our shame.
What has happened? Why did things change? How has this come to be?
-Long ago-
The old men say: Women were punished for their pollution...for their bleeding. They angered the Gods."
-Long ago- The old women say: "Men became jealous of our power, and they stole everything."

We shared our bread, our fires, our homes, our tools, our magick, our knowledge, our bodies... We shared.--

They had only one thing we did not give them; one skill we did not teach them. They had the use of weapons... and they did no share that. They turned it against us.

The old women say: "Let us kneel down in the mud, crawling along!

We leave it for them, for our Brothers,

We leave the world for them for they want it that way."

I will not sing this song, looking out through the window of the moon hut and hearing the songs and laughter of my people.

I will not sing this song.

I mark my cheeks with my

Dark Blood.

I will sing a song to the Goddess... who is stronger than the weapons of Men.

I will sing a song to my sisters who are wiser than the lies of Men.

I will sing a song to my daughter who will bear the future of Men.

My song is a song about power, about loving, about sharing,
about changing

I will sing about the future I will weave a web of fate

I will sow a seed of doubt I will tell a tale of tomorrow.

I mark my forehead with my

Dark Blood...

...and I wait.

MONEY MAGIC

By Poisson Volant

"Why is it," a friend asked during a conversation the other day, "that so many Neopagans are lousy at money magic? We find things work with all sorts of other kinds of magical intentions, but the material resources seem to be the one area where efforts fizzle the most."

It's puzzling to me, because by some fluke money magic is the one area in which I've had my most reliable results. I could make a long list of many other sorts of Magic I've tried that have bombed miserably! I don't do money magic often, and "haven't grown rich on it by any stretch of the imagination; but when I've set about invoking forces to aid my material circumstances in times of needs, help has come in the most curious ways.

My purpose here, then will be to share some of my techniques in the hopes they can be useful to Neopagans interested in improving skills in areas such as this. Most (if not all) of these ideas could also be applied to other sorts of magical workings. Many of the ideas are not particularly new, while others are updated versions of older concepts. Nevertheless, perhaps they can be grist for your mill.

Basic Mind-Set

It's always been my experience that if a magician holds unconscious attitudes opposed to a ritual's intention, conducting the ritual may not only fail but could also aggravate the underlying attitude-complex. It's like the story of a person who feels desperate need for having a romantic relationship. The person is unlikely to find happiness in this respect until he or she has gone through a long series of disappointments, ego losses and painful self-insights. What's often found to be the underlying problem is a terrific need for self-esteem.

Money, too, evokes emotional responses in our unconscious. For many people in culture at large, money and spending serve as a kind of self-esteem barometer (witness the ostentatious consumerism of young professionals who flaunt expensive cars and other objects as badges of self-worth). Then there is the opposing mindset of the counterculture, which rebels against the abuses of money by declaring (or silently feeling) that money itself is wrong in some way.

How many times have progressives and revolutionaries damned money for its seemingly intrinsic tendency to corrupt human values? How many have considered it a noble martyrdom to suffer pains of a financially austere lifestyle while holding to a greater moral principle?

To me personally, at any rate, money's natural function is simply to serve as a medium of exchange for goods and services. Either to worship or to curse it--or to admire or resent those who are skilled at getting it--seems to point to an underlying, unresolved issue of self-esteem that will probably interfere with efforts to function easily in an economic environment.

Philosophizing about the concept of money could go on and on. I'll cut it short and get to some of the more practical ways of dealing with unconscious attitudes we hold.

Dig a Little Deeper

The first and foremost step in putting together a successful ritual for obtaining money is to look into your unconsciously values. Of course, readers of pop paperbacks on "Secret Keys to Money, Wealth, and Power" and the like may find they achieve success without any self-probing at all. They happen to click into a belief-system of success and are able to deal with their

I'll tell my feelings very simply. The ideas which will I follow here, however, are intended for those whose feelings are maybe somewhat more complex, more ambivalent; who need to do a little belief-system housecleaning in order to achieve the intentions they choose.

What kind of values have you held about money? How affluent was your home life as a child? What kind of attitudes did your parents hold? Did you rebel against your parent's attitudes when you came of age? What kind of financial state have you lived in during your adult life? How do you feel about yourself when you don't have money to achieve some goal you have? How do you feel about others when you're in a situation like that? In general, how do you feel about those who are more affluent than you are? How do you feel about people who are poorer? When you think about money in broad terms, does it seem to be in large part a tool of exploitation between social classes? What are the feelings of your peers, the people you're close to and care about the most, and how have their attitudes affected you?

All of these questions represent fertile ground for self-probing. For what, money magic is successful when the magician has achieved a state of mind in which money is pretty much a neutral concept--something that is wanted/needed, but something that doesn't evoke strong feelings in and of itself.

Many magical theorists have said that it doesn't matter what you feel or are during your regular life, as long as you can create the necessary emotional mood during a magical operation. I've found, though, that emotions on subjects like money, self-esteem, and relationships can be very powerful even if they are hidden at a level of the unconscious with which you're normally not much in touch. If these issues aren't dealt with in the context of your whole life, you may find that trying to conjure up cash is an unsuccessful effort to deny the stronger voice of your unconscious feeling.

Invoke Everything

Another maxim of magic is that good old expression, "Invoke often." The idea is more or less identical to the method used in New Thought churches and self-help primers: Whatever belief you summon often enough will become true for you. And you're supposed to clear your mind of feelings that conflict with the intended goal.

But what if your unconscious feelings in opposition to the intention are so strong that they won't go away? When it has happened to me I've found a "war of sentiments" set up with a voice repeating "is" and some inner voice "not!" within me--my external says such-and-such, meanwhile is saying "No, you're not."

Whenever we encounter that kind of inner voice, we have to judge whether it's a valuable warning of one's true will or whether it's the voice of self doubt. If it's the latter, it deserves to be cleared away.

The self-probing mentioned above is a worthwhile way of doing that. I'd like to suggest another practical technique sort of an addendum to the magical maxim: namely, Invoke everything.

Or, to put it another way: Don't clear your mind of feelings that conflict with your magical intention. Rather, invoke them fully, get them out in full view, then let the energy leave your consciousness (preferably by grounding them in some fashion so they don't interfere with the things you really want to do).

Here's a sample exercise which you might find useful. Each evening for several days, set aside some time (maybe a half-hour or so) to invoke each of the following sets of imagery. Allot one setting per evening so that your unconscious doesn't get confused by changing gears too fast. Use all of your imaginative powers to make the setting as real as possible: flesh each out with concrete details you feel would be appropriate. When you've created the setting in your mind powerfully, examine all of the feelings about the setting that flow out into recognizable form: Happiness? Sadness? Anger? Guilt?

The Settings:

1. You are an inheritor of old money. You have always been in an environment of comfort and ease. When you came of age the duty you assumed was to carry on your family's great tradition. Your chief challenges are in trying to respond to society's changing demands on your social class while trying to maintain the lifestyle you grew up in.

2. You are the ultimate minority. You grow up in squalor and never had any chance to better yourself. Your life amounts to being dumped on left and right. Pure survival is the main challenge in your life.

3. You came from a wealthy background and became used to a life of ease, but then you suddenly went broke. Now your main challenge is to readjust to a new lifestyle that seems to be only a very dim counterpart of the way you once lived.

4. You came from a modest background, worked your way up until you now head a prosperous firm in private industry. "Making it" financially has been your great ambition, and now you cannot understand the voices in the society that want to take it all away from you.

5. You came from a background of _____ (insert your own roots here) and now you are in a situation of _____ (describe your current life). The kind of role money has played in your life is _____ (describe,) and your feelings toward money are _____ (describe).

As should be obvious, all these settings are intended to expose you to the varying ways that people experience and react to money in their lives. You can gain important clues about your feelings by noting how easy it is to visualize each setting; if you can't seem to make one setting fully real and absolutely authentic, it probably represents feelings about money that you cannot at the moment acknowledge. If any of the settings provoke powerful emotions, you probably have feelings about money that need to be resolved.

The exercises themselves, in fact, are a useful way to resolve feelings. Whenever you encounter something notable while visualizing the settings, resolve to keep working with that setting over a period of time until its emotional energy-hold on you is diffused.

Each visualization session should be closed with whatever method you prefer to ground evoked energies. For example, you might try a statement something like, "I do this exercise for the purpose of exploring myself and expanding my capabilities to experience life richly. I now direct these energies to the earth, where they may permutate and serve the Gods and Goddesses and their holy children."

TNT Blasting

Sometimes overriding emotional contents of the unconscious will have such a strong hold on you that visualization methods don't seem to help you make much progress. For example, I'm a fairly impressionable person; quite often I find that I have such a strong attachment that I can't seem to clear my mind to do any worthwhile visualization work.

Various people deal with this in different ways. Many Neopagans find that some time outdoors, perhaps with exercises exchanging energy with the earth, is invigorating mentally, emotionally, and physically.

I have a different kind of technique I've been experimenting with. Many people use tape recordings to create sound imagery directed toward their magical intentions, and they listen to the tapes while in a reverie state. What I've been doing, however, is to make tapes specifically intended to be disorienting--multiple tracks of all kinds of sounds, conflicting static at events, sometimes jarring noises. The idea here is to use a "power-blast" approach to clearing away mental/emotional rubble; it doesn't particularly work on deep-seated issues, but it can be useful when I get temporarily pent-up.

I would not recommend this approach if you are feeling fragile or unstable, and probably a great many Neopagans will simply choose not to use it as a matter of personal taste. (The method, incidentally, is a take-off on the kind of conditioning used by the character Hagbard Celine in the Illuminatus! trilogy by Robert J. Shea and Robert Anton Wilson, when Celine was endeavoring to turn a mortal woman into the Goddess Eris.)

And On to the Ritual!

Used in one combination or another, these techniques should help you get in touch with all of your feelings about money and prepare the way for your ritual operation.

As a matter of fact, I don't particularly have any one custom-tailored ritual to offer here. Each of us responds to certain kinds of settings and imagery, and each of us uses certain kinds of rituals for varying intentions. In accordance with money's relationships to things of the material world, I would suggest you try ritual types you would use in operations related to the earth, growing plants, and so on.

Actually, what I use for obtaining new rituals is Burning by Raymond Buckland. It was one of the first books I picked up several years ago when I first got into magic; I tried the money ritual, and it worked. I use the "Pagan" rather than "Christian" wordings--Buckland provides both--and I make two additions: (1) I affirm that the money will not come through any other person's hardship or loss: (2) I visualize the receipt of the money in concrete images as it would naturally appear to me--in my case, an inked-in entry in my account register.)

A Few Afterthoughts

How does magical money come to us? I suppose any way it chooses to. In my case, when I did that first ritual several years ago, I unexpectedly got a check in the mail paying off a childhood life-insurance account that I never knew had been taken out on me. Other times, long-lost friends have suddenly paid off debts from the distant past that I'd forgotten about. Sometimes, the money takes the form of people asking for services for which they pay me.

But at least in my experience, the money doesn't come out of nowhere. Perhaps indeed you will win a sweepstakes, or befriend a bum who turns out to be a generous millionaire, or find a thousand-dollar bill on the street. As money magic has worked for me, though, it never brings material goods which are utterly unearned. I wouldn't think it realistic to expect money magic to guarantee you ongoing prosperity for no effort, or to support you simply because you are a wonderful person or are doing worthwhile deeds.

In the final analysis, money magic seems to work two ways: Emergency rituals can help you out of a bind, and longer range prosperity workings can get you into a new space in order to realize more financial return on your efforts. But you will still have to make efforts; money is merely the symbol of give-and-take, and you would not remain balanced for long with a deficit energy expended by you.

And that means--perish the thought...

Work!

About Beltane and Lughnasadh

Beltane is one of the four Celtic Fire Festivals that mark the time between Solstices and Equinox and relate to the inner feminine, intuitive, yin side of our souls. Its symbol is a blossom. It is a day of blossoms and spring fever, of open hearts and merry trysts, of dance and raucous song, of mirth and mystery, of lechery and love.

Beltane, among the matriarchal, lunar festivals, stresses the importance of male-female interaction, mother nature's need for fertilization, the earth's need for female and male energy. As part of our celebration, we invite the coming of Pan and dance around a Maypole. We drink to Pan, the great god of nature, (so systematically belittled and bedeviled in recent centuries,) the scary instinctual goat-god in us, who plays such haunting, beautifully spiritual music on his pipes.

A very large number of important mythological events are connected with this day. It was on a Beltane that Partholan and his followers, the first inhabitants and partial creators of Ireland, landed on that isle. Three hundred years later, on the same day, they returned to the Other World. It was on a Beltane that the Tuatha De Danann and their people invaded Ireland. It was on a May Eve that Pryderi, the missing son of Rhiannon and Pwyll (Rulers of the Welsh Otherworld,) was lost by them and later (on another May Eve) found by Teimyon Twryf Vliant (and eventually restored to Them). On every first day of May "till the day of doom," Gwyn Ap Nudd fights with Gwyrthur Ap Freidawl, for the hand of Lludd's (Lugh's) fair daughter, Dreudylad. Most of these events, again, as all over Europe, have to do with stories of the forces of light defeating the forces of darkness. Why did you think the Marxists chose May Day as their international Holy Day? And can you guess why Adam Weishaupt chose Walpurgstag (another name for Beltane) as the day to announce the founding of the Bavarian Illuminati, and why that was the date at which the forces of evil later tried to Immanetize the Eschaton?

The Summer Solstice is a Minor High Day, usually occurring around June 21st or so. Also known as St. John's Day and Midsummer (and, confusingly enough, among some groups as Beltane!), it shares mythical elements with both Beltane and Lughnasadh (the midpoint between Summer Solstice and Fall Equinox). Like both, it is a feast celebrating the glory of summer and the peak of the Sun God's power. But in many systems of belief, it is the day of the biggest battle of the year between the Dark Sun God, and the Light Sun God (or between the evil one and the good one,) who are usually brothers or otherwise intimately related. Midsummer is a peak from which the Sun can only fall, for it is the day on which the hours of light slowly begin to shorten.

News of the Groves

Berkeley Grove

The Berkeley Grove is beginning to get back into the swing after Summer absences. Grove elections were held on Oct. 12. ArchDruid is Joan Carruth. Larry Press agreed to assist the AD as needed. Preceptor is Chris Sherbak, who will deal with most Grove business. Leslie Craig is assisting the Preceptor as telephone contact person. If there is any doubt about locations and times of Services, she should be contacted, and not the AD. The Server is Steve Goldstone.

We have a number of projects in mind for the coming year. Two of these have already begun. A Protogrove Service has been written and printed and it and a page of information on how to start a Protogrove, etc. are available to anyone who wants one. Contact either Joan or Chris.

Also, since the Druid Chronicles are out of print, and most people either do not want or cannot afford the entire set, we have printed up a Mini-chronicles which is available from Chris or Joan for $2.50. It contains the two page introduction, the standard Summer Service, the two protogrove sheets the Customs, the Book of Meditations, a page of calendrical info, some Bards, And Isaac's flyer, which can be removed and reprinted.

News of the Orders

Oberon (Bardic) -- There will be a meeting of the Nordic Order on Tuesday, Nov. 15th, at 8 PM at the home of Patriarch Linda von Brasket 863 E.28th St., Oakland. Her home is very near the Park Boulevard exit off the MacArthur Freeway. Call her at 839-1628 if you aren't sure how to get there. The meeting will discuss the fate of the Bards over the coming winter, and it is important that as many interested people as possible show up.

Dian Cecht (Healers) -- We will once again get into the saddle and hold meetings these are open to people interested in healing, of whatever group or rank. You should, however, contact the Matriarch, Joan Carruth. at 525-0498 if you would like to come to the meetings, which are on the Sunday night closest to the waxing Quarter: Dec. 14, Jan. 18, and Feb. 15. They will be held at the Center for Non-traditional Religions, (Greenwalls,) Fulton and Prince, in Berkeley, and Will begin at 7 PM SHARP. We will be permitted to use the hot tub if everybody follows the house rules: bring your own towel, and absolutely no messing with the machinery. They cannot have the tub hotter than it is set, for very good reasons! Anyone who cannot follow the rules we'll be denied the use of the tub for the whole group FOREVER. We will do healings. Everybody is encouraged to bring a photo and/or personal possession of someone who needs healing, and has given permission for us to work on then. We will work on two or three such healings at each meeting.

Angus (Children's) (proposed) -- contact Ron Genzoli at toad Hall, 581-0962, if you are interested in forming such a group. We will be locking, into Release Time for Pagan Children.

Lugh (Craftspeople) -- We will be trying to find out the status of this Order, so it can be reactivated. Stay tuned. If you're interested in being part of this Order, contact Chris Sherbak, at 921-2630.

News of the Groves

Berkeley Grove

Steve Goldstone has had to resign his post as Server, due to his work with Stephan's school. We will hold re-elections for Server at Spring Equinox Services.

We have heard little from our two Protogroves, except that they're doing well. Both members of the Massachusetts Protogrove are expected here in Berkeley for Beltane, and they may, after that, become a full Grove. The 2nd Order in the Mass. Protogrove is the sister of the Berkeley AD, so her candidacy for Third will be scrutinized VERY CAREFULLY (hear that, Phyl?) The Chico Protogrove is also meeting regularly, and may also become a full Grove this year.

The Berkeley Grove is also hosting the Berkeley Area Interfaith Council monthly meeting for March and we hope most of our Druids will attend. The date is Thurs. Mar 26, at Starr King School on the Conte, at noon NORMAL PEOPLE TIMES. Bring a bag lunch, we will provide drinks, and bring a robe other than black, if you have one. Your AD is now a member of the AIC Executive Committee--a big move for her and for all Pagans. Please come and give her immoral supports

Cyndie Sallee left the Grove at midsummer last year, investing Denis Merrill as AD. The Group is alive and well, but limited to ESC students and evidently not looking for new members.

Greenwood Grove

This is Cyndie's new Grove. They are meeting for full moons and High Days, and average about 15 people per meeting. They are also teaching some classes for some of their members and their Bardic circle is thinking about cutting an album. Contact Junkie at 745 North 2nd, Seattle, Wash, 98103.

News of the Orders

Bardic -- There will be two Bardic Revels/Beltane practice at Leslie's new place, on April 18th and May 3. All Bards should attend both, and the entire Grove should attend the second. We may have a much larger attendance this year, and we should make it as slick as we can. Matriarch Linda von Basket will be Ordaining Bards after Beltane. If you are interested in joining you should contact her two weeks in advance, and have your best work ready for her at that time.

Dian Cecht -- Our meetings have averaged four people, but we've been getting some Mood work done, with positive results. Our next meetings will be on Mar 15, Apr. 12, and May 10. Those are Sundays, at 6 PM. We hope to hold them at Centre (Greenwalls), but arrangements are not final, so contact Joan, at 525-0498 to be sure. We will also accept people for Ordination after Beltane. Non-members, however, are welcome to attend, if they have healing interests and skills.

Stanislavski for Magicians -- Larry Press will hold these meetings at 2 PM, Sunday Mar. 29th, and Apr. 26th. Contact him at 658-2610 for location, although he also hopes to be able to use the facilities at Centre. The Magick really does work better when dramatic techniques of choreography and emotional involvement are used. Remember the rules at Greenwalls, too: bring your own towel, a small donation, if you can, and enjoy the hot tub as it is.

Wildflower ID Class

Begins Sat Feb. 28th. Call (415) 886-5917, and ask for Anna. The classes will be held mostly in the form of walks in the wild and botanical gardens, and will emphasize family characteristics, medicinal & other uses, mythology, and ecology. Held through the Institute for Celtic Studies.

Lost Druids

Does anyone have current addresses for: Lawrence Gold, Wis. Pat O'Neil, CA. Michael Bradley, Illinois.

NRDNA Druids

Several people have asked about various Druid things, like the Higher Orders. As you know, because of the rules of the old RDNA, these are impossible to restart, and other changes also impossible. HOWEVER, we can do these things in NRDNA, for our own Branch only. But we have, really, to start from the old RDNA rules, which means a majority of all 3rds in the Branch. Sooooo. We need the addresses of all 3rd Orders who are or would like to consider themselves NRDNA. Our first action should probably be to simplify voting rules. If you are an NRDNA 3rd please send your address to Chris Sherbak, 2345 Post St., SF, CA, 94115. Also the names' and addresses, if you can, of every other NRDNA 3rd you can think of, by Midsummer.

Mail news to Chris by Spring Equinox, for Beltane Issue. Thank you.

A Chant for the Spring Equinox

AD: O give praise to the Dark Gods who love:
Praise to the Hunter, stalking and slaying,
Praise to the Hag, weeping and raging.
G: Praise Be'al, who is all gods, praise the Earth Mother's many faces.

AD: Praise for food-store and tight roof, good wool and good health.
G: Praise for hearth and tale and friend.

AD: Praise for grey skies and healing rain, cutting wind and bedding snow.
G: Praise for the mystery of the Land of Shadow.

AD: The Earth went bare, the sunlight dimmed,
G: Light had turned to Dark.

AD: The nights were long, the winds were cold,
G: Darkness ruled over all.

AD: But within the cave, the bear cub waxed;
G: Darkness yearns to Light.

AD: Bough is barren, bud returns:
G: Balanced now are we.

AD: Belenos returns from the South:
G: Balanced now are we.

AD: The Mother stirs and wakes again:
G: Balanced now are we.

AD: Snowdrifts of blossom on earth and tree,
G: Dark will turn to Eight.

AD: The world will be lush, the days will be long,
G: Eight will rule over all.
AD: Til the sweet fruits of the boughs are warm in our hands.
And Light yearns again to Dark.

AD: O Belanos, O Lord of light, we praise thee at thy return to our midst. Welcome art thou amongst us.
ALL: BLESS US AND LIGHT OUR WAY, O MIGHTY SUN GOD!

AD: O Earth Mother, beauteous and strong, rise up and let us rejoice in thy sights
ALL: PRAISE TO THE LADY WHO GIVEST LIFE!

The Beltane Chant

(From DC(E))

PR: The Mother wakes from her long sleep and smiles on us today!

Chorus: SHE IS AWAKE!

PR: She brings us Life!

Chorus: SHE IS AWAKE!

PR: She brings us Light!

Chorus: SHE IS AWAKE!

PR: The Mother wakes and seeks Be'al.

Chorus: QUICKLY BE'AL RETURNS.

PR: We light our fires to show the way.

(The fires of Be'al, the bonfire, are now lit by the plunging of a torch into the kindling.)

Chorus: QUICKLY BE'AL RETURNS!

PR: To couch with the Mother and bring forth Life.

Chorus: QUICKLY BE'AL RETURNS!

(This next section should be chanted at an accelerating pace:)

PR: O Be'al

Chorus: WE WELCOME THEE!

PR: O our Mother

Chorus: WE WELCOME THEE!

PR: O Earth-Mother, O Be'al

Chorus: WE WELCOME THEE!!

PR: O Be'al, O Mother, parents of all that lives, we welcome Ye back to our midst. Give us of Your Life, O Most High, that we may share Your joy.

Chorus: WELCOME ARE YE, AMONG US, O MOST HIGH.
SMILE ON US, WHO HAVE KEPT YOUR WAYS,
THROUGH THE TIME OF SLEEP.

News of the Groves

Berkeley Grove

Does anybody remember for sure how many Beltanes-in-the-Rose-Gardens this is? Is it the sixth? Getting to be a Tradition. This year, Post Prop 13, its an expensive one: $40 for the Rose Garden, and $10 for the fireplace. Please come and have a good time, bring munchies for the Picnic, but if you can, bring money. Our fliers have also been going fast, and will need reprinting. I hate to say it so baldly, but if Grove members would each pledge even $5/month we wouldn't be in such a fix. We were designed to be a Poor Religion and O Gods willing, we'll remain so, but it'd be nice if the poverty were genteel.

We have a THIRD Protogrove! Our contact is named Greg Schill, and he's in Butlers Pennsylvania. Be expect to lose the Chico Protogrove: happily since they plan on becoming a full Grove.

News of the Orders

Dian Cecht

Be on time to meet at Centre (Greenwalls,) but you'd best call Joan at 525-0498 to be sure. We will meet at 7 PM, on Sunday nights, May 10 June 7 and July 12. Bring an artifact from a willing victims er... patients when you come, and your own towel if you wish to use the hot tub afterwards. We prefer to limit these meetings to members of the Orders and those with an active interest in psychic and magickal healing, I don't mean to be exclusionary, I'd like lots of people to show up and I'd like them to be magickally competent and willing to work.

News of the Orders

Order of Dian Cecht (Healers)

They will meet at Centre (Greewall's) at 7p on Sundays Sept. 6 and Oct. 4. Bring your own towel to use the hot tub, and $2, if you can. Bring a link to a person who needs healing, and has given permission. The Matriarch is also anxious to hear from 3rds in other groves who would like to become members of ODC. Ordination can be arranged with your AD.

Order of Oberon (Bards)

They will meet at 8 PM on Saturdays Aug. 22 and Oct. 17. Location to be announced. Contact Leslie at 652 6040. These meetings are obligatory for bards and optional for others. There may be additional Bardic Practices. Leslie would also like to hear from Bards in other Groves. Write Chris.

IMPORTANT NEWS!

AD's and 3rds Especially Note!

We plan to restart the Higher Orders (4-10,) Berkeley Grove and as many other groves as wish to participate. Groves should get a consensus (at least 2/3) of their 3rds on whether they wish to be part and inform Chris by Autumn Equinox!!! Berkeley really doesn't want all the M/Patriarchs, so send suggestions for 3rds in your grove who you think would be good M/Ps or members of any order, especially 4-7. Matriarch of ODC will probably become M of Grannos.

These orders will be for the purpose of inciting further inquiry among 3rds, and are granted for achievement, not tenure. They have no further "rights" outside themselves, and are not prerequisite in structure (i.e., you need not be 4th to be 5th) Council of N Order elects M/P of N+1 order. Any 3rd or higher may nominate a member, M/P of order confirms. Ordinations may be done with the M/P's approval, by any member of the Order, or candidates AD so if the M/P is in Olympia, people in Santa Cruz can still join the order) M/P s may resign. If selection is not approved by 2/3 of that order, council of next lower order elects new M/P. Here are my proposals. See what you think. "Est" means "established"

4 -- Grannos--healers (est) green ribbon (est) ODC will fold.

5 -- Braciaca-altered states of consciousness-yellow maniple (est) parties?

6 -- Belenos-astrologers, scientist, teachers- yellow ribbon (est)

7 -- Sirona-earth activists, outdoors people, gardeners, etc.- blue ribbon with wave (est)

8 --Taranis-warriors, armed and unarmed- orange ribbon

9 -- Llyr-Philosophers, thinkers, mystics, etc.- grey ribbon

10 -- Danu-Emeritus order for significant long-term service to the Earth Mother and RDNA. Nomination and selection to order by M/Ps of Order 4-9, by 2/3 consensus. M/P of 10th order confirms- brown ribbon.

Special Orders -- Must be 2nd order or above (except, of course the kids)

Oberon -- Bards (est) Blue ribbon (est)- working order

Merddyn -- Magicians (est) staff or wand (est) proposed (no leader)

Lugh -- Craftspeople (est) purple ribbon (est) may or may not exist. There's no reason I can think of not to "restart" it anyway, and maybe the original matriarch will resurface.

Angus -- Children's (est) pink sash- to puberty rites. Proposed. No leader.

On our Autumn Equinox, Matriarch of ODC should be confirmed by 2/3 of 3rd. Of participating Groves as M of Grannos. Council of Grannos will be created by re-ordination of members or ODC. Grannos council will then select m/p of Braciaca from all available 3rd candidates, present or by mail.

Please send info to Chris by Equinox. Let's do it!

Grove Elections

Grove Elections were held Sept. 20, 19 y.r. The results were:

Isaac Bonewits, ArchDruid
Joan Carruth, Preceptor
Emmon Bodfish, Server
Leslie Craig, Chief Bard

Isaac has returned to RDNA after his long sabbatical with many revolutionary ideas. Most of the Berkeley Grove wish to encourage these experiments. Some few people, however, adamantly prefer the traditional RDNA format, and chose to begin a second Grove, which will probably be called the Live Oak Grove. We have agreed to permit cross-membership, but felt no one should be an officer in more than one Grove. AD Joan, Emmon, and Leslie resigned their posts in the Berkeley Grove. No new Preceptor or Server has been elected at this point, but Jody, will be the Chief Bard for Berkeley,

Berkeley Grove

Furthermore, Berkeley Grove will be known as the Mother Grove after Samhain. They will hold services on the weekends closest to the waxing & waning quarter moons, at an indoor location. Contact Berkeley Rent-a-Lox, 549-0541 ext. 1347 and leave your phone number, and Mother Grove's Underground Agent will contact you.

Samhain Services for the Mother Grove will be held Nov. 6, at 8 PM, at 1500 Park Ave (Emeryville, below San Pablo). Call Rent-a-Lox for details.

Berkeley Grove started the Coalition Council, and Mother Grove has agreed to remain a member at least for this Quarter.

Grove Reports

Once upon a times Groves submitted an Annual Report to Carleton's Grove. This served such useful functions as recording the names of new Third Order Druids, and Officers of the Groves' and indicating which Groves were active. Since Carleton Grove no longer exists, old AD Joan would like to suggest that Groves publish such info in the Samhain Edition of the Druid Chronicler, in the hope that this info will survive. Each Grove should file this edition, and keep it, in just such hope. Eventually, archives of our early years and struggles may be important, or maybe not.

What follows is the Berkeley Grove Report:

Elected for 20 Y.R. see above Finances
In: $401.00
Out: $278.00

Live Oak Grove

We plan to hold Services rain or shine at Emmon's, in Orinda. Call Emmon at 254-1387 for directions or to connect with rides. We will meet at noon, to put some work into our Grove site. People should bring gloves and hand tools (clippers, hatchet, shovel, etc). Services will begin at 1 PM. If it is raining, the meeting will be held indoors and consist of a combination of Meditation & Hair Pull comparable only to a Quaker Meeting. We are open to anyone interested in the traditional formats and Philosophy of Reformed Druidism. We are also in desperate need of Good & Welfare. Our Officers for 20 y.r. are: AD: Joan Carruth, P: Leslie Craig, S: Emmon Bodfish. Dates of Services are: Samhain: Nov. 6-7, Nov. 22, Dec. 13, 20(Yule)~ 27. Jan. 11, 25, Feb. 8 (Oimele).

Chico Grove

Since Tiki's wife, Janie, is at UOSD for Master's studies, and no one in Chico was qualified yet to become a Third Order, Chico Grove exists only in the Summer, when Tiki & Janie are there. However, Tiki has the requisite three interested in San Diego, and has started another Grove, which he assures us will soon have a name classier then "San Diego."

Green Wood Grove

Cyndie reports that her Grove is busy. They have 15-20 people at their services, and biweekly study groups. They have also put together a 40 page Book of Bards, which may become available as soon as copyrights have been worked out. Their Bards seem to lack only a Pagan-Rock drummer in order to cut an album. They are also evidently in the process of hiving off a new Grove somewhere in South California. She reports that EVERGREEN GROVE is still active under Denis Merrill, but that he may soon move to Cal, and we hope, Ordain a new Third to be Evergreen's AD.

News of the Orders

Oberon (Bardic)

Leslie will hold Bardic Revels on Nov. 21, Dec. 12 and Jan. 23, at 8 PM at her house. Contact her at 652-6040 for directions or rides. She is EXTREMELY desirous of having people in other Groves join Oberon. Each Bardic Circle would be independent, but the contact and sharing between all Druidic Bard's would benefit all. Write to her c/o Emmon Bodfish 616 Miner Red Orinda CA 94563. Send a piece of your work (song' poem, etc,) if you can, and the name & address of your ArchDruid, who will no doubt be authorized to Ordain you, if everyone's agreeable. I, for instance, have been authorized to tell you that she's dying to hear from the Greenwood Bards, especially

Dian Cecht (Healers)/ Grannos (4th)-

Since it seems the Coalition will get off the ground, and Dian Cecht was only started because its first Matriarch found Grannos unavailable, ODC has been declared defunct for the interim, and its Matriarch has been made Matriarch of Grannos by acclamation of the Coalition. The Order is interested in defining itself, and will hold Potluck suppers and discussion from 6-10 PM, Sun nights Nov. 15, Dec. 6, and Jan. 17, for members and interested Thirds only, at her house. Call Joan at 525-0498 for more details. Like Oberon, Grannos is EXTREMELY interested in hearing from other Healers who wish to join the Order; from among the Coalition. You must be Third Order, and interested actively in healing, either magickal or psychic or medical or psychological. Write to the Matriarch, Joan Carruth, 8259 Terrace Dr. El Cerrito, CA, 94530. Your AD can be authorized to ordain you, so be sure to send me their name & address, too. We are essentially people in our communities, and I would like only to see us in touch with each other.

Braciaca & Belenos

These Orders were not started before Samhain. I would like to make every effort to contact their original Patriarchs. and invite them to do it again. If this is impossible, the Coalition will no doubt start them within its structure. Look for them around Beltane~ and, if you are a Coalition member, and interested in them, contact the Coalition Clearinghouses. Braciaca will Probably be Party-throwers and experts in altered states of consciousness. Belanos will be sun-worshippers, scientists, and astrologers, or something like that.

Coalition Council of Dalon Ap Landu

Members of the coalition: Mother Grove, Live Oak Grove, Greenwood Grove, San Diego Grove

Rules Passed (precis)

- 1) Votes before the CoCoDAL will be voted on by those who respond to the Clearinghouse Grove within 90 days of postmark.
- 2) Groves join in Summer by 2/3 vote of their Thirds; Groves may resign in Winter by the same process.
- 3) Matriarchs/Patriarchs (M/Ps) may resign. There is a Process for their replacement.
- 4) New members can be Ordained by their ArchDruid, or another member of the Order, by permission of the M/P
- 5) A person may be a member of more than one Order, but not M/P of more than one.
- 6) Resignation of M/P of N Order should be reported to the M/P of N-1 Order, whether or not they are immediately replaced.

7) Children under puberty shall not hold higher than 1st Order; no one under 18 shall be Ordained Third.

Other Business Passed:

A) Joan Carruth shall be the Matriarch of Grannos.

Live Oak Grove volunteered to be Clearinghouse for 20 y.r. Any Third Order member of the Coalition may originate a vote by sending a copy of the vote to all member Groves or Solitaries. and to the Preceptor of the Clearinghouse Grove.

Responses should be sent to the Clearinghouse, who will count them and resort the results in the next Chronicler. The address is Emmon Bodfish, 616 Miner Rd Orinda, CA, 945630 (oops should be Leslie, but its 2 AM already)

Rulings of the CoCoDAL are binding only to members of the Coalition. These rules are meant in no way to inhibit the autonomy of any member Grove or Solitary Third, but to facilitate the functioning of the Reformed Druid movement, and make the Higher Orders available once more. Each Third Order Coalition member has one vote in the CoCoDAL, whether solitary or a member of a Grove, though Grove Thirds should vote through their Preceptor or AD, so Emmon will not get confused as to who's voted. If he gets the responses from all; the Thirds in a member Grove at once, it'll simplify his counting

Other News

Please note the two new pages to add to your Book of the Bards courtesy of Emmon Bodfish.

Live Oak Grove has available copies of the complete Druid Chronicles (Evolved), for $25, postpaid. We especially encourage all Seconds and Thirds to own a copy of this invaluable Druidic text. We also have a 40-page excerpt from the Chronicles that we are calling the Mini-Chronicles, which you may obtain for a mere $7. It contains the Chronicles of the Reform, Bards, the Great Druish books, liturgy etc. Please send check or MO to AD Joan Carruth, 8259 Terrace Dr., El Cerrito, CA, 94530.

Please note that the Druid Chronicler is going into new hands, and we are not sure how broad they will wish to make their mailing list. If you are not a Third Order Solitary, an ArchDruid, a Matriarch or Patriarch, a ProtoGrove contact person, or an active member of the Mother or live Oak Groves, this MAY be the last copy of the Chronicler you will receive. Getting subscriptions is a hassle, and if the Chronicler continues to be sent out free, we may need to clear the rolldex a little. Stay tuned.

Groves and orders; Deadline for Oimeic chronicler is the end of the first week in January. Send new to Isaac Bonewits, box 9398 Berkeley CA 94709

THE NEXT DRUID REFORM:

New Voices, New Views in the NRDNA

If you've ever seen a copy of the Druid Chronicler before, you've probably noticed that we've had something of a face lift. If you've never seen DC before in your life, welcome to our newsletter!

This changed format is in keeping with some sweeping changes that are taking place in the Mother Grove (formerly the "Berkeley Grove") of the New Reformed Druids of North America (NRDNA).

You may have read about the Reformed Druids and the New Reformed Druids in Margot Adler's Drawing Down the Moon.^{*} (Adler, Margot, Drawing Down the Moon. New York; Viking Press; 1979. In the 1st Edition (hardcover.) we're on pages 300-304). If so, we have some surprises for you.

First, a little history:

Isaac Bonewits left the Mother Grove in 1979 because he was moving to Santa Cruz. When he went, he appointed Joan Carruth and Stephen Abbott Mac Caulley to be co-Archdruids in his place. Shortly after he left on his sabbatical, Joan and Stephen changed the name to the "Berkeley Groves."

The next year saw Stephen drop out of the Berkeley Grove, and that was the end of co-Archdruidship as an experiment--at least in that incarnation. Joan ran for re-election uncontested, and spent the last of 18 y.r. and all of 19 y.r. as Archdruid of the Grove.

In the two years since Isaac left, the ritual and structure of the Grove went relatively unmolested. But then Isaac showed back up, and all the rules changed. He ran for the office of Archdruid, warning everybody in advance that he planned to make some broad changes in the Grove.

Even if it can't be said that the Gods spoke, there was an omen of sorts. Isaac won. In doing so though, he alienated a large portion of the existing Berkeley Grove. They thought that the changes were taking Druidism too far away from what its founders at Carleton College had intended it to be. That idea made them uncomfortable, so after much thought and discussion, they decided to form a new Grove. They asked Joan to be their Archdruid, and she accepted.

Thus there are now two Groves in Berkeley: the Live Oak Grove, which still uses the traditional forms of the ritual, and the Mother Grove, which is developing a new philosophy of Druidism for the 1980s.

Sweeping Changes and a New Philosophy

The very first thing Isaac did was to reinstate the co-Archdruid system. The second was to do away with the traditional Orders of the NRDNA. Therefore, what we have now is a system of Circles (First Circle, Second Circle, et al.) with an Archdruid and Archdruidess as theological head of the group.

(We admit that "Archdruid" and "Archdruidess" are unwieldy terms. Until we come up with something better and more descriptive, however, we have to use what we already have.)

The new system shows several advantages over the old:

First, we have been able to put a sense of balance back into Druidism. We try not to favor male over female, Goddess over God, or any of the myriad other imbalances to which the Craft and other forms of Neopaganism have been subject--but it happens when you don't have a balanced pair to head your services. It can happen anyway, but the chances are better that we will catch it before it does. This makes for a more effective balance of magical energy in the ritual, as well as psychological and political energy in daily Grove affairs.

Second, the Circles act as a mutual-support system. We will not offer someone an "Order" or a "Degree"; instead, we will invest them as part of a Circle. The Circle is a group of members all at about the same stage of development in Druidism. They aid each other to learn their craft, and they assist in teaching those less advanced than themselves. Thus, everyone shares the responsibility for learning and for teaching their companions.

From the Archdruid

The ancient Druids are said to have built their solar-lunar calendar around a 19-year cycle (that is, 235 lunar months). Samhain this year ends the first 19 years of the Reform begun at Carleton College, and begins a fresh cycle. Samhain also begins the season of Geimreadh (winter,) a traditional time of reforming and resurrection.

This winter bodes fair to continue those traditions in the grand old style. Last September 20th I was (re-)elected Archdruid of what was then called the Berkeley Grove. I ran for the office on a "Revolution ticket," warning the Grove's members that I would make sweeping changes, especially in the areas of liturgy, organizational structure, and training. I said it was time for the Reformed Druids to begin the work necessary to create a complete religion, to grow beyond the loose framework that is the sum of its current liturgy.

I painted out that, little as we know of the ancient Druids, we do know that they were the brahmanic caste of the Celtic/Germanic/Slavic peoples (though they were called by different names in different times and places). They were the artists, musicians, poets, healers, judges, historians, diviners, magicians, clergy--the cognoscenti of their societies. Any neopagan group with the audacity to call itself Druidic should have, above all, a commitment to excellence and a willingness to be everything that the name implies.

These ideals are far beyond the pale of what the Founders of the Reformed Druid movement wanted in the early 1960s. Their image of a Druid was that of an anarchistic philosopher, a sort of Zen Unitarian. And most of them had no intention of starting a "real" religion; they had no idea that the Gods they were invoking happened to be very much alive.

The Old Gods are alive--although I will grant that they're a little sleepy. After all, it's been a long time. But what the folks at Carleton College built was not meant to last, to grow, to spread. That Reformed Druidism is still around 19 years later is a testimony to the power of the Gods and of the Druidic archetype. And given this archetype, these Gods and the power inherent in the concept of Druidism, we have the basis for a healthy, growing religion, a religion that works.

I have always thought that there was more to Druidism (Reformed or otherwise) than was dreamt of in the philosophies of those at Carleton College. It's out there somewhere, and through diligent hard work, we can find it. We will find it!

Do I hear the Old Gods stirring in their sleep?

Everyone advances through the Circles according to their knowledge, ability and commitment. We are still developing the Circles system and the criteria for admission and advancement, but a few things have become clear based on what we are trying to do:

There will be set criteria for advancement, and everyone no matter who they may be, elsewhere will follow the same criteria.

Various rituals will be structured to the level of their participants.

Everyone will be required to show mastery of the knowledge in one circle before being advanced to the next.

This has allowed us to get back to the OLD idea of what a "Druid" was. He or she was a priest, a bard, a magician, a healer; he/she was of the cognoscenti. Not everyone was cut out to be one, nor did everyone qualify in the Gods' sight.

If you were proper Druid's material, you could demonstrate that fact. Nobody questioned your right to wear that robe because you had been challenged long before you were ever given it. We are trying to return to that method and that standard.

Connections with the Old Order

Does this mean that we have cut all ties with the old NRDNA structure? After all, we're talking about making people work for what they want, then rewarding them for what they produce! The old New Reformed Druids offered everybody the same things, and it was open to the public--in fact, they even held their rituals in public parks.

We haven't cut all our old ties; just most of them. For instance, we will not instantly invest someone into the third Circle just because they are a Third Order Druid in some other Grove. In view of what we're trying to do with our Druidism, there is no way we can do that without compromising our objectives.

We will, however, keep our lines of communication open to other Groves and other groups of Druids. We want to hear what they are doing, and we want to tell them about ourselves.

We will allow public participation in some of our rituals. (Emphasis on the "some.") There will most assuredly be rituals that are open only to members who have been admitted to the First Circle or higher, and rituals closed to lower Circles. It depends what we're trying to accomplish with any given ritual.

Why close some rituals? What do we have to hide? Nothing. Druidism will continue to be as it ever was. But we will hold closed rituals.

This is not because we hold any secrets; rather, it's because we want our rituals and services to work. When we look for an omen, we want an unmistakable omen. We are going to help our rituals work by requiring everybody who participates to be familiar with our methods.

For these reasons, of course, we cannot participate in the old Council [or its successor, the "Coalition Council"] (CoCoDAL)] of Dalon ap Landu. We do not recognize their authority to govern our activities because their aims are not ours. How can the Mormon Elders guide a Roman Catholic congregation? Their ideals are too dissimilar.

Isaac spent some time during Samhain this year addressing that subject. In an open letter which he (perhaps unfortunately) finally decided not to mail, he said:

"We will not participate in the original Council (or the current "Co-Council") of Dalon ap Landu--the original governing body of the R.D.N.A., composed of all the priests and priestesses--unless it is made abundantly clear that we do not recognize their authority to make any decisions regarding our activities, structure, 'orthodoxy,' etc. We will participate to the extent of sharing ideas and information with other Reformed Druid groups.

"As for the 'Higher Orders,' the Mother Grove will not help reorganize, nor will we recognize the revival of the old R.D.N.A. Higher Orders or the more recent N.R.D.N.A. Special Orders.

"We're not going to be in any hurry to start any new ones either, save for revamping the Bards inside our own Grove. Members of the Mother Grove may start Special Interest Groups, or participate in the Higher & Special Orders already existing in other Groves, but such SIGs or Orders will have no official status for now."

What Are We Trying to Accomplish?

If we are throwing out so much of the old system, what will we replace it with? Exactly what are our goals?

At the bottom line, they're simple enough. We want to establish a true relationship with the Gods. We think that this is best done through a combination of ritual, magic, music, dance, poetry, and theatre. The Gods love a good show!

And to make this the best show possible, we are going to stress personal development and personal achievement within the Mother Grove. We want dedication, and we think that the rewards--personal, spiritual, even perhaps physical--to be had from that dedication are more than worth the effort.

In addition, we want to see a balanced energy raised in our rituals. Too many Neopagan groups in the past have had a bias (however well-intentioned or even unconscious) toward either the male or the female in their workings. For this reason, we strongly emphasize the value of working with a partner of the opposite sex for balance and completeness.

From the Archdruidess

My name is Sally Eaton. Bonewits is my legal last name, but I prefer to use Eaton. My own identity is very important to me, for all the usual reasons.

I've been involved with NRDNA since 1979. I've been a practicing Witch since my early teens and involved heavily in magic all my life. I was attracted to Druidism because of my Celtic ancestry and because of the emphasis on music; among other things, I'm a singer and songwriter.

During 13 y.r. [1979-80], I was Server to what was then the Berkeley Grove. At that time we had two Archdruids, a woman and a man. I liked this idea very much; the precisely equal division of leadership between male and female is my ideal.

I thoroughly agreed with the basic ideas of Druidism, but as time went on I found myself dissatisfied with certain aspects of the services. We were meeting in public parks so newcomers could join freely, and I felt like I was working in a fishbowl.

More, the services reminded me most of liberal Christianity--they didn't feel Pagan to me.

I'm not a Duotheist, I'm a Polytheist. I work with particular Goddesses and Gods, not just the Great Mother and Father. I wondered why we didn't bring back the real deities of our Celtic forebears. I thought it was our job as Druids to do this.

When I tried to tell people this, though, I found myself bucking a rigid "tradition" that dated all the way back to 1963. I made suggestions, and was told, that isn't the way we do things."

I was frustrated. I could make few creative contributions.

The Carleton College Druids never thought in terms of starting a "great" religion. Anarchy was their byword. They had no training system for the clergy, even though the very word Druid is most often taken to mean "High Priests."

The ancient Druids often took twenty years to complete training in the arts of healing, divination, music, priest craft. I myself have devoted my life to magic. Why should I want a part-time religion?

Folks in NRDNA who wish to continue the Carleton style of worship are welcome to do so, but there are those of us who felt it was our Karma to find a Druid way both older and deeper. I want to see the ancient way restored to its full power and splendor. I want to know the Gods of my ancestors, to come face to face with them on their own terms. I want to know their music, their language, their teachings, and their love. It may take more than our individual lifetimes, but I know it can be done.

First Stops on the Road

We have already taken the first steps on that road. Sally Eaton, Isaac's wife--herself a respected professional actor and singer, playwright, ceremonial magician and priestess--has agreed to join him as Archdruidess of the Grove. Together they have begun to sculpt the rituals that will be used in later workings of the Mother Grove.

We are using Geimreadh (winter) this year to write, revise and test our new rituals. We will work the major problems out of them so that they can be used as the new Order of Common Worship come Oimele. Jody Veahman, a Celtic Traditional musician and singer, will work with Isaac and Sally (as will I and a number of other Bay Area writers, philosophers, magicians and what-have-you) to make the material strong and effective. When spring comes, we'll see how well we have succeeded in our aims.

From the Editor:

That just about finishes the propagandizing, except for one detail. Like a good short story, a good article should hook its end, ouroboros-like, back on its beginning. And since I brought you into this with a tag about DC's face-lift, I'll wrap up by telling you about it.

The Mother Grove has no official Preceptor. They may never have one; Isaac and Sally are not sure one is really necessary in proper ritual. But as far as anyone is unofficially holding down the job, I'm it.

My name is Elton Wildermuth, and I am (you should pardon the expression) the Druid Chronicler. I have next to nothing to recommend myself except my big mouth and effervescent personality, plus maybe the ability to write a simple declarative sentence in English. You will, however, be hearing a lot from me in days to come. The new DC is my baby, I edit it, I print it, I have the final say over what does and does not go into it. [It's hard to argue with the editor!] Blame it all on me.

Hell, I probably deserve it.

Tell me what you think of my baby! I can be reached by mail as follows:

The Druid Chronicler
c/o Elton Wildermuth
2124 Kittredge Street, No. 31
Berkeley, CA 94704

This is not the Mother Grove's usual mailing address, but it is where all mail for DC should be sent. I'll say more about that in the following section, which contains the actual hard news of the Grove.

Having said my piece, then, it's time for the news.

Druid News:

What's Happening in the NRDNA News from Groves & Orders

This is the first issue of DC under new management, so there is precious little true news of other Groves to print. Send me your news! Send me your Grove meeting schedules! Tell me all about what you're doing, so I can tell other people! Get it down in print--let people know what you're doing and when it's happening.

I did place a pair of judicious telephone calls in an attempt to fill out my report of current events. First I called Leslie Craig-Harger, who is current Matriarch of the Order of Oberon (the old NRDNA Bardic order).

Then I called Joan Carruth, the Archdruid of the Live Oak Grove in Orinda. Joan has (besides being Archdruid of her own Grove) decided to revive the old Council of Dalon ap Landu---calling it the "Coalition Council" of DAL--and the Order of Grannos (Healers,) with herself as Matriarch of the latter. (She may have more ideas in the offing; those are the only two she mentioned.)

Such news as I had from them and from Sally and Isaac follows.

Mother Grove

The big news concerning Mother Grove is Isaac's return as Archdruid and the Grove's subsequent changes in direction and focus. Among those changes are the reinstitution of co-Archdruidship' with Sally Eaton as Archdruidess, and the restructuring of Mother Grove's hierarchy. All of that is presented in the lead article for this issue.

Mother Grove will be holding Common Worship even while they are establishing the final form of their new rituals. Thus the ritual will evolve from meeting to meeting. Mother Grove's schedule of Common Worship is:

December 20 8.00 PM(Yule)
January 3 2.00 PM
January 17 2.00 PM
January 31 2.00 PM (Oimele)

Grove meetings regularly begin at 2.00 PM. December 20 will be an evening service because it is the Yule and Winter Solstice ritual. Ending times will vary; any number of things may happen after the service itself. However, services will begin sharp at the indicated time. Late arrivals may find the doors closed.

Mother Grove's services will be held indoors at 5286 Riverside Avenue in San Pablo. (This too may pass.) To get there, proceed as follows:

These meetings will include a potluck meal; we might as well socialism, since many of us don't see each other between services! Bring whatever you're drinking plus some to pass around, and food that you like — again, enough to share.

NGTC: Those with unusual dietary restrictions (e.g. vegetarians, diabetics, Mormons) will pretty much have to fend for themselves, since we don't know in advance who will bring what. This doesn't mean we don't like you; we simply don't have the facilities ourselves to cater to specific requirements.

In addition to the potluck, Mother Grove will be holding music and dance workshops, theology hairpulls, and anything else they can think of to liven up our afternoons after the rituals.

Live Oak Grove (LOG)

Joan Carruth, the Archdruid of the new Live Oak Grove, says that LOG is open to "anyone interested in traditional Reformed Druidism as set out in the Druid Chronicles (Evolved)." She also wanted to make sure I announced that LOG has prepared a 40-page excerpt from the Chronicles, which they call the "Mini-Chronicles." It is available for $7.00 postpaid from Live Oak Grove; checks should be made payable to Joan Carruth.

Live Oak Grove will be holding rituals "rain or shine" at 616 Miner Road, in Orinda. Their schedule of meetings is:

December 13

December 20 (Yule)

December 27

January 10

January 24

February 7 (Oimele)

All meetings will begin at 1.00 p.m.

NOTE: The January-February meeting dates are not the dates which Joan reported in the last issue of the Druid Chronicler. Looking at my 1982 calendar, however, I believe these new dates are accurate. Call Joan at (415) 525-0498 to confirm.

I have no map available for Live Oak Grove. Call Emmon Bodfish at (415) 254-1387 for directions.

During the Season of Sleep, Joan says that LCG plans to:

- Plant eight sacred trees
- Build an altar on which they can build fires
- Build a wood of five stakes over which the sun will rise on high days.

Joan says that if it is clear, people attending their rituals should bring gardening gloves and be prepared to spend time working on the grove site.

News of the CoCoDAL

Live Oak Grove's official mailing address is: Live Oak Grove c/o Emmon Bodfish 616 Miner Road Orinda, CA 94563

Joan has revived the old Council of Dalon ap Landu, calling it the "Coalition Council" of Dalon ap Landu (CoCoDAL). This council represents the Carleton Traditionalists, and claims to comprise all Groves and free Third Order Druids who have not officially resigned. Speaking on behalf of CoCoDAL, Joan informed me that:

1. No Groves have resigned from CoCoDAL. [This is not exactly true; Mother Grove is not officially participating in CoCoDAL, but has not yet tendered its resignation. —Elton]

2. There is no new business before CoCoDAL at this time.

3. Live Oak Grove is acting as Clearinghouse Grove (ChG) for CoCoDAL during 20 y.r. (1981-82). They can be contacted through Live Oak Grove's mailing address, given above.

According to Joan, any member of the Coalition may bring business before CoCoDAL by a four-step process:

1. Write a formal petition and send it to the ChG.

2. The ChG will mail a copy of the proposal to each member Grove

3. CoCoDAL will wait 90 days from the date of mailing for a reply to each proposal.

4. After the waiting period, the ChG will tally the responses ye and nay, then announce both the proposal and the result of the vote.

When she originally spoke to me, Joan informed me that the results of each vote would be printed in the next issue of the Druid Chronicler. I unfortunately had to tell her that this is not necessarily so; please see my comments about news and the printing thereof on page 7. I will try, but schedule and space constraints may prevent me. If this happens, I assure that she will make other arrangements; she was not sure when we talked.

Order of Grannos

The Order of Grannos is an old NRDNA higher Order which Joan has recently revived. She is currently the Matriarch of that Order. The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) says it is a "Fourth Order," whose deity is Grannos (a Gaulish deity,) Patron of Healing Springs.

Concerning the Order of Grannos, Joan said: "We have three members who are nominally associated with Live Oak Grove. However, the Matriarch Joan is beginning to hear from Third Order in other Groves who are interested in joining the Order. We should have Grannos represented in several Groves by Beltane."

Any Third Order member of the RDNA interested in joining this Order should write a letter to Joan concerning his/her interest in healing — medical, magical, psychic, any combination; she welcomes all.

If you are interested in joining Grannos, write to Joan at: Joan E. Carruth 8259 Terrace Drive, El Cerrito, CA 94530

NOTE: This address will be good only through Oimele. After that, Joan can be contacted through Live Oak Grove at its mailing address.

Joan says she will be authorizing ordinations after Beltane. Members ordained may then start conclaves in their own Groves if they wish.

Joan expects to hear from all members several times per year. She says that this is not because she wants to tell anyone how to run their conclaves, but rather to share healers' lore and so she can publish news of the Order.

The Bay Area Healers' Conclave [Joan's conclave? She did not specify, but I assume it means the three people who are currently members of the Order] is "in hiatus until the Order has spread." After that Joan plans to authorize ordinations by mail and concentrate on running her own conclave.

Order of Oberon

The Order of Oberon is the old Bardic order of the NRDNA, and seems to be the only Order currently having an unbroken history. Leslie Craig-Harger is currently Matriarch of that Order, having taken over from Linda von Braskat in 19 y.r. I called her to find out what her Order was doing during the NRDNA Season of Sleep.

She says the Order is working on poetry and acting as well as music. This is intended to round out their talents and abilities as bards; being a bard covers far more ground than just being a singer and/or instrumentalist.

Her main news, though, did not concern the Order so much as what she is trying to do as Matriarch.

First, she is soliciting dedicatory works from Druidic bards. These works will go into the Matriarch's collection, and Leslie hopes eventually to print them. For more information, or to send her your work, write: Leslie Craig-Harger 1280 61st Street, Emeryville, CA 94608

In addition, she says that creative and archival works are also welcome. She will collect them, and use the ones that fit her needs in her bardic revels.

In addition, she is working on a method whereby Archdruids or other Third Order Druids can ordain bards into the Order of Oberon. This will save Leslie a lot of traveling, which is both wearying and expensive. I will try to publish the details in DC as soon as she finalizes them.

We spent a long time talking about the Mother Grove, and what connections Mother Grove does and does not recognize with the old NRDNA structure. As a result, two days later, Leslie provided me with a chaining note concerning Oberon:

Bardic Revels December 19, January 23, and February 27. Call Leslie for location. We are working on the poetic and dramatic aspects of the 'bardic arts' — beginning with the techniques of satire and lampoon. Lampoons can deal with whatever subject attending Bards choose, with attention to the transforming nature of satire. (Anyone who feels that humor is irrelevant to magic might want to check out Illuminatus, maybe?)

"PS: Order of Oberon does not intend to stick its nose into any Grove's liturgical business. Members of Mother Grove should feel free to attend without danger to their artistic or doctrinal autonomy."

Leslie tells me that due to space limitations, she is having to restrict attendance at her revels to her regular circle of bards (meaning those who already know or have access to her telephone number; she asked that I do not publish it). If this applies to you and you want to attend, call her for details.

The Druid Chronicler Subscription Information:

How to Get What's Coming to You

The Druid Chronicler has been sent out quarterly in the past. I have changed that schedule. I will be sending out issues of DC eight times a year — one for each of the four major and minor High Days. Each issue will be published approximately two or three weeks before the holiday, to allow time for the Post Office to deliver your copy.

However it may have worked in the past, the new DC will be offered by subscription only. Eight issues (one year) will cost $5.00. This includes all necessary postage and handling. ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS will expire with the Oimele issue (around February 1) each year. That makes my bookkeeping a lot easier.

Anyone who sends for their subscription in the middle of the year will be charged a pro-rated cost for the number of issues remaining until Oimele.

To subscribe to DC, send a check or money order payable to "MOTHER GROVE" to: The Druid Chronicler, c/o Elton Wildermuth, 2124 Kittredge Street, No. 31, Berkeley, CA 94704

All mail — new subscriptions, inquiries, love letters &c. — should be sent to that address.

What Do We Print?

The Druid Chronicler is the official newsletter of the NRDNA. As such, we do not promise to print "all the news that fits," but we do try to print at least synopses of all news and events of interest to members of the NRDNA.

We solicit any and all news concerning the various Druidic groups worldwide. We do not promise to print all of it, or in some cases even any of it, but we'll try, based on our schedule, needs, and priorities.

If you have news concerning upcoming events, please send it enough in advance (at least six weeks) that it will make it into the issue that appears before the event in question. Otherwise you aren't likely to get many DC subscribers at your Beltane party, nicht Bohr?

News intended for publication should be sent to the subscription/production address. See subscription information above, or the executive information box on page 2.

We do not solicit nor do we publish articles — yet. Who knows when that may change? But don't send us your work yet; we'll let you know when and if we can use it.

Bear in mind that anything and everything sent to the DC is subject to a) possible future publication and b) editing by Elton. Be sure you won't mind having the whole world reading about it before you write to me. And please don't expect to get back exactly what you write, word for word, no changes. Of the few guarantees I can make, that is the first: I will edit.

Letters to the Editor

Postage being what it is these days, anyone who wants a reply to their letter must submit a self-addressed, stamped envelope. Otherwise, you will have to take your chances about whether I got your letter or not.

Also, I will limit my answers to correspondence. The only questions I can answer are those which concern new subscriptions, old subscriptions, missing issues, Druidic news and other items that directly concern the Druid Chronicler.

And be advised, you may very well get a form letter instead of a personal note. Please don't be too disappointed.

I regret the necessity of drawing such a hard and fast line, but other constraints on my time (e.g. the unfortunate necessity of working for a living) makes it impossible for me to be a truly adequate correspondent.

Once again, if that changes any time in the future, I will happily let you know.

Announcement: Gaelic Classes

Jim Duran is currently teaching classes in modern Gaelic on Monday nights at 7:30. Several members of the Mother Grove are attending these classes; learning Gaelic has several obvious applications for those interested in studying and practicing Druidism. After we have mastered the modern forms, we intend to start work on ancient Gaelic.

We thought that others might also be interested in learning Gaelic, so Isaac approached Jim about holding another set of classes. Details are still rather tentative, but here is what we have:

If there is sufficient interest, Jim will begin a new series of Gaelic classes sometime after January 1. They will probably be held on either Monday or Thursday nights at his house. They can be either new beginners' classes or a continuation of the old series (both, if the interest runs high enough). The cost will be $4.00 per class night, payable to Jim. Call Jim at (415) 535-1086 for further details.

Special Notice for Previous Subscribers to Pentalpha Journal/the Old DC:

A lot of people subscribed to the original Druid Chronicler, and later to the Pentalpha Journal, which absorbed the Druid Chronicler whole. As all of those subscribers know only too well, both publications had a lot of problems with meeting their subscription commitments. Because of these problems, we are extending a special offer to everyone who had a subscription to either DC or the Pentalpha Journal which was not fulfilled.

The Berkeley Grove (under Joan Carruth) revived the old Druid Chronicler after a fashion, they did not offer it by subscription so far as I know, and did not fulfill old subscriptions. Distribution was limited mostly to local Groves and Grove members.

Sam Mayhew of Tintagel Printing & Publishing has said he will revive the old PJ in a new incarnation, and fulfill all the old subscriptions at their old rate (the new sub rate will be higher). I do not know whether or how well that will work. Therefore....

If you subscribed to either DC or PJ before, and if you never received all the issues you should have, you may choose to subscribe to either the revived PJ or DC. If you want PJ, Sam has said he will fill out your subscription. If you want DC, I will give you your first year's subscription to the new DC free.

We have lists of everyone to whom this offer applies, but to hold our costs down we want you to tell us if you're interested. To find out for sure if you're eligible, write to us and let us know. For PJ, write to: Tintagel Printing & Publishing P. O. Box 861, Lakeport, CA 95453 Attn: Sam Mayhew. If you would rather have DC, write to me at the address given above for DC subscriptions.

When you write, tell us which publication you were subscribing to and the address at which you were receiving (or not receiving) your subscription. Then, if your address has changed, tell us your new address. AND PLEASE GIVE US YOUR ZIP CODE--OLD AND NEW! Otherwise, our wonderfully efficient filing system will never cough up your name, and we can't verify your eligibility.

Oh, and one other thing. If your name has changed, be sure and let us know. We aren't going to send Terry Logan's subscription to Jenny Blake without some good evidence that they're the same person.

Make sure you keep on getting yours.. SUBSCRIBE!

Use the handy order form below to make sure that THE DRUID CHRONICLER keeps on coming your way. Just indicate how long you want to subscribe for, tell us where to send it, and enclose a check or money order payable to ISAAC BONEWITS to cover the cost stated on the form.

Important Notice:

WAIT!--Before you open your checkbook....

"Oops! Department": On page 7, I told you to make your checks or money orders payable to "Mother Grove." That was wrong--the bank says we have to fill a few more forms before they'll take checks with the Grove name on them. Ergo, until we get the Grove account straightened out, everything must be made payable to Isaac personally.

Were you subscribing to either the old Druid Chronicler or the Pentalpha Journal when they folded? Did you ever get your money's worth from your subscription? If the answer to the first question is YES, and the second is HELL, NO!, then read about our SPECIAL NOTICE on page 8 before you send us your money.

If you qualify for our free subscription offer and you check the box at the bottom of the form to let us know, yet; we'll contact you after we verify your eligibility.

And while you're at it, if want to take advantage of it, Then don't send us any money, tell a friend about DC!

YES, I want to keep informed on what the NRDNA is doing! Please enter my subscription to THE DRUID CHRONICLER for 1 year ($5.00) 2 years ($10.00).

NAME: ADDRESS: Street: State: ZIP:

I understand that my subscription will expire at Oimele (around February 1) each year, and I understand that if I subscribe in mid-year, you will pro-rate my subscription cost based on the number of issues remaining until Oimele, then refund the balance due me. I have enclosed a check or money order payable to ISAAC BONEWITS to cover the stated price of the subscription I want.

(Signature)

I was a previous subscriber to THE DRUID CHRONICLER or PENTALPHA JOURNAL, and my subscription was not filled. Please check your records to verify this, then enter my subscription to THE DRUID CHRONICLER based on your SPECIAL OFFER. If my address and/or name has changed, I have included my old address on the back of this form.

SEND THIS FORM TO: THE DRUID CHRONICLER, c/o Elton Wildermuth, 2124 Kittredge St. No. 31, Berkeley, CA 94704

End of Druid Chronicler Newsletter

As Mother Grove has notified us that they are discontinuing publication of the Druid Chronicler, Live Oak Grove will be putting together this short newsletter with dates of Reformed Druid Services, Holidays, parties, etc. News, energy, time and help will be very welcomed. How about a year's subscription to anyone who comes up with a better masthead?

News of the Groves

This month, Live Oak will be holding Oimelc Celebration on Sunday February 7, at 1:00 PM at the Grove Site at 616 Miner Road, Orinda. Regular R.D.N.A. Services will be at the Grove Site on February 21, March 7, and March 21 (Spring Equinox). All at 1:00 P.M.

Those people who do not have cars, or who do not want to try to find Miner Road, can take the BART to Orinda, and phone from the station for a ride: 254-1387. As the Grove Site is still very rustic, wear shoes that can withstand mud.

Live Oak Grove is building a stone altar and a wooden henge, sighted astronomically and on the rising of the sun on each of the High Days. If there is anyone who would like to be present at the raising of the next, the Spring Equinox, spar, they should be at the Grove Site, pre-dawn, on March 21. We are also planting a circle of Sacred Trees. Gardening help welcomed after each Service

We want to be in communication with the other Groves; and we also will be printing news of the Orders: Bardic, Grannos, and of CoCoDAL,

Druid Calendars for Sale

A group in England have published a large, pictorial Druid calendar for 1982. It is well done, and has pictures and lore on the old megalithic sites. It is available from Nature Company, in the planetarium in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco. We were the most startled to read that the person who assembled and edited this project, and who heads this overseas Druid group, is named Joan Carshon. Do we all have a doppelganger somewhere?

Druid Chronicles Available

There are still copies of the full, original Druid Chronicles available from our second printing. The cost is $25.00 plus postage. Contact Leslie, who is hole-punching and collating them, 652-6040. (Discounts for people who help out?) Or call Emmon, who is serving as Preceptor for L.O.G. while Leslie is busy. Leave a message on the machine: 254-1387.

We also have copies of the Mini-Chronicles for those of you that can't afford the full Chronicles yet. These are 35 pages, excerpted from the Chronicles for $7.00, post paid.

We also have located three of the original Georgian style Ruby glass chalices. Anyone interested in owning one contact Joan Carruth or leave a message for Emmon.

Emmon is continuing Scots Gaelic classes, and may soon know enough to teach. We are also continuing the project of holding up the Scot's end by translating the regular Services into Scottish Gàidhlig. Anyone who would like to help would be much appreciated. We'd like to publish a Scot's version of the Services as a companion piece to the Irish translations in the Urtext Section of the Chronicles. Scottish Gaelic classes are available through the Institute for Celtic Studies, P.O. Box 44, Oakland, CA 54604. Gaelic is NOT a dead language. Tha Gàidhlig beo!

Submissions

Anyone who has news, opinions, dissertations, etc. which they would like to see in print here, should send them to L.O.G., 616 Miner Road, Orinda Calif. 94563, by March 1, for the Spring Equinox issue. We will publish this newsletter a week before the eight High Days. Camera ready copy appreciated!

Some members of Live Oak Grove were talking of getting together after Service, warming up around a big indoor fire and discussing methods of divination, magical method and the Meaning of It All. Those interested, stay after Services.

"What did you expect? Life is a royal bitch."

If you'd like to be on our mailing list, (or put someone else on the mailing list,) send name and address, and a few 20 cent stamps to LOG, 616 Miner Road, Orinda CA 94563

A Druid Missal-Any Spring Equinox 1982 Volume 6 Number 2

News of the Groves

Oimele Celebration went well, although few people showed up. We found a place that sells fresh goat milk, for the Waters this year, and which turned out to be pretty good, i.e. not that different from cow's milk, and homogenized.

Two plants have spontaneously sprung up between the stones that mark our altar. Both of them are edible herbs. We can take this as a sign, each in his own way, or you can take a bite. One is an herb I've eaten under the name "pepper grass;" I don't know the Latin name. The other is Montia perfoliata, Miner's lettuce. There is also an unknown fuzzy-leafed herb something like a petunia, not bad to the taste, but not great either.

We have bought a White Birch, so we lack only two trees to complete the circle. We need a Mountain Ash, i.e. a Rowan tree. If anyone knows of a nursery or an individual who has sapling Rowans, please let us know. We have enough money now to pay retail.

E. Dwelly, a Scot's linguist and folklorist, collecting around the turn of this century, writes the following about Druids and Rowan trees.

"There sacred word was not the oak, as in Gaul, but the yew, the hawthorn, and especially the Rowan. Divination by watching smoke and flame, (there of), and chewing raw meat, in honor of Fionn's thumb, was one of their chief occupations. A blow from their wand caused transformation and spells."

Liturgy Additions

Larry Press proposed that we introduce several gradations of response, which we might get from the winds at the four quarters after the sacrifice is offered. Traditionally the Druid liturgy provides a binary system: The Mother sleeps, sacrifice is not accepted, and the Mother is awake, and the sacrifice is accepted. Larry suggests that the officiating Druid look among the following possible responses:

1. The Mother is asleep. (Proceed as per traditional liturgy.)
2. The Mother, though sleeping, hears, and will consider our prayers and petitions. The sacrifice is accepted.
3. The Mother stirs; She is beginning to awaken. She grants our pleas and the sacrifice is accepted. She disagrees with our petition and the sacrifice is therefore not accepted.
4. The Mother is awake. She grants our prayers and the sacrifice is accepted; She disagrees with our request and the sacrifice is not accepted.

Suggestions for other responses are welcome. Larry and I will be trying out this system, and keeping records of the outcome.

Calendar

Live Oak Grove

All services will be at 1:00 P.M., at the Grove Site at 616 Miner Road, Orinda. If you do not have a car, take BART to the Orinda station and phone us: 254-1387. We'll come and give you a ride.

Equinox, March 21st, April 11, April 25, (note Daylight Saving Time Change!); Beltaine, this will be the 7th ANNUAL BELTAINE IN THE ROSE GARDEN, Berkeley. 1:00 P.M. Druids should be there at 12:00 NOON sharp for set up. The Rose Garden is wheelchair accessible. There will be a picnic afterwards in Cordenesis Park, across the street from the Rose Garden. Bring food to share, if you can, but if you can't, come anyway.

Beltaine

By Emmon Bodfish

BELTAINE-1982 The celebration will be held on May 9th, out at the Grove Site at 616 Miner Road, Orinda. Services will begin sharp at 1:00 P.M. and Leslie, Matriarch of Bards, has planned a May Pole dance to follow. The food is pot-luck, so bring food to share, if you can. For more info, or for transportation questions, call 254-1387.

Astronomical Beltaine will occur on May 5, at 12:14 P.M. Emmon will be setting the Beltaine caber in the Grove's wood-henge at dawn on May 6. Hardy souls are invited to come and help align it with sunrise over the Grove altar. Dawn is being held at 6:08 A.M. Daylight Savings time.

THOSE of us who are immune have de-poison-oaked the path up to the Grove site.

THE LIVE OAK GROVE building project is near completion. The circle of the eight sacred trees is complete except for the Beltaine rose, which we will plant May 3rd. The footing of the altar is set, and we hope to get the fire pit of local stone built before Beltaine Celebration. Also, surprise, there is now running water up at the Site. This should make work, and picnicking, a lot easier.

E. DWELLY has this to say about old Highland Beltaine, in Gaelic, Bealltuinn.

"On the first of May was held a great Druidical festival in favour of the god Belus. On this day, fires were kindled on the mountain tops for the purposes of sacrifice; and between these fires the cattle were driven to preserve them from contagion till next Mayday. On this day it was usual to extinguish all hearth fires, in order that they should be re-kindled from this purifying flame. In many parts of the Highlands, the young folks of the district used to meet on the moors on the first of May. They cut a table in the green sod, of a round figure, by cutting a trench in the ground of sufficient circumference to hold the whole company. They then kneaded a cake of oatmeal, kindled a fire and toasted the oatmeal cake in the embers. When a feast of eggs and custards had been eaten, they divided the cake into as many portions as there were persons in the company, as much alike as to size and shape as possible. They daubed one of the pieces with charcoal until it was black all over, and they then put all of them into a bonnet all together, and each person, blindfolded, drew out a portion. The bonnet holder was entitled to the last bit. Whoever drew the black bit was the devoted person who was to be sacrificed to Baal, whose favor they meant to implore in rendering the year productive. The devoted person was compelled to leap three times over the flames."

This folk ritual may preserve an echo of prehistoric festivals.

Coalition Council of Dalon Ap Landu

By Joan Carruth

COCODAL has opened its shutters for business after a long, wet, miserable winter. We have nothing by way of old business pending. However, we have several pieces of new business.

One: we would like to encourage any Grove or solitary Third who has not already done so to join the Council,

Another: I have heard several proposals for streamlining the selection of Matriarchs/Patriarchs of the Higher Orders. Some of them sound pretty good. But I have already put in enough of my opinions and proposals for a while, so if any of you would like to propose a change, please do so. Any Third Order who is a member of the Council, either as a solitary or as a member of a member Grove, may propose a new rule or a change by sending it to Emmon Bodfish, Preceptor, Live Oak Grove, 616 Miner Rd. Orinda, California, 94563. He will publish it in the next MISSAL-ANY and wait 90 days for responses from solitaires and Member Groves' Third Orders. Remember, such rules are decided by those who respond, so you cannot block a piece of legislation by not answering. Pros and Cons may be sent in by a postcard or letter to Live Oak Grove Address. We will publish the results.

News of the Higher Orders

Grannos, 4th Order, (healers)

Now is the time for all good healers to come to the aid of their Order. If you're Third Order and interested in healing (medical, psychological, or psychic) and have access to an ArchDruid, or even another member of the Third Order, PLEASE write to me, Joan Carruth, A.D. and join Grannos: I have this nightmare of Grannos only existing in the area I live in, which to me would make it essentially useless. There are no dues, and no obligations, (though there are some things you can do if you want, like setting up a Healers' Conclave in your area). In return, you will have access to all the pool of healing techniques and experiences I can garner. Write to me, describe your interests, and experience in healing, and give me the name and address of the person, Third Order, you would like to have Ordain you.

Joan Carruth
Live Oak Grove

Brachiaca, 5th Order

Since 4th Order is officially running, we are scouting for candidates for M/P of Brachiaca. Since Brachiaca is the god of brewing, such a person should probably be one who enjoys alcohol, and perhaps other mind-altering chemicals. Perhaps such an Order could be involved in setting up parties around High Days for their Groves. The head of an Order recruits members and keeps them in touch with each other, submits Order news to the Missal-Any, and decides who is to be ordained. It isn't a whole lot of work, or I wouldn't be able to handle Grannos. So, if you are Third Order, and would like to propose yourself as head of Brachiaca, or if you know a good candidate, or you would simply like to be a member of the Order, write to Matriarch of Grannos Joan Carruth, c/o Live Oak Grove

—Joan Carruth

Order of Oberon, The Bards

Leslie Craig-Harger Matriarch, will be retiring as such this season, when she can find a suitable successor. Nominations welcome! Until then, she will be doing Ordinations into the Bardic order. If you are interested in joining, contact her through Live Oak Grove, here at the Miner Rd. address. You do not have to be Third Order to join Bards. She will be holding occasional Bardic Revels, when possible, and wishes to say that if some other members of Bards wish to hold a Bardic, she'd much appreciate it.

Events

The Institute of Celtic Studies is presenting a lecture on "The Celtic Vision" by Ken Ruffner. It will be on May 18, Bldg C, Rm. 100 Fort Mason San Francisco, 8:00 P.M. Many slides of Irish artworks and landscapes

"Lark in the Morning" is sponsoring a summer music celebration July 26 to August. The site they have chosen includes 46 redwood cabins with stone fireplaces and balconies, a large hall for dances and dining, continuous workshops on many musical instruments and singing and dancing in the Irish Gaelic traditions. Cost is $95, not including meals. Register before May 1, and get a special rate of $85. Contact Box 1176, Mendocino Ca. 95460 or (707) 964-5569

Things for Sale

Copies of the Druid Chronicles ($25) are still available from Joan Carruth, also copies of the Mini Chronicles ($7),

Live Oak Grove has several Ruby glass chalices of the traditional RDNA type for sale ($10.50)

Paladin is getting ready to cast a batch of bronze cycles of Druidic form. There will be just 20 made. If you want any, Third Orders especially, place an order through Joan Carruth, quickly. (415) 245-1387, an answering machine will take your name.

You can order a Viking style drinking horn, though not specifically Druidic, through Old Norway, Dept. R, Helen Ga. 30545, for $13.95.

An excellent book which I had re-printed a few years ago, a few copies of which are still left is Bladud of Bath by Howard C. Levis. This contains the complete documentation relating to Bladud, the ninth King of England after Bruce the Trojan. Like the Prodigal Son, Bladud became a leper and looked after swine near Bath, where he discovered the hot springs which cured him of the disease as they have cured many since. Bladud was a Druid and an early student of the art of flying, which finally led to his death. Mr. Levis's illustrated, scholarly work represents the only biography of an individual Druid. Good, large hardback edition with dust-wrapper. $6.95. USA etc. airmail: $9. UDA etc. surface $1.50.

Two other books of mine, not yet available, are to be published next year by Thames & Hudson (inquiries to them). These are MEGALTHOMANIA, an illustrated account of the theories, follies, and general activities of archeologists and enthusiasts at megalithic sites; and LIVING WONDERS, written with Robert Rickard as a follow-up to PHENOMENA, consisting of about fifty chapters on the mysteries, controversies and weird records of natural history.

FOR SALE PRIVATELY from: 11 Powis Gardens, London W.11.

Summer Solstice 1982

Volume 6 Number 4

Uath: Late May to June.

The name for this time of the year is taken from the hawthorn, whitethorn, or mayflower. In ancient Britain, this was the time of rest and abstinence after the Beltaine festivities. Old clothes were worn, and the temples cleansed in psychic and physical preparation for the summer. The time is associated with the Goddess Cardea, who casts spells using hawthorn, and it was she who had to be appeased at marriages as such unions were hateful to her, she being associated with chastity and solitude. She is the benefactor of crafts people and the guardian of hinges, having the power to open what is shut and to shut up what is open. She is able, as well, to look forward in time, and back to the hidden past, Cardea lives at the hinge of the Universe, in a starry castle, behind the North Wind. She was worshipped in Britain, and perhaps in the lowlands of Scotland, in Strath-Clyde.

News of the Groves

BELTAINE CELEBRATION went well despite two principle people being handicapped with bad colds. Sue has some color pictures of the merriment, which I hope we can print in the next Missal-Any. The standard Beltaine Service, as given in the Chronicles, was performed, beginning at 1:00 p.m. For the first time in the Grove's history, we had our own altar on which we could build a fire. Though the altar is not in final form yet, the base served as a platform for a good blaze. Afterwards we had the Maypole Dance around our home-made 11 foot tall Maypole. Such thanks to Daniel and Leslie Craig-Hargar for helping splice two logs together, using only primitive hand tools, (i.e. the power saw gave out,) to create a 16 foot pole. All the May Dance participants brought their own ribbon, of what ever color, and we danced and wove them down the pole in the traditional May dance, with the Bards singing and the Matriarch of Bards, Leslie, playing guitar. It was a colorful, fast and flailing event, especially as many of us are not used to dancing in long robes, nor on the sides of hills. All the officers, and many of the members were in their full Druid robes, some barefoot, some in Engineer boots. After the Maypole was woven with the ribbons, we decided to leave it stand, at least until Solstice. Then we sat around it and Leslie sang requests from her lengthy Pagan repertory. Meanwhile most of us ate and enjoyed the return of the Season of the Waters of Life, in flavors wine, Irish Mist, and Whiskey. As this took effect, more people joined in the singing, shouting, and a few dancing through the underbrush.

We particularly want to congratulate Earl for climbing up our forty-something steps to the Grove site, and also to thank him for the use of his phone, which was instrumental for contacting Joan, our AD, for planning and set up, as she is currently without a phone of her own.

Most stayed for the sunset, and some beyond, i.e. those who had gone to sleep, (read passed out), only to be awakened by the cold and foggy dew of Orinda night.

Next celebration is Solstice, a minor high day, on June 20. Next big Celebration is Lughnasadh. Send us your ideas of what you'd like to see in these festival finery games for Lugh.

Out of Town/State Readers

Provisions exist in the Druid Chronicles for those people that live too far from an established Grove to start their own protogrove without the need of a presiding Third Order Archdruid. We can send you Proto-grove services to use and the system to set up a group and celebrate the Druid High Days. All it requires is three interested people to enact the rituals but you can read all three roles, if you're alone, or you can recruit a couple of other people. Write us for the details.

Fight Back

Next time you're leafleted or pressured by aggressive Christians, Hari Krishnas, New Guinea Mudmen, etc. whip out some Druid leaflets and convert them back. We have Druid literature on simulated parchment paper, which can help explain who we are and what it's about to your friends, enemies or harassers. In my case I can vouch for them getting rid of some previously persistent Jehovah's Witness canvassers and a vacuum salesman. Send us $1.00 or 5 stamps and we'll send you some.

Bronze Sickles

CORRECTION of a misspelling in the Beltaine issue: the "bronze cycle" was a bronze sickle. Paladin still has some of these for sale for $30.00. The blade is 5" in diameter, and the sickle comes without handles, but with a bronze tang which is perforated for the attachment of a wooden or bone handle. Hawthorn or oak are suggested as sacred woods. Joan Carruth A.D. suggests that Archdruids of Groves, especially should have one to cut the service's sacrifice. The Grove could pool their money and get one, which could remain Grove property when a new Archdruid is elected.

Lughnasadh Essay: Funeral Games

By Emmon Bodfish

Originally a celebration of the funeral games for Lugh, the Celtic deity of Light. By August 1 the sun is lower in the sky and days significantly shorter. By now even the non-astronomically oriented can feel the summer's decline. The sun, re-born on December 22, is ageing. The period of harvest, Foghamhar, is coming, and this High Day marks the celebration of the First Fruits, and the first produce of the fields. In Celtic Countries, this middle of the summer festival is still marked by the Races in Ireland, Revels in Wales, and the Highland Cattle Show in Scotland. In a stock raising culture like the Iron Age Celts, this was the most likely time of market faires and Gatherings. The calves of the Spring were old enough to sell/trade; likewise the sheep would have been sheared and surplus wool of lambs could be bartered.

Live Oak Grove will be celebrating Lughnasadh on August the 7th at the Grove Site at 1:00 P.M. Bring a sample of any fruits or vegetables that you've grown, and come help us assure a bountiful harvest to come. Take BART to Orinda and phone 254-1387 for a ride.

Creating a Wizard Lite

By Emmon

A Wizard-Lite is a phenomenon you'll often come across in fantasy and occult literature in these post-Illuminati (Trilogy) years. The following is a distillation of my experience with one method of creating one.

Sit straight up, on a sturdy seat, feet flat on the floor, in a dark room. It is never quite dark enough outdoors for this. Lean a little forward, and look into the darkest part of the room. Focus your eyes as if you were looking into the farther distance. The room must be dark enough that you cannot see the wall in front of you. The correct eye focus is nine-tenths of it. Some people describe it as "looking left with the left eye and right with the right eye." I didn't think of it this way, but if it helps...

You'll see flecks of light, blue or violet, which move in curved paths, then wink out. Don't try to look AT or follow them. You'll lose the critical distance focus and not be able to see them at all. You are focusing out beyond them; they appear as five to ten feet away from your chair. The longer you can hold this focus, and your attention on the dark in front of you, the more sparks of lite you will see. At a certain point you get the feeling of seeing past the darkness, into a space speckled with many, many of these sparks. It looked to me like the Milky Way, the first time I saw it. The tendency at this point is to look away, or close your eyes. If you do that, you will lose it and have to start over again. Of course willingness to start over again, and I mean many times, is necessary to the development of any "psychic" skill.

When you can get the focus right and see the sparks fairly easily, you can get to the "starry sky" stage in about 15 to 20 minutes per practice session. Next, you try to form the sparks into a ball by herding them together. There is no better verbal way to describe this. To me it feels like pushing them with my eyeballs. You may feel you are herding them into a close cluster with your willpower. As more sparks are crowded together, the glow will get brighter. It will look something like this:

As it brightens, you can see the floor and the room, but not in detail or color. While it looks like the room, alright, it looks not quite the same as the room looked before. And definitely different from the way the room looks in dim light with your eyes well dark adapted.

I plan to try this in a strange location, which I have not seen in daylight to see if it is a matter of running on memory.

This eye focus is the same one that has been described in the literature as the one to use to see auras.

Live Oak Grove

Live Oak Grove moved to hold emergency elections on the 17th of July, regular services. Our Archdruid, Joan Carruth, is leaving to live in Chico, California. Druid elections, for new reader's information, are usually held at Autumn Equinox, with the new officers taking over at Samhain, which is Celtic New Years. But emergency elections can be held if any of the officers have to resign in the middle of the year.

Fall Equinox 1982

Volume 6 Number 5

Fall Equinox Essay: Cernunnos

By Emmon Bodfish

quinox approaches the time sacred to Cernunnos, the Hunter God. The cult of the horned god/shaman, dressed in the horns and hide of a hoofed prey-animal, is one of the most ancient themes running through Indo-European religions. The cave paintings in France show such a figure and may date from Paleolithic times. (Figure 1) He is seen again on the Gundestrup Cauldron in near-historic times, here with the antlers of a Stag. It would be rash to think all horned gods are called Cernunnos, as each tribe may have had their own name for him, but the theme of the shaman raised to a god and endowed with horns remains consistent. In southeastern Europe he is associated with the goat, and in parts of Britain with the bull, but always with a horned, food species. He may be the Being commemorated in the horn-dances carried out in a number of English villages up through the 19th century and now exclusive to Abbots Bromley. Originally he seems to have been a hunter's patron, and later associated with fertility of flocks and herds, and then with fertility in general. This was the tradition of Grecian Pan, and Robin Goodfellow, and later debased into Christian "devil" myths. The Gaelic word "faighe" for prophet, and also the name of one class of Druids, may be cognate of the Proto-Gaelic word for deer, "fiagh," especially in its genitive case, meaning "of a deer." In Gaelic cultures there is also an association with the Hazel tree, and again with the after-death world, which we will shortly be contacting in the upcoming festivals of Samhain. His following continued after Christianization, and is reflected in the Highland Calluinn ritual still in practice in the 19th century. The Protestant cleric who recorded it seems to have had no inkling of its meaning, but he asserts that the people of the West Highlands, in the 17th century, before the coming of the Presbyters, were "little more than pagans, having been neglected by the Roman Church."

The Horned-God had a second sacred time after Yule and before Oimele, also indicative of the Cernunnos -Calluinn (Hazel) association. According to Dwelly, there is an old Gaelic myth that New Year's night is the night of the fecundation of the trees, when the winds blow from the West, and is called Calluinn night. On this night Bogles may walk. Bogles are wood spirits, connected with Cernunnos in the following interesting manner. The word Bogey or the Scottish Bogle is a diminutive of the original word Bog, with cognates in the Slavic, "Bog" god, and in Proto-Celtic "Boc" god. The Welsh "boucca" evolved into Puck, the wood sprite, and the Highland Bogey, spirit inhabiting wild or lonely places. "Poccan" is a male goat, and "Puc" is the goat-god who presides over the Puck fair celebrations in Ireland.

News of the Groves

Larry Press, the Archdruid of Live Oak, has suggested we "Write the trees back into Druidism." At the August 7th, Saturday, service, we tried the following ceremony, recognizing each of the eight trees in our Sacred Circle.

The Preceptor prepared beforehand a quart of bloodmeal and clear water in a large chalice shaped bowl. During the part of the standard RDNA service when the chalice of Consecrated Waters was being passed around the circle of participants, Larry, as Archdruid, took the bowl of bloodmeal and, beginning with the live oak that stands at the Southpoint of our Circle, fed each of the trees in turn, going around the Circle sunwise. Then he returned the empty bowl to the Preceptor. By then, the chalice of Consecrated Waters had finished circulating among the members, and the Server returned it to him. He poured the remaining portion into the altar flames, as standard in the RDNA service.

We found that this Ritual Feeding of the Trees fit in well at this point in the ceremony. In the future, Larry suggests, addressing each tree by name, using the oldest Indo-European root word for the name of each species. If that is not discoverable, we will use the old Gaelic. Emmon, the Preceptor, agreed to research tree names.

More information on Dalon Ap Landu, the patron spirit of RDNA Groves, mentioned in the Standard Druid Service. Dalen is Welsh for leaf, and Ap Landu would be "of Landu." Since there is no such term in Welsh as Landu, it is probably a corruption of some phrase or placename. Dalon Ap Landu may be connected with "Dalan of Goidhelic," mythologically the Druid of Eochaid. Or he may be an equivalent to Hu Tadarn or Dylan. Dylan was a son of Manawyddan Ap Llyr, the Cymric name of Manannan Mac Ler. In this case, he is roughly equivalent to Cerrunos of Gaul in the latter's god-of-the-woods aspect.

The above information thanks to Tom Cross, Garland Proto-Grove, Texas

The original reference to Dalon Ap Landu was from David Fisher, who included this, in his words, "obscure Welsh tree-god" in the RDNA Services. In this reference, he seems to be a vegetation god, speaking through wind, in the trees, and in thunder. Cernunos is usually glossed as a patron of animals, especially fertility of flocks, herds, and food species.

Anyone with further information on this, or new references is especially invited to write in and share them. Much thanks and kudos will be given. The David Fisher references are given in The Druid Chronicles.

Copies of the complete Druid Chronicles are available through Live Oak Grove. It is 200-plus pages, with full footnotes and many pictures, $25.00 Or the Mini-Chronicles, which are excerpts of the most important materials, for $7.50 plus $1 postage.

Calluinn a Bhuilg

Calluinn Ho!—This rune is still repeated in the Isles. Rarely, however, do two persons recite it alike. This renders it difficult to decide the right form of the words.

The walls of the old houses in the West are very thick—from five to eight feet. There are no gables, the walls being of uniform height throughout. The roof of the house being raised from the inner edge of the wall, a broad terrace is left on the outside. Two or three stones project from the wall at the door, forming steps. One of these the inmates ascend for purposes of thatching and securing the roof in time of storm.

The "gilleann Callaig" carolers or Hogmanay lads perambulate to the townland at night. One man is enveloped in the hard hide of a bull with the horns and hoofs still attached. When the men come to a house they ascend the wall and run around sunwise, the man in the hide shaking the horns and hoofs, and the other men striking the hard hide with sticks. The appearance of the man in the hide is gruesome, while the din made is terrific. Having descended and recited their runes at the door, the Hogmanay men are admitted and treated to the best in the house.

The performance seems to be symbolic, but of what it is not easy to say, unless of laying an evil spirit. That the rite is heathen and ancient is evident.

Now Do We With Songs and Rejoicing

(A Processional Hymn)
Words by David T. Geller
Sung to the traditional tune of:
"Let All Mortal Flesh Keep Silence"

Now do we with songs and rejoicing,
Come before the Mother to stand.
She has given forth of Her bounty
And with blessings in Her hand,
In the fields She walks
And in the woods She walks;
Our full homage to command.

At Her voice the wild wind is silent
And the fox lies down with the hare.
Every living creature before Her
Sings Her praises to declare:
Thanks to Thee for all,
O thanks to Thee for All,
Thanks to Thee, O Lady most fair!

David Geller
Druid, RDNA
Berkeley Grove

The Lady's Bransle

(Pronounced "brall")
Words by Hope
Sung to the traditional tune of: "Nonesuch" (short version) and reprinted by permission from "Songs for the Old Religion"
(Copyright 1973)

O She will bring the buds in the Spring
And laugh among the flowers.
In Summer heat are Her kisses sweet;
She sings in leafy bowers.
She cuts the cane and gathers the grain,
When fruits of Fall surround Her.
Her bones grow old in Wintery cold;
She wraps Her cloak around Her.

But She will bring the buds in...
(repeat freely)

The Woad Song

Authorship unknown
(But obviously English!)
Sung to the traditional tune of "Men of Harlech"

What's the use of wearing braces,
Hat and spats and shoes with laces,
Coats and vests you find in places
Down on Brompton Road?
What the use of shirts of cotton,
Studs that always get forgotten?
These affairs are simply rotten—
Better far is woad.

Woad's the stuff to show men—
Woad to scare your foeman!
Boil it to a brilliant blue
And rub it on your chest and your abdomen!
Men of Britain never hit on
Anything as good as woad to fit on
Neck or knee or where you sit on—
Tailors, you be blown!

Romans came across the Channel,
All dressed up in tin and flannel.
Half a pint of woad per man'll
Clothe us more than these.
Saxons, you may save your stitches,
Building beds for bugs in britches;
We have woad to clothe us, which is
Not a nest for flees!

Romans, keep your armors;
Saxons, your pajamas.
Hairy coats were made for goats,
Gorillas, yaks, retriever dogs and llamas!
March on Snowdon with your woad on—
Never mind if you get rained or snowed on—
Never need a button sewed on...
All you need is woad!!

Volume 6 Number 6

Samhain Essay: The Tuatha

By Emmon Bodfish

amhain, the day between the years. The Druid year starts with Samhain, in the autumn just as the Celtic day starts with sundown, proceeds through night, dawning into the day. The Classic writers of antiquity held that it was a Druid teaching that cold and dark and the difficult precede warmth and light and the beneficent.

In pre-Christian times, Samhain was the occasion of great gathering in Ireland and Gaul, and probably in Scotland and Britain, though there, no records survived. Druids Bards and Ovates (Ollafhs) and the political leaders from all parts of Ireland assembled at Tara. In Gaul similar gatherings were held, and received and sent emissaries to and from Scotland and England. Better accounts survive from Tara than from any of the other Celtic areas. The Tuatha from the four provinces of Ireland assembled at Tara Hall well before Samhain. There after ritual purifications, which may have included the offering of sacrifices, part of the harvest, and leaping through the bonfires, the nobles and Druids retired indoors. They remained "under roof" all Samhain Day, the belief being that on this day the forces of Propriety and order were gathered inside, and the forces of Chaos were afoot outside. Inside the palace at Tara, took up their traditional stations around the High King: Those of Ulster, representing the warrior caste, to his North; Those of Munster, representing the prophetic/aesthetic pole to his right; Those of Connaught, representing the Druid, or clerical caste at his back; and facing his Lennster, representing the Tuatha, husbandman/producers. In this order the great counsel of the year was held.

Though called the Day of the Dead, Samhain was considered a good or lucky day. In contrast, Beltaine was considered a difficult, or tricky day as the day beginning the Season of Life. On Samhain, the two worlds of the living and of the Tuatha De Danann draw close and may merge, making this the time to contact the Other World, and ascertain the disposition of the Gods and ancestors on the plans for the coming year of the settling of old quarrels. Ancestors, in particular, could send fertility, or disease, to their descendents and their favor was sought for the ensuing winter. This tradition was especially strong in Alba (Scotland, approximately) where Samhain was the occasion to seek instructions from the ancestors and bring oneself into harmony with them. If the required funeral ceremonies had been performed, and the yearly offerings made, and all was right between the living and the dead, then there was no need to fear ghosts. But if all was not well between the living and their clan forbearers, if their will was flouted or the rites neglected, the dead could make their will known on this night when the line between the two worlds dissolved and spirits could come over and walk in ours.

To the Tuatha, husbandmen of the land, Samhain marked the absolute end of the harvest. It was forbidden to glean or gather any more wild fruit after Samhain night. This assured that all would be gathered in and stored before the storms began, and may also have prevented over-picking, especially of wild fruit, by declaring that anything which remained in the fields or woods after this date to belong to the wild birds.

Live Oak Grove Elections

Elections will be held before Sunset Service on Samhain, Saturday, October 30, at 5:30pm at Live Oak Grove in Orinda.

Nominations are:

Larry Press for Archdruid
Emmon Bodfish for Preceptor
Bob Blunt for Server

Any other nominations or volunteers should write or phone in, or be present on Samhain to run.

Calendar

Samhain Sunset Service will begin at 5:30 PM October 30, and those who want to will vigil all night. There will be a midnight service, and dawn festivities. Regular Services will be at 12:00 Noon, Pacific Standard Time, on November 14, and November 28. All these will be held at Live Oak Grove, in Orinda. Take BART to the Orinda Station, and phone 254-1387, before 11:45, for a ride.

Protogrove Service

Note: The enclosed copy of the Protogrove service, written largely by Joan Carruth, A.D. should be included at the end of Section Three of the Druid Chronicles, if you own a set, at the end of the Liturgy. A Gàidhlig translation of this will be forthcoming, and can be included with the Irish Gaelic Services in the Urtext Section of the Chronicles.

Michaelmas

By Emmon Bodfish

The following ceremony was associated with this time of year, and enacted annually at least through the 1820s, though in Christian times it was incorporated into Michael-mass festivities. In the Northern Celtic areas, Michael takes over many of the characteristics of the Celtic deity, Manannan McLir, and even of Llyr, the sea god, and ruler of the Land of the Dead, celebrated on this Day of the Dead, Samhain.

‘Na Gellaidh

Thug mo leannan dhomh sgian bheag
A ghearradh am meangan goid,
A ghearradh am bog 's an cruaidh,
Saoghal buan dh'an laimh a thug.

Gheall mo leannan dhomh-sa stiom
Gheall, agus braiste 's cir,
'S gheall mise coinneamh ris
Am bun a phris mu'n eireadh grian.

Gheall mo leannan dhomh-sa sgathan
Anns am faicinn m'aille fein,
Gheall, agus breid is fainne,
Agus clarsach bhinn nan teud.

Gheall e sid dhomh 's buaile bha,
Agus falaire nan steud,
Agus birlinn bheannach bhan,
Readhadh slan thar chuan nam beud.

The Promises

My lover gave to me a knife
That would cut the sapling with,
That would cut the soft and hard,
Long live the hand that gave.

My lover promised me a snood,
Ay, and a brooch and comb,
And I promised, by the wood,
To meet him at rise of sun.

My lover promised me a mirror
That my beauty I might see,
Yes, and a coif and ring,
And a dulcet harp of chords.

He vowed me those and a fold of kine,
And a palfrey of the steeds,
And a barge, pinnacled white,
That would safely cross the perilous seas.

The song and the dance, the mirth and the merriment, are continued all night, many curious scenes being acted, and many curious dances performed, some of them in character. These scenes and dances are indicative of far-away times, perhaps of far-away climes. They are evidently symbolic. One dance is called "Cailleach an Dudain," carlin of the mill-dust. This is a curious character-dance. The writer got it performed for him several times.

It is danced by a man and a woman. The man has a rod in his right hand, variously called "slachdan druidheachd," druidic wand, "slachdan geasachd," magic wand. The man and the woman gesticulate and attitudinize before one another, dancing round and round, in and out, crossing and recrossing, changing and exchanging places. The man flourishes the wand over his own head and over the head of the woman, whom he touches with the wand, and who falls down, as if dead, at his feet. He bemoans his dead "carlin," dancing and gesticulating round her body. He then lifts up her left hand, and looking into the palm, breathes upon it, and touches it with the wand. Immediately the limp hand becomes alive and moves from side to side and up and down. The man rejoices, and dances round the figure on the floor. And having done the same to the right hand, and to the left hand right foot in succession, they are also become alive and move. But although the limbs are living, the body is still inert. The man kneels over the woman and breathes into her mouth and touches her heart with the wand. The woman comes to life and springs up, confronting the man. Then the two dance vigorously and joyously as in the first part. The tune varies with the varying phases of the dance. It is played by a piper or a fiddler, so sung as a 'port-a-bial,' mouth tune, by a looker-on, or by the performers themselves. The air is quaint and irregular, and the words are curious and archaic.

Yule Essay: What is Yule?

By Emmon Bodfish

feminine gender) is an instance of one of the most ancient religious ideas, that of reciprocity.

This concept goes back to the beginnings of religion in the Old Stone Age, as well may the fire lighting ceremonies. As G. Rachel Levy explains, these rites were

"the culmination of the Stone Age religion of reciprocity, in which, by ritual attunement to the rhythm of seasonal change, man shared with Divinity the responsibility for its maintenance, so that the ceremonies first introduced to guide the birth and death of the hunter's quarry, were replaced in natural succession by those considered necessary to assist the new year to be born, the very sun to return, (and) the harvest to be cut down."

This correspondence

"was also understood conversely, so that early written documents record (Le Titre d'Horus d'or, by A. Mort, translator, Rev. Arch. xxiv) that the rising of the Young Year God from his winter sleep in the subterranean chambers held hope for the resurrection/reincarnation of man. Such a belief would seem to have been naturally transmitted from the ideas concerning the case as mother of rebirth, now reinforced by the lesson of the seeds, through Neolithic ceremonies in which the sense of mutual causality was so compelling. It is demonstrated in the monuments of the dead."

Yule, a minor Celtic High Day, the Midwinter Solstice's sun shines into the mouths of cairn graves and the openings of hill tombs. The day was of obvious importance to these megalith builders, and associated with the dead and with regeneration. This is the bottom of the year, and the coldest months are still to follow. Bonfires are lit on hills to call back the Sun, and kept burning all night to celebrate its return. This Celtic tradition may be a cognate of the Norse Yule Log tradition, which is still carried on in the Nordic countries. This use of fire to recall the Sun's fire, (the name for the Sun in Gàidhlig is thought to be derived from the phrase "of the nature of fire," greine, and is of the

News of the Groves

Chico Grove

A New grove of the Reformed Druids of North America has been founded in Chico California, by Joan Carruth, former Archdruid of Live Oak Grove. The officers are:

Archdruid: Joan Carruth

Preceptor: Kitty Piper

Server: Bob Chappel

For information contact Joan Carruth, 1588 Fetenit, Chico, Calif., 95926. The Chico Grove will be holding services on all High Days.

Calendar

Yule will be celebrated at Live Oak Grove on Tuesday, December 21st at 7:30 P.M. indoors, before a huge Yule Log. Regular services will be also at Live Oak Grove, 616 Miner Rd., Orinda at 12:00 noon on January 2, 16th and 30th. Take BART to Orinda and call 254-1387 for a ride.

Live Oak Grove will hold Yule Services on Winter Solstice, December 21st, at 7:30 PM. at 616 Miner Road, Orinda, California. Bring Mistletoe and song.

Mistletoe

The Druid cutting of the mistletoe (Uil'ioc in Gàidhlig, derived from the phrase "ever young") is described by the Roman writer, Pliny, in his work on the Gauls, "The Druids hold nothing in so sacred respect as the mistletoe, and the tree on which it grows, provided it be an oak. They select certain woods of oak, and they do not perform any sacred rite without the leaf of that tree; so that hence it is likely they have been called 'Druids', explaining the name from: the (Greek root 'drus' an oak; Druidae, oakites.) Whatever grows on that tree, more than its natural growth, they think has been sent from Deity, and is a sign that the tree has become chosen by Deity as select. However, that species of mistletoe is very rarely found, and when it is it is sought after with great devotion, and especially at the sixth day of the moon, which is the beginning of their months. Having prepared sacrifices and feasts under the tree, they bring up two white bulls, whose horns are then first bound; the priest in white robe, ascends the tree, and cuts it off with a golden knife" (sickle) throwing it down, it is received in a white sheet. Then, and not till then, they sacrifice the offerings, praying that Deity will render gifts on those on whom the mistletoe is bestowed. When mistletoe is given as a potion, it can remove animal barrenness, and it is remedy against all poisons."

Class will confine its style of classroom prayer to the normal, proper, accepted, conservative, all-American, right-wing, Christian variety.

Oimelc Essay: Oimelc and Brigit

By Emmon Bodfish

imelc is one of the major high days of the Druids. A pastoral people, this holiday marks the first births of lambs and the lactation of the ewes. It is the end of "black January" and we are past the bottom of the year. It is clear, now, that the light and fertility invoked at the Solstice is indeed returning. This festival is presided over by Bride, (Bridget) as Lugh presided over Lughnasadh at the opposite point of the year. Bride and Lugh are poles, complementary figures, who balance each other in the Celtic system of male/female checks and balances. Though a patrilinear society the Celtic was less male dominated than our own has been, and certainly less patriarchal than the Middle Eastern or Mediterranean societies of the time, or than the Christian society that replaced it.

Bride is the goddess of the hearth and of fire, the inspirer of craftsmen and poets. Her ensigns are the fire essence and the rays of the Sun. Though a Celtic goddess, and associated with the fire sacrifice, a rite not used by pre-Celtic peoples, Bride, in England and Scotland, has absorbed many elements of the local, pre-Celtic Earth goddesses. This, her time of the year, is associated with the visiting of strings and the circumambulation of wells and sacred stones, with the thawing of the streams and the beginning of the year's fishing. The rites of wells and stones may be older fragments of Megalithic religious conceptions. Certainly the stone circles and cairns and the rite of circumambulation, predate the Celtic arrival. Some of the oldest stone circles and altars are found in Mesopotamia and South West Asia, so it is conceivable that the Celts may have brought some of the rounding rites with them from the Indo-European homeland, as well as by having been influenced by these Megalithic rituals, which reached their greatest heights in Western Gaul and Britain, of the pre-Celtic peoples that they encountered on the migrations westward.

John L. Smith, writing in 1780, in Gaelic Antiquities, has this to say of circumambulation rites still being practiced by local peasants and attributed to "the old Druids." "...that at the thawing time, the suppliant should go, upon three occasions, to a certain well or spring, and there bath himself three times; or make three journeys to some ancient stone, and there pour the new water out upon it and go three times around it in the deiseal direction" (from East to West). The classic writer, Pliny, ascribes a similar ritual to the Druid rites of healing. He records that the Druids prescribed this rightwise circumambulation of stones and triplicate bathing in the newly thawed water, as part of their treatment for mental disorders or lingering internal complaints.

Bride's function as goddess of fire and the hearth are purely Celtic characteristics. The prominence of the Sun and of fire symbolism, and the fire sacrifice are uniquely Indo-European, as contrasted with the rites of earlier peoples. They mark a shift from the Neolithic and early Megalithic concern with earth's fertility and continuance, to the importance of the regularly recurring cycles of the Heavens, characteristic of the Indo-European religions. Extrapolating from those sacred stone and cairn beliefs that persisted into nearly modern times, it is found that when the divine spirit is felt to reside in the stone, or cairn, which is an embodiment of Earth and a concentration of it, the offering is poured over the sacred stone, or buried within the circle or cairn. Evidence of both these practices have been found connected with Stone Henge. However, fire sacrifice and solar symbolism is connected with a conception of a usually anthropomorphic deity living at a distance, in the sky, as with Taranis of the Celts, or in an Other World, as with Bride, Fire, then so much like the sun in warmth, is conceived as a connecting link to these deities, as the smoke and the offering rise and disappear. Though the Celts shared with the pre-Celtic peoples buried and other forms of sacrifice, they brought with them this idea of the fire sacrifice in which fire and smoke ascend and carry the offering and the prayers to the sky dwelling or distant deity. A tower or cloud of fire is sometimes used in Irish lore as a symbol for Bride. This association continued right down to her co-option by the Christian church, as "Saint" Bridget, when, according to the hegemony, a pillar of fire appeared over her head at this young girl's investiture into holy orders.

A Druid Missal-Any Spring Equinox 1983 Volume 7 Number 2

Spring Equinox Essay: Festivals and Eggs

By Emmon Bodfish

quinox, a Druid Minor High Day, the emphasis is Balance.” Some customs of this season, still held over from pre-Christian times, include colored and fancy eggs, and the “Easter Bunny” who brings them, though this was not the original sequence or association.

Nora Chadwick, a noted Celtic historian, describes the spring rite of the “coloring of the Cakes end Eggs,” noted by classic authors in their descriptions of Druid customs. Egg hunts, egg rolling games and rituals are still current in Ireland, Lithuania and Eastern Europe and may have a pre-Indo-European origin. Decorated eggs, and painted clay models of eggs are a frequent theme of Pre-Aryan, Balkan culture. They are part of the ensign of the Bird Goddess, whose worship seems to have been particular to spring, and to the time of the spring rains, to judge from holdovers into Greek times. Eggs are also part of the imagery of the supreme Goddess of the Old-Europe culture. In this connection, they represent the Cosmic Egg, laid by a swan or Nile goose, which was said to begin the world. Small painted clay eggs were included inside statues of this Great Goddess, as in Marija Gimbutas' drawing below.

“A Cosmic Egg may also be laid by a mythical water birds: this myth is almost universally known between Africa and the Arctic Zone; it is recorded in ancient civilizations and was known among hunting and fishing tribes. In an Ancient Egyptian myth, the Cosmic Egg was laid by a Nile Goose which was worshipped as the great chatterer, the creator of the world. According to the Orphic story, untreated Nyx (Night) existed first and was regarded as a crest black-winged bird hovering over a vast darkness. Though unmated, she laid an egg from which flew gold-winged Eros, while from the two parts of the shell Ouranos and Gaia (Heaven and Earth) were trotted. The beginning of the myth must lie in the Paleolithic era.”

The Egg, plus chatter, words, began the world.

The Bunny wasn't one at all, it was the Hare, not the rabbit, that was the sacred animal among the Celts and Germans. Julius Caesar, in his War Commentaries on Gaul, describes the Gauls as keeping “hares and certain other animals to amuse themselves, and which they do not eat.” (or hunt). The hare was seen as a messenger animal, associated with prophecy and madness. The March Hare brought in the Spring and gave the seeds their fertility, or withheld it. To run afoul of him caused madness. By the Middle Ages, the madness element predominated, and he came to be regarded as a demonic species. Many pagan ensigns and symbols suffered like defamation; and prophecy has always been associated with madness in Indo-European traditions. And underlying the egg theme, the theme of the March Hare is solidly Indo-European; its sacred and tabooed nature extends to most of the eastern European languages and early cultures. If language is the oldest witness to history, as Lockwood asserts, then the Cult of the Hare must go back to at least 3,500 BC. and the second wave of Indo-European expansion before Celtic, Germanic and Italic languages diverged. In these, the true word for hare, hara/haso, was tabooed, and euphemisms were commonly invented for it in everyday speech.

Our American Ground Hog Day, may be a dim and distant reflection of the March Hare theme, with its element of prophecy for an early or late spring. In the days of plowing and sowing magic, it was by the hare's behavior that people tried to foretell the spring weather and the prospects for the seeds about to be sown. By the shadows of posts and menhirs, not groundhogs, and by the points of the sun's risings, the priestly castes at the Great Henges determined the day of the Equinox and kept the calendar of sowing and reaping in line with the Heavens.

News of the Groves

Chris Sherbak, Third Order, now living in Chicago, has volunteered to co-ordinate communications and voting procedures for the Council of Dalon Ap Landu (National Council of all Third Order Druids). He suggests voting by proxy, and the following is a proposed proxy form, open to comments and criticism from all Third Orders, of course. To try to give the Council as broad a base as possible, we would like to hear from all Thirds, active, inactive and long lost. To that end, we are asking for the last known addresses of any of the Thirds whose names are printed in the Druid Chronicles and the last list of Carleton Thirds. Write or phone Chris Sherbak 1654 W. Cortland St, Chicago, Ill, 60622; (312)235-2839.

Dear Third Order Druid,

The Council of Dalon ap Landu has not had a vote in many years. One of the main problems has been the lack of contact between the head of the Council and the members. Many reasons have been given, but the fact remains. I am resolving this and getting on with business.

There can only be two states of participation in my opinion: active and inactive. Our rules do not allow inactive participation yet. I propose that we now do. I ask that you please respond to the questionnaire/proxy below. If you wish to remain in active status, please indicate as such. You will be kept on the Council's mailing list for all Council proposals and newsletter(s).

If you wish to become inactive please mark and sign the proxy. This is very important. Whether or not you are now interested in the Reform, you are still considered to have a vote. If you sign the proxy, I assure you that you will never be bothered by this Council again, unless you so wish to contact us. I'll even destroy your current address if you wish. But we need your signature. The proxies will be destroyed after the Council votes on inactivation status. If you have questions, please call me collect. Perhaps this will demonstrate to you the importance this matter is to me.

Thank you for your time,
Peace – Peace – Peace

I would like to be considered:

☐ Active -- Current address:

☐ Inactive -- I hereby allow my vote in the Council of Dalon ap Landu, of the Reformed Druids of North America, to be added to the majority vote of any issue brought to the Council's attention. This proxy will be null and void on the first day of January, 1990.

Celtic Old Religions of Wales

By Thomas M. Cross

There is evidence that the Celtic old religions survived into the Elizabethan times in Wales. In Keith Thomas' Religion and the Decline of Magic there is a report by John Penry from his Three Treatises Concerning Wales (17th Century) of thousands of Welshmen who knew nothing of Christ and "yea almost never heard of him." In Penry's treatises, he also remarks that the Welsh held fairies in "astonishing reverence" and dares not "name them without honour." These tidbits of history are just part of the survivals of Celtic lore scattered throughout Britain and Ireland. Collectors of this kind of lore have helped to reconstruct a vague system of beliefs. One of the collectors was Romantic poet Edward Williams popularly known as Iolo Morganwg. He collected poetry of the bards, medieval manuscripts and copies from the thirteenth century on on the subject of old doctrines and customs. He gathered together his lore and published it with the help of the Welsh Manuscript Society. He purported to have discovered Druidic doctrines as he was influenced by the so-called Patriarchal theory of druid origins. Morganwg padded out his collection by concocting pseudo-druidic rituals concerning the Gorsedd (throne, also means stone circle) and the Eisteddfod (a festival and gathering of bards). His ideas were so influential that modern Druids of Wales use material from Morganwg's treasury. At the same time of the late 18th century of Morganwg, William Stukeley and his Druidical order thrived from the Patriarchal theory and he credited Druids as the builders of Stonehenge. Gerald Gardner in the 20th century collected the beliefs of witches and wrote about Witchcrafts founding the Wicca neo-pagan movement. W.B. Yeats worked on solving druidic questions in his work with the Golden Dawn's Hermetic Order. There have been countless other attempts but it would seem that either something is being overlooked or many Celtic reconstructionists had been motivated by their own backgrounds and prejudices. It is a difficult task to assemble the pieces without projecting too much into the material. An eclectic and open-minded approach seems to work best for the most part which has been successful with the R.D.N.A.

Christianity has pervaded Celtic-ism or Druidic survival. Rome had a big part in stamping out Brythonic Druids and evidence suggests that they went underground under the work of the bards. Celtic religion was syncretized Roman religions but the peasantry preserved the older ways even into Christian times when both fused in harmony. This mixing of Christian philosophy with paganism gave rise to the 'heretical beliefs' such as Pelagianism and romances about King Arthur and the 'Sangreal.' The animistic Fairy-Faith prevailed also. A good book to read about the Fairy-Faith is Evans-Wentz' The Fairy-Faith in Celtic Countries. More studies have shown that the Druids of ancient times were a type of shaman. Shamans have shared many characteristics with Druids such as Otherworld journeys, magical healing powers, tree climbing rituals, knowledge about gods or spirits of earth, nature, and the Otherworld of the dead. Scholars have also shown the Indo-European connection between Druids, filidh, ollavs and bards with Brahmins, and holy men of Hindu culture. The Proto-Indo-Europeans had shamans, also evidence seen by Mircea Eliade in his book Shamanism: Ancient Techniques of Ecstasy, amongst the Scythians, Caucasians, Germans, and Iranians.

On the next pages I should like to present a collection of some of the symbology from Welsh folklore and traditions.¹

Welsh Object of Magic

The Cauldron of in Rebirth	(Pair Dadeni) Used by Bran the Blessed the Mabinogion. Bran is sometimes called Bendigeidfran.
The Cauldron of 'Undry'	Used by the Dagda, a cauldron of Plenty
Cauldron of Annwn or Inspiration	Connected with Ceridwen in Manes Taliesin , Manawydan, Pwyll, Pryderi and Ogyrvran in The Mabinogion tales.

The Sacred Customs of Hospitality

According to Celtic Customs of Ireland, guest are always welcomed with a feast, and it was considered a dishonour to turn away guests without feeding them. Careful attention was given to the size of a cooking pot or cauldron to make sure it cooked up enough to fill the guest with plenty of food. This custom may have produced the belief in cauldrons of plenty or immortality in the Otherworld. Goibniu (Gofannon) the smith brewed an ale or beer which gave immortality to those who drank it. Mider the son of the Dagda had a similar had a similar cauldron. Ceridwen's cauldron boiled for a year and a day and contained an assortment of herbs including near toxic hallucinogens, her Yfaggdu was supposed to drink to become inspired to make up for his ugliness. A ritual of drinking hallucinogenic potions or intoxicating libations may owe its origin to the same that Brahmins' drinking of the Soma...which could be shamanic use of drugs or alcohol. Evidence shows that this drinking from the cauldron of inspiration was a rite of initiation to gain second sight.

Other Welsh Objects of Magic

The Glain Meidr (Gline Mider) or Adder's Stone.

A glass bead of blue or green carved or inlaid with white enamel. This served as a survival of the Ovum Anguinus referred to by Pliny and was used for divination or as a good luck charm. In Cornwall these were referred to as Myl Pref (a thousand snakes) and were blue beads with a yellow wavy line painted on to represent the snake or serpent. The Scottish Museum ash adder stones too.

The Ash Wand or Staff was used in Wales for the healing properties it was believed to possess. These wands were decorated with spirals making them appear to be a counterpart of the caduceus.

The Ogham Alphabet of notches and lines were shown to have been used in Wales in early times. According to tradition, oghams and similar Celtic versions of runes were carved on twigs called coelbren and were the Brythonic counterpart of Norse rune-sticks. The alphabets were used on stone also called coelfain and rods called ebillion. These items were used for divination as well as secret codes for communication between druids, and also served as mnemonic devices. There is also the druid's cord—a string of 13 knots on one strand used for probably the same as the above items, and is believed to be the origin of Catholic rosary beads. The rosary beads were once thought to be of Eastern origin but now it has been shown to be of British monk's origin. The number 13 for the knots reminds us of the Tree-Calendar presented by Robert Graves in The White Goddess, in which each of the 13 months is symbolized by a tree of the Ogham alphabet. It has been suggested that the oghams were of Post-Christian Irish origin but now it is accepted as a pre-Christian alphabet invented by Q-Celts (the Goidhels).

To be continued next issue...

Beltane Essay: Shafts and Gatherings

By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, one of the greatest, and, now-a-days, best known, of the Old Celtic High Days, it marks the beginning of Samhradh, summer, and the "Season of Life." Historically, it signaled the moving of the herds out to summer pastures in the mountains. Great fires were built to welcome back the Sun, and the cattle were driven through the flames for purification before starting on their way to the high meadows. The Druid caste, priests and priestesses, presided over these rites at which all the clans gathered together at the ritual sites such as Tara and Carnutes for celebration, planning, and deliberation. Quarrels were settled and justice meted out. This was another Druid function, that of magistrate, with a specialized sub-group of the priestly class acting as judges. Sacrifices were offered to Belenos and on the Continent, to Gaulish and Galatian analogs of this Indo-European Sky God. Another opinion holds that this derivation of Beltaine from the name of a sun god, Beal, is problematical, and that Beltaine was, like Samhain, a festival of all the Gods and Goddesses.

For the New Reformed Druids of North America, it is the beginning of the Season of Life and the end of the Season of Sleep. The first spirits of the year will be added to the Chalice of Waters that is shared at each service, and the Third Order members will change their ceremonial ribbons, worn over the fronts of their robes, from white to red ribbons. The Earth Mother wakes from her winter sleep, and chants and praises are addressed to her.

Live Oak Grove plans to inaugurate the shaft grave, a Toll-Uaigh, we have dug this winter at Larry Press's (Archdruid) instigation, with an offering of some of the new Waters of Life from the first chalice of the new season. Shaft graves were built in Ancient Gaul, and perhaps elsewhere in Druidic lands. Offerings presumably to the Earth Mother, were put into these deep shafts at different times over a long period. Some of the "Tolls" were twelve meters deep, and offerings might include a whole tree. We plan to offer a piece of the sacrifice at each service which will be put into the shaft after the rest of the sacrifice has been placed in the altar fire.

And now for a different opinion...

David Rooney is from the Ancient and Royal Order of Druids in America/Aquarian Wicca. It is to be noted that this is a completely different organization from the Reformed Druids of North America (who publishes the Missal-Any) and our various groves, and has nothing whatever in common with us beyond a friendly interest. (Now I have said the necessary disclaimer that keeps us all legal with the laws of the United States of America, another organization with which we have no affiliation.)

Beltane, A Goodly Fire

By David DePaul

Beltane is the third of the Grand Sabbats of the Witches' Year. It is also one of the most important of the Fire-festivals celebrated by the Celtic people of western Europe.

The Beltane Fires, of the Goodly Fire, was kindled by the Druids in honor of the Mother Goddess, known as the Cailleach, that represented the winter Hag. At Beltane, she did not turn to stone as some traditions believed, but in reality changed into a beautiful Maiden who represented the May Queen that wedded the Young Lord, who was later to become the Corn-King. Since the name of the Cailleach was later changed by the Druids in Erin to the name of Mari, it was Mari who was later invoked by the druids into the May Queen during her coronation on Beltane.

Since the fertility of the Earth and the May Queen were of utmost importance to the Celts, both the Cauldron jump and the Maypole dance played a very large role during the Beltane celebration, as at this time the May Queen began her role as the Corn Maiden. It was the Magickal Powers of the Corn Maiden and the Corn-King combined that was favored by the Gods, and the Great Mother that insured a bountiful harvest in the later part of the Witches' Wheel or Year. The dance of Mari, which is performed prior to the Maypole dance is often called the dance of the sacred wheel.

In Wales and Elsewhere, the Beltane Fires were kindled by the Druids by rubbing two Oak sticks together. It is also well known that certain of the more learned of the Druids kindled the Beltane fires with the use of crystals from the rays of the Sun, and were the Keepers of the Sacred Fires during the course of the day, as well as the night.

The Hay Fires were always started by using the faggots of the prior year. The ashes left from the Fire festivals were used for many different magickal purposes too numerous to go into detail about at this time.

The first of May is also celebrated by the Druids in the Isle of Man as being the anniversary of Baal. The Baal Fires were worshipped as the spark of the Sun God, Baal. This custom was, of course, handed down to the Druids and Celts from much earlier Pagan sources.

Other Celtic May Day customs include invoking the powers of the tree spirits and becoming one with them, the placing of a green bush or bough before or upon the house of a beloved maiden for purposed of the curing of barrenness, the planting of a May tree before every house in the village, the singing of May songs, and the wearing of crowns of flowers out shortly after midnight on the morning of the first of May.

The most important of these customs (after the selection of the May Queen) was of course, the erection of the May Pole, which was made from a tree sacred to the Celtic people that was stripped of its branches. The younger folk danced around the pole during the day, and the older folk during the night. The most important thing that is observed every year, a new May Tree was used, and a new May Pole was used, and a New May Queen was selected.

In some Celtic traditions, the Harvest Lord was replaced every year, but the Irish Celts had Harvest Lords that served for a cycle of seven years, becoming the young Lord and Harvest Lord at their death at Samhain the last year of their reign.

That Beltane is both a Rite and Celebration of the Fertility of the Earth, and a very important Rite of Dedication to the Great Mother, is indeed the case, and should be considered as such by all Craft of the Wise that are interested in following the Old Ways in their original customs and traditions.

Notes on the Origin of Dalon Ap Landu

By Tom Cross

Dalon	Sounds similar to Dylan. Dylan is pronounced Dullen in Welsh, not Dillon as was mispronounced by Dylan Thomas or Bob Dylan, who is still perpetuating the Anglicised pronunciation with his pseudonym.	Landu	Lucan presents us with the various forms of execution of sacrifice to ESUS, TARANIS, TEVTATES by hanging, burning and drowning...in that order. Perhaps this was a triple God form like Odin, Thor and Frey as Georges Dumézil suggests in his theories...Along with Mitra, Varuna, Agni and Iupiter, QVIRINVS, MARS etc.
	Dylan is the name of Mabinogion deity named Dylan Eil Ton the son of Gwydion and Arianrhod was slain by his uncle Gofannon (Goibhniu). His epithet Eil Ton means 'akin to the wave,' so named because he took to the sea at birth.	Llan	Later, the word Llan came to be used in a Christian context. Llan—shrine for a Holy man or saint, as in Llanfair...Shrine of St. Mary. Llan Mair (mutated). Now denotes a church or village in Modern Living Welsh. The Modern Welsh word for grove is Llwyn. Llwyn took over the meaning of Llan. Example: Y Llwyn On "the Ash Grove".
	Notice elements of his name look much like the reverse of Landu. Dy—Lan Lan—du.	Du Dubh.	Dark or Black. Gaelic equivalent being
Daron	Defined in Heini Gruffydd's Enwau I'r Cymru (Welsh Personal Names) as the name of the Goddess of the oak.	Llan du	Dark Grove or shrine. Llandu is a black grove or Dark grove.
	Daronwy is the masculine form of the same above name. Name of British King in Arthurian and Welsh legend; supposedly born on the Isle of Anglesey.	Ap	Is mutated form of Map (Mab) the Welsh equivalent of Mac . Map is mutated to Fab or Ap (pronounced Ab) (Fab is pronounced Vab). Mutation is the system like the Gaelic aspiration which in Irish turns Mac into Mhuic (Vic) etc.
	Daronwy is cognate with Taranis (Gaulish God offered human sacrifices by burning. Mentioned in Lucan's poem Pharsalia).	Dalon Ap Landu	Landu is the mutated form of Llandu because it is preceded by Ap making it a modifying object with preposition understood in context. It is a noun-adjective. Dalon could be a corruption of Daron(wy) or a corruption of Dylan.
Daronwy	Da-rony-wy (Cymric...from Brythonic)	Dalen	Welsh word for leaf. Dalen (leaf) Ap (son) Landu (of Dark Grove)
Taranis	Ta-ran-is (Gaulish with Latino-Greek orthography)	Llandu	Could be translated as Dark Lake if we dare to stretch the name Llan to be a form of Llyn (Lake) Llyn-du. There is a river in Llyn, Caernafonshire called Daron.
	-wy and -is are both masculine endings in the given contexts. Note the inflexional endings preserved in Gaulish names rendered into Latin or Greek texts. Many times Latin inflexions are tagged onto Gaulish words...such as Belinus for Belenos. Greek rendered Belinus thus: (Greek letters), which was then transliterated Belenos, true to Gaulish. The Gauls often used the Greek alphabet for written language.	Daron	As an Oak goddess may be the consort or daughter of the Oak god.
Taran, Toran, Thor	Taranis is cognate with Welsh and Cornish Taran. Taran means lightning and thunder in Welsh and Cornish...though more often it is restricted to thunder as a noun. In Irish the equivalent is Torann...which should be		quite close to Thor (pronounced Tor in Scandinavian languages.) Esus, Teuates, Taranis Dumézil held a theory of the triple God onf Indo-Europeans e.g. Odin, Thor, Freyar. Offered sacrifices by stabbing, hanging, and drowning. Odin received the hanged victims.

Padstow May Song.

Cornwall, where Padstow is located, is one of the Celtic areas of Britain, which preserved the old traditions despite invasions of the Anglo-Saxons and the Normans.

Cry: Oss Oss, Wee Oss!

1. Unite and unite and let us all unite
For summer is a-come unto day
And whither we are going, we will all unite
In the merry morning of May.
2. With a merry ring and now the joyful spring
For summer is a-come unto day.
O give to us a cup of ale and the merrier we will sing
In the merry morning of May.
3. The young men of Padstow they might if they would...
For summer is a-come unto day
They might have built a ship and gilt it all in gold
In the merry morning of May.
4. The young women of Padstow that might if they would
For summer is a-come unto day.
They might have made a garland with the white rose and the red.
In the merry morning of May.
5. Where are those young men that now should here dance?
For summer is a-come unto day.
O some they are in England and some they are in France.
In the merry morning of May.

O where is St. George?
O where is he-o?
He's out in his long-boat
All on the salt sea-o.

Up flies the kite
Down falls the lark-o
And Urusla Birdhood she had an old yowe [ewe]
And she died in her own park-o.

6. With a merry ring and now the joyful spring
For summer is a come unto day.
So happy are those little birds and the merrier we will sing
In the merry morning of May.

“Oss Oss, Wee Oss” is the cry that goes up from a “united” body of Padstow townspeople. The horse is in fact a man in disguise. He carries on his shoulders a heavy hoop about six feet in diameter covered with a black-painted canvas skirt, and a hobby horse head and tail. The head is a black, white and red painted mask with a tall pointed hood. The horse is preceded by a sailor carrying a painted club, known as “The Teaser.” On May eve when the church clock strikes twelve, the horse comes out of his winter stable and follows a traditional route through streets and gardens, stopping to sing a special “Night Song.” Just as it is getting light the young men go out and “steal” greenery from the squire’s plantation and decorate the town. A Maypole stands in the main square from which flags are strung in all directions. As Horse and Teaser dance and sway through the town, the townspeople sing the Day Song. Frequently, the horse lies down as if dead, and each time after the St. George part of the song, the Teaser bangs the horse with his club and it leaps up, resurrected. Ursula Birdhood may be St. Ursula, known as a protector of birds, who may herself be a Christianized form of the Earth Mother, worshiped as a fertility goddess.

The Padstow Hobby Horse is probably the most exuberant of all surviving English folk ceremonials.

Beltaine Chant

PR: And the God of the Sun did arise from His tomb in the South; and once more did He fare forth to His children in the Northern lands. (Pause) O Belenos, O Thou unchanging God of many names, but one Face, we, Thy children, welcome Thee back to our lands.

Chorus: O Lord of Light, we welcome Thee.

PR: O Belenos, O Lord of Light, long have we awaited Thy return, that the coldness of the Night might be taken from our lands.

Chorus: O God of Sun, We welcome Thee.

PR: The nights were long, the trees had shed,

Chorus: The night had conquered day.

PR: The days were short, and life had fled.

Chorus: The night had conquered day.

PR: The winds were cold, the land seemed dead,

Chorus: The night had conquered day.

PR: But the Sun returns from the Southern lands.

Chorus: Balanced now are we.

PR: Plants spring up on every hand,

Chorus: Balanced now are we.

PR: "Let Life return!" is the Sun's command.

Chorus: Balanced now are we.

PR: The Sun grows stronger every day.

Chorus: The Day will conquer night.

PR: The world grows lush and Life holds sway,

Chorus: The Day will conquer night.

PR: So let us praise Him in all ways.

PR: O Belenos, O Sun, we praise Thee at Thy return to our midst. Welcome art Thou among us.

Chorus: Bless with thy presence, O Lord of Light.

PR: O Belenos, O Lord of Light, bless us with Thy warmth and light, that we may rejoice in Thy sight.

Chorus: Bless us and light our way, O God of the Sun.

Summer Solstice 1983

Volume 7 Number 4

Summer Solstice Essay:

Danu and Diana

By Emmon Bodfish

Midsummer Solstice, one of the four astronomical high-days of the Celtic year, is associated with the Druid goddess Danu, mother of the gods, the Tuatha de Danann. She is probably the same figure as the Irish goddess Anu and the Breton Ana. She may be cognate with the classic goddess Diana, not only on the grounds of word origins, but on the witness of Gallo-Roman writers who noted the similarities in character and type in the days when her worship was still current in Gaul. She is associated with fertility, particularly of women, and with the boar totem, as was Diana the huntress and the earlier Greek Artemis. The virgin aspect of this Moon and fertility goddess was emphasized in the lands bordering the Mediterranean, and the mother aspect in Western and Northern Europe.

Her festival was on midsummer day, and traces of the old customs continue in Celtic lands. On the Isle of Man, it is customary to wear a spring of Mugwort, a plant also sacred to Roman Diana, and reputed, in England, to bring a young woman dreams of her future husband. That the Christian Church chose this day for one of its major saints, John the Baptist, may indicate that it was attempting to displace a major pagan festival and deity. Many of the customs carried on into modern times on "St. John's" day, seem singularly at odds with the stern, rather puritan character of the man who was beheaded for refusing to retract his condemnation of King Herod's incestuous behavior. These include dancing in the streets, all night bonfires, public song fests, and encouragement of amatory games among the young.*

*This sounds interesting, but Ward Rutherford, The Druids, does not elaborate.

News of the Groves

Contra County Sheriff-Coroner Investigates the Druids

When we came trooping down the hill from the Grove after services April 16th, we found in our driveway a compact white Valient squad-car with "Orinda Sheriff/Coroner" lettered across the door. The car was empty.

We "Hello-ed" around the property, no answer, no sheriff anywhere. In looking over his car, we noticed that every dent had been labeled with the date on which it had happened. "That's very efficient." Larry noted. Emmon suggested we take a fine-tipped black grease pencil of our own, and, on a clean, undented panel of the door, print a similar date for some time in the future. But about then we heard a crunching of bushes and underbrush and followed the sound around to the west side of the house to greet a wet, muddy Sheriff-Coroner emerging from the shrubbery. He had missed the path to the Grove and gone up an old deer trail to the west of our property.

It seems some home-owner on the other side of the valley had called in and reported suspicious activities by robed figures who seemed to be enacting a burial. The digging work on the toll-uaigh, or our gardening, was being watched. We explained to the Sheriff who we are, who the R.D.N.A. is, and that we are essentially quite harmless. No, we're not doing any burials. Larry assured the officer that we are in the process of getting legal status as a religious organization, and are taking out the necessary papers. From the description that the sheriff quoted to us, our concerned neighbor must have some fairly powerful binoculars, and have been watching for a while. Emmon asked the officer to extend to the caller our invitation to come and join us next service. Too late, after the lawman left, we thought it would be nice to have given him a copy of the Missal-Any to take back to that citizen.

The next day, Monday, we had a visit from the Fire Marshall who found the usual number of minor infractions of various codes, and left us a list of required repairs. Two days later we had a visit from another official, claiming to be from the County Health Department. He wanted to know how many people lived at Emmon's house, which is next to the Grove Site, on the assumption that all "alternative types" live in filthy illegal commune/crashpads. Emmon told him "myself and my son, as you can see on the census rolls." And declined to answer any further questions until he could consult with our attorney. The officer has not been back.

Later that week, we noticed some disturbances up at the Grove Site: the birch sapling pulled away from its stake and bent down, the cover taken off the toll-uaigh, and heavy foot prints through the clover and vetch ground cover, all probably attributable to the curiosity of the same neighbor who called the Sheriff.

That was six weeks ago, and nothing more has happened. The dreaded next installment, "All About Religious Intolerance" has so far not materialized.

Lughnasadh 1983

Volume 7 Number 5

Lughnasadh Essay: (More) Funeral Games

By Emmon Bodfish

ughnasadh, the festival of Lugh, The Light, or anciently, the funeral games for Lugh, the all-competent hero-god associated with the Sun. He is analogous to the Classical Apollo and now, with Midsummer's past, it is evident that the Sun is sinking lower. It is also the feast of the First Fruits and the beginning of the Harvest Season, Foghar. This feast and concept may predate Lugh and the coming of the Celts to the British Isles. As Marie-Louise Sjoestedt explains, in considering the Druid Traditions,

"We must dismiss the notion of one deity as titular, or associated with a particular function, in favour of the notion of diverse realizations of a single religious idea, groups of deities, probably local, at least in origin, who are not identical but equivalent with each other, having evolved among different peoples, perhaps at different times, from the same generative impulse. We shall find at every point of the epic tradition similar figures as mothers and teachers, no longer goddesses, they become heroines."

One such group comprises the "seasonal goddesses, patronesses of the great feasts of Ireland, and of the sacred places where these feasts are celebrated: Macha, the Machas really, and Carman, Tailtiu, Tea and the three Morrigna." The Machas are often associated with horses, and are the patronesses of the Assembly of Macha which was held at the feast of Lughnasadh, in the first week of August. A Macha, singular, is one of the three war goddesses, and also the patroness of childbirth. The equivalency of battle and birth as the hour of danger and a rite of passage for men and women respectively was noted by several other pagan peoples. The Aztec tradition reserved one of the highest tiers of Paradise for men who died in battle and women who died in giving birth.

The Fire Marshal has paid us a second visit, and, since no one was present at the Grove, left us a second notice, and a note that still more brush must be cleared from around the house. Emmon, the Preceptor, has written him a letter to the effect that we are working hard on it. This seems to have calmed matters down for the present.

Bob Blunt, the Server, comments:

We won't suffer in perdition
It's not part of this tradition
We just pack up and go fishin'
And that's good enough for me.

We don't cough and we don't sneeze
So we frolic 'mongst the trees
Sniffing fresh air on the breeze
And that's good enough for me.

It seems our behavior
Has stirred interest from a neighbor
Our persistence still won't waiver
And that's good enough for me.

He has sent here to alar ya
Although he cannot harm ya
Just wish he should meet his karma
And that's good enough for me.

Fall Equinox Essay: Archeo-Astronomy

By Emmon Bodfish

all Equinox, this is the season associated with Cernunnos, the horned god, patron of hunters, wild creatures, herders and flocks. Writes Thomas Cross, of Post Oak Protogrove, Texas, the preferred spelling should be Cernunnos from the original inscription found in Gaul and dating from Roman times: _ERNUNNOS.

In its other aspect, the Fall Equinox is an astronomical holiday associated with marking the passage of time and the need to keep the calendar rectified. The Druids were astronomer-priests, as numerous classical authors attest. Watching the heavens, keeping the calendar and predicting lunar eclipses were among their skills and duties. But they were not the first people to be able to do this. They may have learned from the Megalithic cultures that predated them, either in the Indo-European homeland, or during the long trek across Europe before 1500 BC when they arrived in the British Isles. When they came to England, it was already inhabited by a thriving stone age culture which had built Stone Henge, by the use of which it could rectify its calendar and foretell eclipses of the Moon. Many archeologists now believe that the great monument is a perpetual calendar and sidereal computer. Its location and construction show a sophisticated knowledge of the heavens and the Earth. The Moon/eclipse system could have been worked out by careful record keeping over a long period of time, something ancient priesthoods were good at, but because of the geometry of the Earth/Moon/Sun system, it is possible to construct this type of stone marker system for both the Sun and Moon only at the exact latitude of Stonehenge. Calculation of this requires knowledge of mathematics and geometry. According to John Gribbin (Timewarps, Delacorte Press, 1979) "even 20 or 30 miles north or south, the doubly significant rectangular observing marker could not have been built."

The effort involved in the construction of this Megalith must have been great; by implication, the society that built it must have been both rich and stable, because in the first place, it could support a group of "wise ones" who were able to study the astronomical alignments over decades, and probably centuries, and to develop the mathematics necessary to plan the great observatory, and secondly it could take men out of active production for the long periods of time necessary to build the stone megalith, circles and ditch-works. Jim Duran, Ph.D. feels that the pre-Celtic people of Britain were organized in sets of matri-clans, based on fishing and hoe cultivation. Matri-clans foster a spirit of co-operative labor among men, as they are accustomed to working with other men from diverse family groups, wife's brothers, sisters' husbands, uncles, rather than feeling at ease only with his own family, his brothers, his father, as is usually the case in closed, patrilineal systems. The system of matri-clan organization is also a distinct advantage to a society engaged in long distance trading and raiding, as Duran thinks the ancient Britons were. Sea raiding may have helped to enrich the economy and make huge projects the economy and make huge projects like Stonehenge feasible. (See Emmon Bodfish's future monograph, "The Financing of Stonehenge.")

As Duran asserts, when the men are going to be away for long periods of time, raiding, trading or engaged in public works projects, they prefer to leave the homesteads in the care of their sisters and their mother's people, who will guard their mutual inheritance, rather than in the keeping of the wives, as under patrilineage. The wives would be from a different, also raiding clan, and their loyalty would be divided.

A chicken? You call that pillage?

Gribbin, reasoning from the workings of the marker stones at Stonehenge, deducts that basic megalithic calculations were in 3/1 and 7/1 ratios. These, especially three, were important numbers in Celtic ritual also. This may be the basis of our seven day week, an institution that pre-dates recorded history, in Northern Europe. Though the Druids did not build Stonehenge, they may have understood its workings, and certainly the working of the Solar calendar it marks. With it they could have calculated not only the Fall Equinox which is at 7:42 AM Pacific time this year, but also the fact that it is a Friday, though they would not have called it that. The names, as most people know, are Norse.

News of the Groves

Joan Carruth, A.D. of Chico Grove, will be leaving Chico Sept 7, to return home to her native New England. She will be going back to school and be continuing her education in the Boston area. She was here visiting in the Bay Area the first week in September, and lead the service at Live Oak Grove, which she founded. Later we had a farewell party and carouse at Larry Press's, after shipping off her twenty three boxes of belongings, rail freight.

Tiki is now at Chico Grove and can be reached at the same address. To communicate with Joan about the purchase of the remaining sickles, leave a message at or write to Live Oak Grove, 616 Miner Rd. Orinda, Calif. 94563.

The Votive Shaft, known Celtically as the Toll Uaigh, which we dug at the Grove Site last spring, (see the Beltaine issue of the Missal-Any) has developed a problem of chronic invasion and occlusion by gophers. It seems the Microtus californicus who have dug numerous tunnels under our lawn, find the deep shaft a convenient place to push the “mine tailings” from their constant burrow construction projects. It’s not so much work as bringing them all the way up to the surface in the usual gopher mound method. This has necessitated digging the loose dirt out of the shaft over again several times before we could hold services and make our usual Toll Uaigh offering. We may get a terra-cotta pipe to line the shaft.

It has been suggested that the gophers may be holding services of their own and adding their offerings to those we bury at our traditional times.

At the Lughnasadh celebration on August 7, we added a ritual circumambulation of the Grove Site, ceremonially and permanently setting it apart from secular province and activities. The circle was drawn around it with the ritual staff, and an offering libation of Waters sprinkled out all along and through the way.

Bob Blunt, our Server at Live Oak Grove for the past year, has decided to take Third Orders and asks to be initiated to Third Order and accepted into the Council of Dalon Ap Landau. I will therefore formally ask if there are any Third Order Druids out there who have any objections or reservations? Write now, don’t whine later, for as it says in the song, “The magic is layed on and it can’t come off.” He has been accepted for Thirds by Larry Press, Arch Druid of Live Oak Grove and will vigil on the 17th and 18th of September, and if successful be ordained on the 18th.

Speaking of irreversible happenings, the following pictures are from the handfasting of Larry and Sue on August 6, 1983. The occasion was starred with good weather, and colorful with new ceremonial robes made by Sue for the event. Danny Geller, author of several of the songs in The Druid Chronicles, carried the traditional broom.

Samhain Essay: Talking to Ancestors

By Emmon Bodfish

amhain, in the Celtic traditions, begins the new year. It is "the time between the Worlds," the time that the dead may manifest again in our world or send us messages from theirs. In Eire it was the feast of Dagda. In a tradition that may be older than the Indo-European, spirits of departed ancestors are said to be able to send either prosperity or disease, fertility of crops or plague. If you have fulfilled all your ritual and practical obligations to your ancestors, and have not committed any defamations against their names, you have nothing to fear from ghosts on Samhain Eve.

If not, there are various ways of getting back on good terms with the spirits of dead ancestors. One is to create an image, a mask, a statue, a name plaque, or a painting (on rock) of the ancestor. This gives the spirit a "body" or locus in our world to replace the one that has died. The implication seems to be that with this image-body she/he continues to live, to be remembered, and to be able to transact any unfinished business in this dimension which may be troubling her/him. G. Rachel Levy, the anthropologist, feels that this image making is very old, and may account for certain types of rock paintings or prehistoric peoples. She quotes an Eskimo artist, relative to his rock paintings: (This way) "we give them new bodies to replaces their bodies that we had to take away" (for burial). This solidifying or fixing of a spirit into an image is probably pre-Indo-European, though elements of it are carried through in the Celtic culture. It was practiced until fifty years ago by some Siberian cultures¹ which some anthropologists feel are descendants of the pre-Indo-European peoples of North Europe/Asia. It is also very recent. It is still considered filial and decent, in some circles, to erect headstones and memorials over and for dead family members, though why is not now so clearly specified.

Another method of appeasing the ancestors is to name a child after the deceased, so that the ancestor's spirit can be reborn within the clan. This, also, is still in practice, and children are named after deceased or aging relatives to assure prosperity, or at least inclusion in the will.

In the Celtic epics, there are numerous Bardic passages imploring that the names of ancestors not be forgotten. In later times, appeals to Deities of the dead, or of the other world, seem to have replaced offerings to the dead themselves. But at the most flourishing times, at the high points of Druid power, all the Celtic cultures buried their dead with rich grave goods, ready for another life that would be a close reflection of this one. Social status would be preserved; chief would remain chiefs, warriors, warriors, etc. Valour would be rewarded in men, fidelity, skill and courage in both sexes.

In the Scottish tradition, a Western Isle, Tir nan Og, is the location of this paradise, and Manannan McLer Comes with his white barge to ferry souls across "to the isle where they would be." Caesar, in the last century B.C., states that Druids of his acquaintance believed "that souls do not suffer death, but after death pass from the (world) to the other." (ab aliis...transire ad alios.) And Lucan, in rhetorical address to the Druids, said

"But you assure us, no ghosts seek the silent Kingdom of Erebus, no the pallid depths of Hades' realm, but with new body the spirit reigns in another world—if we understand your hymns, death's halfway through a long life."

Unfortunately the hymns have not come down to us.

To the Classic writers, descendents of Mediterranean cultures, death was a state of suspended animation, or minimal animation, where shades drifted and muttered aimlessly in a twilight world ruled by an unfeeling, motionless god, Pluto/Hades.² In the Druid afterlife, people and gods mingled in a sunny world similar to this one, but "outside of time." This was so different from the Greco-Roman concepts of death that it seemed to the Classic writers to require both emphasis and explanation.

I'm sorry you've been inconvenienced Wotan, I just naturally thought when I said "God" that I would get—you know—Jehovah."*

*From a very old and badly weathered magazine. Who says the Missal-Any never publishes any dirty jokes?

They had, from their own Pythagoras, a doctrine of another kind of re-incarnation, and, in an attempt to explain the unknown in terms of the slightly more familiar, they asserted that the Druids had studied or borrowed from Pythagoras. This myth continued until the 18th Century, when it was reversed and asserted that Pythagoras had plagiarized from the Druids. There is no good evidence that Druidism ever heard of Pythagoras. It antedates him by at least a millennium, probably more. Its doctrine of re-incarnation in a material but timeless body in an Outer World, bears little resemblance to Pythagoras' idea, as recorded by Salmoxis, of the immortality of the soul based on the indestructibility of concept and number. By equating the Druid belief with Pythagoras' school, it could be integrated into the world of Classical thought and made acceptable to the Roman mind, and at the same time enhance the reputation of the Greeks as "The Founders of Philosophy," a favorite Roman idea.

Sucellos, Esus, and in some of his aspects, Cerunnos, are often listed as Celtic gods of the afterlife or Underworld, but as much as my research has been able to determine, there is no one god of the dead, comparable to Classic Pluto or Hades. The Druid afterlife is more an Other World than an Under World, in which gods and people mingle in a timeless dimension. All the gods, and one's own merits and clan connections seem, in Ossian's poems, to determine one's place at the perpetual feast in the Isle of the Ever Young.

It was a later development, and among the Germans, not the Celts, that associated divine energy with the souls of the dead. It was here that the original root of our present word, "God," Ghav, Ghuto, arose and designated "the evoked" and was associated with the souls of the dead.³ Why the Christian missionaries used this word to translate the concept of their Deity, Jehovah/Yewah, is not known. Perhaps Dis Pater, also a heavenly father, and the other likely candidate, Taranis, were too clearly individualized, and specifically pagan presences. Ghav/Ghut was shadowy and vague. Perhaps they followed Paul's example when he described his God to the Greeks as that "god-they-knew-not" but to whom they had built, nonetheless, an altar on Mar's Hill. However that may be, by the laws of magical evocation, when you evoke "God," you are naming/calling an ancient deity of the dead. This could explain the dour atmosphere at many Protestant services. You might experiment with using "Deus" or "Dea" and see if the mood changes; or, if you want the deity of the Bible, why not evoke Him by name, Jehovah or Yehowah. Avoid embarrassing mistakes. (see illustration opposite.)

¹Waldeman Jochelson's Expedition, 1900.

²"Being dead is a waste of time." c.f. your average classical culture.

³Alternative interpretation: Ghav/Ghuto, "the evoked" one, referred to a "divine energy" associated "with the souls of the dead." The trouble with the history of ideas is that historians all have a different idea of what happened in history.

News of the Groves

On the night of September 17th-18th, Bob Blunt, who has been the Server for Live Oak Grove, performed his Third Order Vigil successfully, and the following morning conducted his first service at the Grove Site in Orinda. Larry Press was the presiding Arch Druid; Susan Zartman was also present to witness. Two noteworthy occurrences: Sue, Larry told me, felt definite immaterial "presences," of animal spirit nature, which, though not unfriendly, were weird. These settled down after a cup of "The Waters of Life" were poured and put out for their perusal. Second, Bob's vigil fire, in the altar's fire pit, may have been a bit too large and bright, as it was spotted by some of our neighbors across the valley, who must have called the fire department. The fire patrol drove up and down the road for a while, but as the Grove Site is not visible from Miner Road, they could see nothing. They never phoned us and nothing came of it. Apparently our protection and invisibility prayers are working. Bob also lead last Sunday's, October 8th's, Service for the group.

Yule Essay: Midwinter

By Emmon Bodfish

ule, Solstice, Greinstad, Sunstop; the Sun, which has been setting each day at a new, more southerly point on the horizon stops its progression. We have reached the "bottom of the year," as the Gaels call it. Midwinter's night was considered a productive night to vigil, and a Yule fire was built, in some traditions around a single log big enough to burn all night. Its flames would welcome the returning Sun at dawn. The sunrise was hailed with shouting, drums, and thanks for the returning of the light.

This is one of the four Solar Holidays of the Druid year. This year it will culminate at 9:30 P.M. December 21st, Pacific Standard Time, and an hour later for each time zone east of the Pacific one; i.e. 5:30 A.M. Universal and Greenwich Time. At this moment the Northern Hemisphere of the Earth will be tipped at its maximum angle away from the sun. Since this is one of the few years in which this event occurs at a convenient hour when most of us are awake, we might try synchronizing our watches all across the country and let out at this moment the shout "Seall" (Pronounced sha-oul) to call back the descending Sun. After all who wants to end up freezing in the dark?

Or go out on Midwinter eve and note the point on the horizon where the sun sets; this is its most Southerly extreme. Do the same for the following dawn, Solstice morning, and from the angle between these two points you can calculate your latitude. (Write in for the formula.) By sightings like this, on these Special Days, the Ancients calculated latitude, the curvature of the Earth, and kept the calendar aligned with the Heavens.

News of the Groves

Since the Celtic year ends on Samhain, elections for the officers of each grove for the coming year are usually held at the Samhain Vigil. Live Oak Grove decided to retain its three officers in their same offices as last year:

Arch Druid	Larry Press
Preceptor	Emmon Bodfish
Server	Bob Blunt

Live Oak Grove participated in the Bay Area Interfaith Council Thanksgiving Pageant, as we have for three years now. Emmon read an old pre-Christian Solstice feast poem and we joined with the other Neo-Pagan groups in a circle dance and Earth blessing. The largely Protestant audience's responses ranged from enthusiasm and surprise to appalled silence, that is, the same as last year.

The Missal-Any Fashion Page

(Direct from Paris, Gaul)

Preserved in the acid water of a peat bog, these clothes date from approximately 400 A.D., but Caesar in his commentaries on Gaul describes virtually identical fashions in the first century B.C. Trends changed only very slowly in those days.

The skirt is wool, sheared from a mature sheep. The plaid pattern is made by threads spun from the wool of a dark brown ram woven into a background of lighter wool from white animals. No dye is used. The cape is made of alternating panels of black and white lamb skin. The dress, shown on the right, is of a finer spun white wool. It is woven in the form of a tube, a circular fabrication technique also used in ancient Greece. Thus there is no side seams. Matching brooches hold the dress at the shoulders. A linen underslip and britches may have been worn under both these garments.

A net cap and moccasin-style shoes complete each ensemble.

The Origins of the Celts and Druids

By Thomas M. Cross

There are certain ideas that have been formed about the Celtic peoples and their mysterious learned men known as the Druids, and unfortunately most of these ideas have inaccurately divorced the Celts and their religious and cultural history from their original Indo-European ancestry, trying to desperately link them with Egyptian, Qabalistic and Semitic or Atlantean ideals. The pseudo-pagan and Wiccans of the Murray, Morganwg and Robert Graves followers who would link the Celtic peoples from some early non-Indo-European fertility-earth-cthonian megalithic types are endless and the idea of a universal Mother-Goddess monotheism having its existence as a teaching of Druids prevails.

Despite the misinformation and the frequent confusion of concepts in early European religion and that of the Celts, the truth has been known for some time. Modern archaeology and research into the myths and comparative studies of cultures present and past has made such good data available for those who seek it and can find it.

To begin with, in dealing with the Celts we are dealing with an ethnic group of various tribes occupying Europe from about 1200 or 800 B.C. to about 30 B.C. and then the peoples remaining to this day in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Brittany, Man and Cornwall. What has been forgotten too often is that the Indo-Europeans were the ancestors of most Germanic, Baltic, Slavic, Roman, Greek, Thracian, Iranian, Afghanistani, Pakistani, and Hind peoples. All of these Indo-Europeans share a common linguistic, cultural and religious (pre-Christian and pre-Islamic) heritage. Many linguistic and comparative pre-historians had discovered the existence of the Indo-Europeans in the last century and in this century. The scholar Georges Dumézil made many an excellent study of links between the Indo-European epics and myths. The Nazi's propaganda had unfortunately created the myth of a master race and that the 'Aryans' (actually Proto-I.e.) or Indo-Europeans were all of the so-called Nordic racial type. The fact is that the Indo-Europeans were at one time mostly of the white race is true and the "Nordic", "alpine" or Brachycephalic type and "Mediterranean" ethnic types were the dominate group and yet they conquered and intermixed with some non-Indo-Europeans as well usually forcing the outsiders to assimilate to the Indo-European way. Most of these conquered folk were of the same race as the Indo-Europeans. In Southern Europe the Mediterranean type dominated, as one moved northward into the central areas the Alpine type dominated and more of a Nordic area in the very far North, but in India as the Aryans had been conquering Semitic types and not assimilating much they ran into the Dasyus or Dravidian types which they subdued and perhaps over the centuries absorbed into the lowest classes in varying degrees until the structure became the caste system.

If any certain race could be classified as the race of the early Indo-European it would probably be the so-called Alpine or Brachycephalic type who were generally rounded headed brunette or brown haired and auburn haired peoples who were mixed with the fair haired tall blonds of the Northern types. What is more important though, is that these peoples domesticated the horse about 5,500 years ago in the steppes of Russia, and developed a strong social and political structure that spread their culture all over Europe and into Asia and would endure for many centuries. In figure 1 there is a diagram illustrating the dispersal of Indo-European language.

Oimeic Essay: Bridgit

By Emmon Bodfish

imeic, the festival of Bride, Bridgit, Bredes, the daughter of Dagda, and Celtic goddess of fire and the hearth. She is also patroness of poetry and inspiration, which the Gaels regarded as an immaterial, supersensual form of flame. Always one of the most prominent and popular deities, the early Christianizers of Ireland were unable to eradicate her name and worship, and instead adopted, (or co-opted) her into their own pantheon as St. Bridgit. According to Charles Squire, she is still the most popular of Irish saints, and is still easily “recognized as the daughter of Dagda. Her Christian attributes, almost all connected with fire, attest her pagan origin. She was born at sunrise; a house in which she dwelt blazed into a flame which reached to heaven; a pillar of fire rose from her head when she took the veil; and her breath gave new life to the dead. As with the British goddess Sul, worshipped at Bath, who, the first century Latin writer Solinus tells us, ‘ruled over the boiling spring and at her altar there flamed a perpetual fire which never whitened into ashes, but hardened into a stony mass,’* the sacred flame on Bridgit’s altar at Kildare was never allowed to go out.”

Bride comes, probably, from the Indo-European stem name Bheth/a which is also the name for the Birch tree. This tree, with its shining white bark, is still known in Gaelic tradition as “Bride’s tree.” Bheth/a is cognate with the Roman Vesta, and also with the Hindu Agni, a fire god whose attributes and rites are perfectly parallel to Bride’s except for the name and sex change (c.f. Larry Press, A.D.)

“Saint” Bridgit’s flame burned on her altar in Kildare from approximately the sixth century until the suppression of the monasteries by Henry VIII of England. “This sacred fire,” quotes Charles Squire, “might not be breathed on by the impure human breath. For nineteen nights it was tended by her nuns but on the twentieth night it was left untouched, and kept itself alight miraculously.” This echoes the old, pre-Roman, Celtic system of counting by twenties, rather than by tens. With so little of her character and ritual changed, the sixth century Irish gladly accepted the new saint in the stead of the old goddess. A careful examination of Irish hagiology would result in the discovery of many other undeserved co-options/canonizations, in which Celtic deities and heroes became Christian worthies.

Bride was the protector of childbirth, the supreme form of creativity, and in the Christian stories and hymns, St. Bridget is portrayed as the “aide woman” or mid-wife of Virgin Mary, though no such figure is mentioned in any of the Nativity gospels. Celtic women prayed to Bride for a safe delivery, and visited her spring with gifts of thankfulness. Fire-springs-fertility is an old, perhaps even pre-Indo-European triad.

As fire is the winter’s indoor sun, Bride’s festival at Oimeic lies opposite the Sun festival of Lughnasadh, Lugh and Bride being seen as balanced opposites in the Celtic pantheon. Balance, rather than hierarchy, is the pattern of the Celtic system of thought. Druidism is a kathenotheism, emphasizing the worship of deities in sequence, each pertaining to a certain season of the year, instead of arranging Them in a permanent hierarchy as in the Greek or Roman polytheisms.

According to Marvin Harris’ Structural Materialism thesis, we worship, love and adore what we need, based on the premise “god, what have you done for us, lately?” Here, at the coldest time of the year, we need a hearth goddess, a protective figure watching over the birth of the lambs, for which Oimeic is named, and assuring the re-birth of Spring.

*A small knowledge of chemistry would make this miracle easy to arrange.

Spring Equinox Essay: Renewal and the Season of Sleep

By Emmon Bodfish

quinox, the beginning of spring, which is marked by the Sun's crossing of the Celestial Equator, the first point of Aries. For a diurnal cycle, the day and night are of equal length. The emphasis of the holiday is on renewal, active preparation for the summer to come. The stones of some of the Megaliths mark this sunrise, by this point the plowing and seeding must be done. In numerous cultures these were sacred activities, from the Charming of the Plow in pagan Germany, a celebration which the Anglo-Saxons brought with them to England, to the ritual plowing of the first furrow in a special sacred field by the reigning Chinese Emperor. Our word for acre, 43,560 sq. ft. of land, comes from the Gaelic word "acadh" meaning a field.

Erec, Erec, Erec,
Mother of Earth
Hail to thee, Earth,
Mother of Men

Be fruitful in God's embrace
Filled with food
For the use of men.

This was written down in the Leechbook circa 950 AD in England. It is the ancient Indo-European Earth Mother and Sky Father, despite five hundred years of Christian influence.

In England, Spring Equinox was celebrated as Lady Day, now fixed at March 25, to make it a dependable legal holiday while the Equinox shifts yearly between the 20th and the 22nd. Before the adoption of the Gregorian calendar in England in 1752, this holiday was the beginning of the New Year, legal and fiscal. In the Gaelic world, the new season, Samhra, wouldn't begin until Bealtaine, but the New Year had commenced on Samhain on November 5th or 6th. Between Samhain and Bealtaine is the "Season of Sleep" and May Day begins the new "Season of Life."

In modern Reform Druidism there is no whiskey, or intoxicant, in the chalice at services all through this Season of Sleep, only distilled water, the Waters-of-Sleep. Only water is poured out in the Offerings to the trees. It is the season of the Pine and the Birch. The latter, Bride's tree, begins her season at Equinox. It has been a time of rest and in-drawing, the re-couping of our energies. Now life starts to re-awaken and we begin preparations for the major celebration of the Druid year, Bealtaine, the full-blown Rose.

And now, by popular demand, another see-and-do article.

Back to the Shadows Again

By Emmon Bodfish

The Druids of folktales were imputed with the power to create a magical mist, the "Cleo Trom" in which to hide themselves or to obscure the field of battle and aid their chieftains' armies. In fact, according to one source, ability to raise the Druid Mist was a test of anyone claiming to be a Fear-droi or a Wizard. This ability is also remembered in fragments of the Ossanic poems and in folklore from the Continent. In his book on magic, Steven Richards remarks that this "Invisibility is the peculiar mark of the Western magician as levitation is of the Oriental one."

In practice, there are different levels of making oneself invisible. At the first level is the crass psychological technique of diverting attention to something else while you quietly walk away, or perform the slight-of-the-hand that completes the trick. Stage magicians, thieves, and Sherlock Holmes are adepts at this one.

On the second level is the method actor's strategy of changing his emotional state, manner and gait such that he seems to turn into (or out to be) someone or something other than who he was, and so to "disappear" into the role. Crowley, working at this level of transformation, tells of the following incident that happened to him in London. When he was walking down a lane, he saw, coming toward him, a group of students who knew him and who were not particularly friendly to him or his ideas. Wishing to avoid their ridicule or worse, he ducked down a side street, but they followed him. The street proved to be a blind end. After stepping into a shop doorway, he rushed back out, having changed his gait and demeanor utterly, and hustled past them in a businesslike way. They did not recognize him and he escaped.

At the third level is something between this technique and that of thought projection or active telepathy. Mrs. Alexander-David Neil describes the first few rings of this level in her book of observations of mystics in India and Tibet. Basically it involves the ability to control your output of emotional energy, your projection of your "presence" in the situation. If you walk through a crowd shouting, bumping against people, and otherwise calling attention to yourself, you will make yourself quite visible. However, if you steal along noiselessly, you may be able to pass without being seen. Animals know this instinctively, and use it to catch their prey. As J.H. Brennan points out, merely sitting motionless cuts down on your visibility. Beast of prey avoid this difficulty by bobbing their heads, creating the illusion of motion. However quiet you are, though, there is still the unquietness generated by your mind. The work of the mind generates an energy which spreads all around the one who produces it, and this energy is felt in various ways by those who come into touch with it. If you can stop even that source of noise, you become as silent as one could be. You maybe seen in the way that a camera "sees" things, but you will not be noticed. No knowledge consciousness, (nampar shespa) follows the visual contact; we do not remember that this contact has occurred.

When the mind inhibits emanation of its radiative energy says Evans-Wentz, it ceases to be a source of mental stimuli to others, so that they become unconscious of the presence of the Adept of the Art just as they are unconscious of invisible beings living in a rate of vibration unlike their own. It is like the ostrich burying his head in the sand. One draws his attention into himself, instead of directing it outward, and by stopping the flow of the mind, turns off the noise. In the most elementary sense, this form of invisibility is just moving along quietly. "The real secret of invisibility is not concerned with the laws of optics at all," writes Crowley. "The trick is to prevent people from noticing you when they normally would do so." As the test of his power, Crowley took a walk in the street in a golden crown and a scarlet robe without attracting attention. Eliphas Levi makes the same point in several of his manuscripts. This non-projection technique of unnoticeability/invisibility is described by this author's friend, who is considerably good at it, as "pull in your vibe." The Druid Mist cannot hide you if you continue to project a strong emotional presence. Some people say this feels like a drawing in of their personal energy, pulling it back in through the area just above the solar plexus.

Begin, then, by becoming mentally silent, calming your emotions until you reach emotional neutrality, having withdrawn your presence into yourself. Being able to stop the sentences flowing through your head is essential to any success in spiritual or psychic endeavors. It is the first rung of the ladder. This is mentioned in so many different religious and magical traditions that it must be accepted as one of the essential ingredients. Second, you must learn to stop, or put aside, the mood of the moment. This means sorting the flow of emotional energy surging up and down the body. We can all do this, if for only a moment. Take for example the experience of waiting for an important phone call. It is important to you to make a good impression. But while you are waiting by the phone, you become involved in a heated argument with another person in the room. Emotion is surging up and down through your body. Then the phone rings; this is it; you must be personable. You stop. That moment of suspension when you have left the argument and before you turn your attention to the phone, is it, the emotional neutral-point. You can learn to prolong that minute of emotional silence.

When you have silenced your mental verbalizations and are holding a neutral emotional stance, pull in your social, interactive energy, and your presence will seem to fade into the background. You have become a shadow. A camera will "see" you sitting there, but you will not be noticed, not will you register on the consciousness or in the memories of other people. As a secondary benefit, this mental state allows you to see the world quite objectively, in increased detail and dimensionality.

To this state of unnoticeability you add the fourth level by forming the Druid Mist. While it is the least understood part of the art of invisibility, it has been used and described for millennia, just as our ancestors could throw a missile accurately without understanding gravity or trajectory. Forming the Cleo Trom may involve the ability to control either light, or matter or perception. The Mist seems to absorb light; it is dull colored, gray, and visually uninteresting, as well as hard for the eye to focus on; it does not make itself noticeable. Forming it requires preparation and practice. First, you must train yourself to be able to concentrate on one thing for a fairly long time, ten to twenty minutes. Training the attention and developing the will are basics in all magical traditions. It makes the difference between magic as psychic phenomena and magic as wishful thinking. In learning these skills, small amounts of practice daily works better than long sessions, infrequently. The learning may take anywhere from two weeks to two years, but there are interesting experiences along the way.

Begin by getting mentally silent and emotionally calm. Staring at a dark, plain background, relax your vision, focusing in the middle distance. Concentrate your will and energy on a point in mid-air four or five feet in front of you.

Madame Blavatsky found it helped to think of willing the matter making up the air to gather and concentrate at this point. This may require a number of practice sessions of ten to twenty minutes each. When the Mist starts to form, it is grayish and almost invisible. You may only notice that you can no longer see the texture of the dark backdrop. For some reason there is a tendency at first for the eyes to cross while practicing this, so privacy is recommended. ("Just what we need...a gonzo wizard." cf. Bored of the Rings) After you have produced some of the Mist, you can counter its tendency to disperse by willing it to spin counter clockwise and contract. When you have gathered a mass of the Mist, a good amount which you can definitely see, the final step is to place it where you want it to be, between yourself and noxious stimuli or yourself and other persons. My consultant describes the technique as holding the Cleo with your eyes and pulling it along with your gaze. A woman mystic whom Madame Blavatsky interviewed during her oriental travels, collected and controlled the Mist by moving her hands as though gathering something together and guiding it. This would be the mudra approach. It is a technique widely used by Western mediums. When you think you can form the Mist reliably, success is always sporadic at first, try practicing with a full length mirror, placed eight or ten feet away from you. This way you can see how much of your reflection is blotted out by what looks like a grayish film on the surface of the mirror. Until you are very adept, be cautious of inviting friends to watch. The phenomena requires all of your concentration, and because friends are more disturbing to it than strangers. Anything that evokes an emotional response from you dissipates the effect. When you are well practiced, it is possible to get up, wrapping the Cleo Trom around you like a circular curtain and move about unobtrusively, unnoticed by those around you. But you must maintain the psychological silence and physical unobtrusiveness described as Level Three, or people will become aware of your presence, though not of the details of your physical appearance. H.S. Lewis tells an interesting account of this in one of his autobiographical essays. He was practicing forming the mist in a cafeteria, in order to shut out the noise of the people around him and be undisturbed. When he finished his meal, and went to pay, he recognized the owner of the establishment, an old acquaintance of his, working the cash register. He spoke to the man in a friendly way, but his friend treated him coldly, like a peculiar stranger and would give him no indication of recognition. On his way out of the restaurant, Lewis realized that he still had some of the Cleo Trom wrapped about him, not having dispersed it. This is usually done by dismissing it with your mind, willing it to disperse outward and upward, or in counter-clockwise swirls away from you. Some people find it is only necessary to "let go of it from the will."

"The Mist begin to gently lift.

The air begin to clear."

The Mist will disperse naturally as you put your attention on immediate matters and become re-involved with the business of the day and the emotions of the moment.

Photographs I have seen of people practicing holding the Cleo Trom around themselves, show an unfocused area, or streaked appearance in the place of the person's image.

This may seem small stuff compared to descriptions in the old sagas, but even in the Iron Age, it required a fair number of Druids to obscure a battlefield.

The outfit is of brown wool with a short tunic above, which is fastened in front with a bone pin, made from a human fibula. Below is a full length, gathered skirt, tied with an eight foot sash sporting elaborate tassels. The square of cloth on the left above the tassel detail is a wrap-around underskirt, and to my knowledge the only extant example of La Tene lingerie. Neck torc, bracelets, gold spiral earrings and sandals complete the ensemble. Dagger and shield optional.

Beltane Essay: Indo-European Drink and Sacrifice

By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, festival of the Sun, celebrates the long and eagerly awaited return of the Waters of Life to Grove chalices of the R.D.N.A. Use of the divine drink as sacrament, channel to the gods and restorer of mortal and Divinity alike, is an ancient Indo-European concept. It is found in a highly developed form in the Rig Veda, written down circa 1600 B.C. and the custom may go back two to three thousands years before to the Proto-Indo European homeland on the steppes of Asia. The Indo-European tribes early learned the use of fermentation processes both of milk products as yogurt, etc. known to many pastoral races, and, perhaps by extension, the fermentation of honey into Mead. Juices of other, psychotropic plants were preceded and added to this, by some of the later Indo-European tribes, notably the Vedic branch in the Ganges Valley where such herbs abound.

Fraser and others have collected and reconstructed Indo-European ideas surrounding the divine drink and its use, and the origin of sacrament from sacrifice. The early Indo-Europeans saw humanity as originally mortal, and the gods as immortal, and their myths tell how immortality was achieved by certain human beings, or in some branches of the Indo-European spectrum, made available to humanity in general. The Hebrew and Chinese mythologies took the reverse view: animals and humans were originally immortal as Adam and Eve in Eden, or the "First Man" before the dividing up of Chaos. Then, through some fall, death came into the world. In the theme, a hero or demi-god's discovery or theft of a divine potion makes him immortal and able to communicate with the divine powers. The potion is then lost, through trickery or deceit, but sometimes an Earthly version of the drink remains with a promise of future immortality. Consumption of a Sacred drink is used both in initiatory rites and as a group bonding ritual in religions from Ireland to India. The Eucharist may be the Christianization of this ritual; it does not spring from any Orthodox Hebrew rite. Dr. Duran characterizes Christianity as "a very much Indo-Europeanized, Semitic religion." Holy food is more characteristic of other cultures, Semitic, African or Amerindian, while the deified drink is Indo-European. The drink not only inspires, but is thought to be a god, a divine thing in itself, or to contain the essence of a divine being. This led Fraser and Rutherford to associate it with the deified sacrificial victim of other sacrificing religions, but Dumézil and other modern students of religion have repudiated this idea. It is an area where experts still disagree. However, its consumption is treated as an act of sacrifice; an offering up to the gods of the drink and of oneself or one's consciousness, (at least temporarily.) This maintains the human connection to the Divine, as well as maintaining the immortal vigor of the Deities thus worshipped. This is explicitly set out in the Rig Veda, and similar descriptions are preserved from the West: The sacrifices to Euses, the Horse Sacrifice of the High Kings of Ireland, libation ceremonies in Greece, and in the Slavic areas, wine or mal rituals to Perun. Statues of Perun held a drinking horn into which a sacred liquor was poured during a spring rite, perhaps even Beltaine, and in which the priest caste then read hopes for the year's crops were read through the liquid's behavior. Perun is cognate with Taranis and Thor as the thunderbolt wielding god of the Oak.

Perun

Stone Idols from Satchany in the Upper Dniester basin.

Structural anthropologists connect the deified drink rite with the "dying-god" motif, which is not an exclusively Indo-European theme, but wide-spread in the Old World. This connection is exemplified in the song of "John Barleycorn," who dies with the harvest in order to feed the people, but rises again in the Spiritus of the ale, and in the sprouting grain of the spring. However, I think these two themes were only merged at a much later date, after the Indo-Europeans had scattered from their steppes homeland. There is no trace of the latter motif in the earliest Indo-European record, the Rig Veda, or in the reconstructed Proto-Indo-European vocabulary.

The young year god, Osiris, Dionysus resurrection theme seems to be part of the pre Indo-European strata of the Eastern Mediterranean. And in Europe, the dying Corn King tradition seems to be older than the Celtic Bardic records and has no official place in Druid doctrine. Though Dumézil also repudiated this "ambrosia cycle," he later, in 1939 re-affirmed the parallel between the Germanic and Indic accounts of obtaining the vessel, cauldron or chalice to hold the deified drink. This vessel grew in importance, and takes precedence in the later mythology of the Western Indo-Europeans over its contents. Anything drunk from the sacred bowl grants divine inspiration. The vessel and the ritual, and the readiness of the participant, (set and setting) become more important than the particular intoxicant. This is the stance taken by the RDNA and discussed in the Later Chronicles, making us a descendent of the Celtic and Western most wavelet of the great Indo-European expansion and evolution. Thus Beltaine, beginning the summer and the Druid Season of Life, sees the return of the Waters of Life to the chalices of RDNA Groves across the country, and to our subscribers if they are holding Proto Grove services, in such unlikely places as Melbourne and Hong Kong.* Since Samhain no liquor has been used, only the Waters of Sleep, pure distilled H₂O, in the sharing-cup. Concomitant with this holiday, the Third Order Druids, clergy rank, exchange their white ceremonial ribbons for red. At Live Oak Grove, a Maypole dance follows the Beltaine service, and a general partying and merry-making may continue till sundown.

Dearest Live Oak Grove,

The Greenwood Grove is still alive here in the Emerald City and wishing you a joyous Spring. We are greatly encouraged each time we get your newsletter and appreciate your fine articles. The one on "the fag" was super. I'm enclosing some cash to pay our postage and help you out.

We have stayed about 20 in number, working together for almost four years...with the same people. Our primary orientation is healing and music. We are not very public but more like an extended family.

Our band "Laughter & Love" should be performing at the C.O.G. festival Aug 23-26 in Northern California. It would be great fun to meet some of you there and swap grove stories. Keep in touch, especially if you're coming to the festival.

While she sleeps,

Two Remarkable Inscribed Stones

The first stone is located in western Colorado on a remote canyon ledge, overlooking a broad valley with a stream.

"The dolmen is four feet across the top and has three placed stones holding it above the ledge in a level position approximately six feet from the cliff face. The Ogam on the top of the capstone is intermixed with cupule-like depressions ranging in size from 7-1/2" to 9-1/2" long, 3" to 3-1/2" wide and 1-1/4" to 1-1/2" deep in the center. The cupule-like depressions are very striking because of their uniformity, smoothness and peculiar shape. The Ogam on the side of the capstone is abundant and occasionally connecting with lines on the top. The surface of the dolmen was obviously smoothed and prepared for the inscriptions. The actual age is unknown but the desert varnish on the Ogam, the depressions, and the smoothed surface is substantial."

Poison Oak and Plantain

Now, at the beginning of Poison Oak season, Carlene Skeffington of New Hampshire offers the following:

A Live Plantain Leaf

In June, when my right thumb and forearm broke out in an extensive poison oak rash, I remembered reading an article that suggested rubbing leaves of Plantago spp. On the affected area. I tried it, and the itching and redness and swelling stopped! With experimentation I found that it was best to extract the juices from the leaves by crushing them in a mortar before applying it to the rash. Only one application each morning for about ten days was necessary. The most effective were the healthy leaves with prominent linear ribbing and as few hairs as possible. Leaf hairs act as an irritant if rubbed directly into the wound.

An Tús Y Dehcrau

A Proto Indo-European Creation story reconstructed from Greek, Norse and Hindu-Rig Vedic sources compared with Irish and Welsh tales.

An Tús Y Dehcrau

In the Beginning, there was nothing
Nothing is something
Something which exploded and expanded
Expanding and evolving Evolving and dividing
Dividing into many things
But no one was there to witness it

The nothingness was called Ginnungagap by the Norse
It was called Chaos by the ancient Greeks
It was a pre-world involving an opposite of fire and water
Fire and Water and all of the elements from which all began
It was evolving in to the non-world or otherworld called Annwfn by the Welsh, in it flowed many rivers melting ice, creating steam between the coldness and the fire

Fire became light of the heavens, (Ouranos/Uranus) appeared
 There were many Giants which were the land masses
 There was darkness and she was called Night (Nat or Nox)
 A Giantess became the Earth Mother and she nourished her son, the largest Giant of All called Ymir by the Norse and Cronus by the Greeks.

Titans was the Greek name for these great giants who ruled the earth, the Norse called them Frost Giants, and the Celts of Ireland called them Fomors.

They hid the treasures of the soil within them until
 The Gods were born and a hero among them appeared A God of great strength. The gods were Olympians among the Greeks, Aesir and Vanir among the Norse, and the Tuatha De Danann or Plant Dôn among the Celts of Ireland and Wales.
 These were the immortal Devas of the Rig Veda.

The Gods slew the Earth-Born Giant (Ymir, Cronus, Purusha-Yama)

The victor was the leader called Zeus by the Greeks, Odin, Vili and Ve of the Norse, or perhaps Lugh or Lleu of the Celts.
 The Earth Born Giant's corpse was used to build the land for the humans and heavens for the Gods. Thus the first sacrifice, Thus the good things of the earth are free. They eye of Balor was made the bright circle of the sun by Lugh, the skull of Ymir became the land called Asgard where Valhalla was prepared as a heaven for valiant warriors.

But there were still many Fomors, giants, dwarfs, elves, Cyclopes and Hecatoncheires around who would sometimes oppose the Olympians, Aesir and Vanir, or Tuatha De Danann.
 A giant called Pontus or Aegir or Lir/Llyr was the sea, but Oceanus, or Neptune or Poseidon and Mannanan/Manawydan ruled over it. The waters encircled the land of earth...

Below was an underworld where the dead came back to Chaos or Annwn from whence he came or she came...The spirit traveled back to the ancestors and could dwell in Blessed Isles of the Other world where the sun came down through the Western Horizon.

A Druid Missal-Any Summer Solstice 1984 Volume 8 Number 4

Summer Solstice Essay: Danu and Megaliths

By Emmon Bodfish

Midsummer Solstice, one of the four minor High-days of the Celtic year, is associated with Danu, Mother of the gods, the Tuatha de Danann. She is particularly associated with rivers, and rivers from the Don in Russia to the Don in Scotland are thought to be named for her. She is probably the same figure as the Irish goddess Anu and the Breton Ana. Roman Diana and Greek Artemis may be other cognates of the same Indo-European deity. This is based not only on the study of word origins, but on the witness of Gallo-Roman writers who noted the similarities in the character and in season of worship to those of Diana, during the time when the Celtic religion was still practiced in Gaul. Like classical Diana, her totem is the boar, and she is associated with fertility and marriage, and the luckiness of June marriages may be distant memory of her festivities. Mugwort is her flower, an herb also sacred to Roman Diana, and on Isle of Man it is customary to wear a spring of it to the Mid-Summer dance. In England, Mugwort placed under the pillow is said to bring a young woman dreams of her future husband. In Scotland, there are all night bonfires, song fests, and dances for the young unmarried people of the villages.

This is the morning on which the Sun used to rise over the heel stone at Stone henge, beginning the new season of the Megalithic calendar. (It no longer rises at that point due to the precession of the Earth's axis.) The Druids did NOT build Stonehenge. It antedates their arrival in Britain by centuries. It was William Stuckeley, in 1717, who mis-located the Druids there. He did some of the best antiquarian field work of his day, but his theorizing later wildly outstripped his data. The mistake was an honest one, however, considering what was known in his day. He showed that the stones were not a memorial to King Arthur, nor a Roman temple. He was the first to accept them as definitely pre-Roman. The only knowledge of pre-Roman Britain he had came from Roman and Greek writers of the Classical period. They said that Britain was inhabited by Celts whose priests were the Druids. So, if the stones were pre-Roman, Stuckeley reasoned, they must have been built by Druids. He knew of no other candidates. The last two centuries of archeology have given us many, even too many, other possibilities. The current most favored candidates are the early Neolithic framers of Natufian stock, long headed, slender, fine-boned people who inhabited the Salisbury area in 2900-2600 B.C., the best modern date for the first cycle of building at Stone Henge.

A larger boned, hardier people later took over the monument and set up the Blue Stones, but they, too, had disappeared before the arrival of the Halstatt Celts circa 480 B.C.

This is not to say that the Celts did not take cognizance of the huge monument. They worked other monuments of prehistoric peoples, such as the mounds, Sidh, of Ireland and the cairns of Scotland into their mythology and song. They may have done the same for Stone Henge, but the English traditions are almost all lost, while the Irish are among the best preserved.

"Behold the Sidh before your eye,
It is manifest to you that it is a king's mansion,
Which was built by the firm Dagda
It was a wonder, a court, an admirable hill."

It is likely that the religion of the Megalith Builders was more astronomical than that of the La Tene and later Druids. Two or more different groups contributed to the five or more cycles of construction and re-construction at Stone Henge. Though astronomically aligned, the stones are not accurate enough for an "observatory." It may have served as a calendar rectifier, eclipse predictor, and a ritual site for the Megalithic religion. But what that religion was must remain a matter of conjecture. Clearly it had something to do with sunrise, midsummer, moonrise, and lunar eclipses, but what it meant, and what they did here, is probably not recoverable short of the invention of a time machine.

Summer Solstice will occur at 10:02 P.M. PDT, on June 20, and will be celebrated in a sunset service 7:30 on that day. Regular Druid services will be held at 1:00 P.M. PDT at the Grove Site on May 27, July 1, 15, and 29. For details and rides call (415) 254-1387.

Mugwort

A friend of mine tried the experiment of sleeping with Mugwort under her pillow and reported last year that she had no dreams at all. "I guess I'm just going to stay single." And she is still fancy-free (after a close escape in November) she plans to try the experiment again. If any of you want to try this, you can get mugwort in most herb shops. Not only does my remote location and lack of leadership ability make me a stunningly inappropriate Matriarch of Bards, I also have a strong feeling that the Bards are better off unled. Art for Art's sake is a pretty anarchistic concept, and Art for the Gods' sake requires direct communication with the Gods; i.e., inspiration. I would like to propose to the ODAL that:

- A) I resign as MOO, leaving no successor.
- B) Anyone wishing investiture as a Bard should be recognized and invested by the local AD
- C) Anyone who wants to be so recognized has to put their mouth where their mouth is, by presenting some original work to the local grove, and that a text or tape of this work should then be presented to a central Archives.

Lughnasadh Essay: Rosmearta

By Emmon Bodfish

ughnasadh is known in Modern Irish as La Lunasa, in Welsh as Gwyl Awst, (August Feast), as Lla Lluanys or Laa 'n Ouyr (day of the Harvest Season) in Manx and as Lammas, Apple Day and Harvest Home in English. It is the anniversary of the funeral games given by Lugh, the God of All Crafts, in honor of his Father. Essentially a harvest festival, this signals the beginning of the harvest season and the ripening of the apples.

This holiday is a day of mixed joy and woe (Irish wakes in the old tradition) for it is now obvious that the days are getting shorter. Stories of the battles between Lugh and Balor (the good Sun-Fire God and the bad one) are retold, as the autumn quarter of "Foghamhar" begins."

—The Druid Chronicles

A much cited but little understood goddess of the Celtic pantheon is Rosmearta, consort of one of the Mercury-like gods, though which one is not certain. It was probably not Lugh himself, whose story and exploits are fairly well known, at least in Irish tradition. She may have been associated with the Gaulish or Welsh Lugh, according to a piece of information from one of our Grove members, but there is no reference for it in any pre-medieval source we can find. His Gaulish name, Lugus, was known to the Romans, but it is not mentioned in connection with Rosmearta. Lugh's wife is Eriu or Erin in the Irish literature. In any case, she seems to have functioned independently of her consort, judged by the number of her references, shrines and place names that have survived. Her name is found in twenty-one different inscriptions, in Roman letters, on monuments in Gaul, dating from the first few centuries A.D. Caesar, Lucan, and later Latin chroniclers tell us that she was very popular, receiving much worship and tribute from the native Gauls.

One derivation of her name, (Branston, L.G. of E.) spring from the Celtic roots:

Ro = much, exceedingly

Smeart = smear, anoint

Branston cites the use of the term, smearta, in an early Cuchulain tale, in which the Irish hero smears with blood a false beard which he has made for himself from grasses. Besmearing his face, he effects a disguise. This fits with the Roman report of her popularity if she was "The much Anointed One." Celtic deity's statues and artifact were often anointed with precious oils, or with the blood of vanquished enemies when that deity was beseeched for favors or thanked for victories.

There is a sanctuary, on the Boyne in Ireland, called Rosmaree, which may be that of her Irish cognate. It is a high mound, of Bronze Age origin, and Medieval Legend tells of a speaking stone connected with it which gave answers to questions about all past deeds and events. It was appealed to in order to settle disputes or establish guilt, much to the despair of the Christian monks, who recorded the custom. Local folklore has it that even up to a century or so ago, no one passed by the stone, whose name is Drui Toreime, without dismounting and paying her homage. It was seen, apparently, as a female being.

This idea of giving answers and of knowing the past, of the actions of all mortals, adds credence to the second derivation of her name, Rosmearta, from the Indo-European root Smer, to think, to remember, to share or portion out.

Ro = much

Smer = remembering, allotting

Ta = from ti, tia, female, she

The All Remembering One

The Apportioner

Her other attributes, her associations with vegetation, grain and Earth-bounty, which she meets out are consistent with the allotting function. She shares this function with another set of supernatural beings whose names derive from the same I.E. root, Smer. These are the Early Greek Moira, and the Germanic Norns, especially the middle Norn, Verthandi. In Greek her title is Lachesis, from lot, distribution, share. A more distant connection can be made to the Italic Parcae, also originally goddesses of vegetation, fertility and birth. But these three powers act differently in the Northern countries than they did among the Indo-Europeans of the Mediterranean. The Norns, Wyrd, and their cognates have none of the feeling of foreknowledge and predestination about them that characterize the Classic Fates. For Homer, the Fates' decision was unavoidable, even if one had foreknowledge and will. The Norn do not control the future. They set out one's circumstances, one's lot, and then record human action as present evolves into past. They do not control our action, but only mark them down, layer by layer, weaving the present into the past.

All these deities have in common the ancient link to vegetation and to the allotment of each person's share in life, but in Celtic and Norse they are not concerned with the future, nor do they have the power and feeling of predestiny this implies. This concept, which in later Hellenic times attached itself to the Fates (and by way of Classic trained scholars to King Arthur's Merddyn), entered Europe with Christianity, there to cause numerous philosophical problems which hardly ended with Calvin. The Indo-European apportioning goddesses give only talents and setting. Greatness, as the poems of Cuchulain and Beowulf, and the Ossianic Fennians make clear, depends on what each person does with their portion. Rosmearta seems to have been a goddess who was thanked for success, harvest and victory.

Rosmearta can be beseeched with incense and aromatic oils to give us the circumstances in which we can be successful. (Blood is not to the modern aesthetic, unless you're a hunter or a beef rancher.) Of course, we must know what these circumstances would be if we're to ask for them and to recognize them when they occur. She can be thanked on Lughnasadh, along with Lugh and Danu, the Earth Mother, for the harvest that now begins, for our share.

When we ran out of checks, I went into Hibernia Bank, where we have our account and was directed to see the officer in charge of printing. She had a little fir tree of the left-over from Christmas variety in a red plastic pot on her desk. It was dry, turning brown and sending out distress signals. When I touched one of its brown needles, it fell off. "You should water that; it's dying." She looked up for a second "Huh?" "You should give it some water. It's suffering and it's not yet a year old." She changed the subject "What can I do for you?" "I want to order more checks." "Yes. What's the name of the account?" "Reformed Druids of North America, Inc." She gave me a long, very strange look, and then said, "I really will water it. I promise."

Druids are an ancient order of worship, older than the Roman empire. In 55BC, Julius Caesar reported them as prayer amid great groves of oak and to have burning alive human captives in towering wicker effigies. There remain today two hundred forty thousand practicing Druids near whose rites are as arcane today as when Caesar was alive and musing.

Fall Equinox Essay: Cernunnos

By Emmon Bodfish

Equinox approaches the time sacred to Cernunnos, the Hunter God. "Now is come September, the Hunter's Moon begun..."¹ as Holly sings it, and now is the time of Cernunnos, the god of the hunt, the immortal shaman invoking and controlling the quarry. In Gaul, an altar was dedicated to him below what is now Paris. He is one of the prototypes of that inexhaustible figure, The Horned Man.

As Master of the Animals, he embodies their spirits and can parley with them, bringing game to the hunter, or protecting and sustaining cattle and flocks. As the Woods-god, he directs primary energy, the life forces, creative, magical, and procreative of animals and wilderness. As the Shaman-god his function is to be a connecting link between the human and non-human worlds, and to balance the two with their opposing tensions. From these two roles flow his later attributes, God of Wealth, magician, juggler, and Lord of the Dance.

He is appealed to to communicate to the spirit of the animals to let one of their number be taken for food, to make the cattle flourish, and to increase the herds. Most pagan cultures believe that it is not prudent or even possible to catch game or raise an animal for slaughter without its permission on the spiritual level. This is always a bargain, requiring the prey's cooperation. Ritual and honor must be paid to prey species, or to the Master of Cattle, in return.

Though Margaret Murray was ridiculed for suggesting it in the '30s, it has since become clear that we are dealing with a Paleolithic cult in the Horned God, yet one that has continued down to the present day. This shows a strong, basic archetypal appeal. Like all good archetypes, he has multiple and voluminous levels of meaning

In Celtic mythology, he forms a triad with Eusus and Sylvanus. As with other Celtic triple divinities, these may be different facets of the same being. He is close on the left side to Eusus, god of the underworld and riches, and on the right to Sylvanus, Wood spirit, god of vegetation, the Green Man. The links with wealth and death on one hand and magic and fecundity on the other go all the way back to Cernunnos' stone age roots. Around the pictures of horned men on cave walls are other pictures, most of them of animals. All were animals which were important in the hunt, but which were dangerous to hunt. Species known to have been hunted, but which are not dangerous, are not represented. These animals, deer, bison, bulls, wolves, horses are ones that have to be reckoned with, and this was done magically. As the Finn-Ugric and Siberian hunters, heirs to Paleolithic Europe, explained it in the 19th century, there are three things the hunter wants to insure: that he kill the quarry and that it not kill him. That is that his spirit, mana or tapa, overcome the animal's spirit. And thirdly, he wants to insure that his hunting not cause the prey species to flee or to become depleted. He wishes to propitiate the spirits of the animals for the loss of some of their number, and to insure the fertility of the herd and secure its increase. Among many Northern European peoples, it was important to assure the animal killed of a way to be reborn, to come back and continue its life. Its bones were collected and treated with special funeral rites and magic to aid this return. Ideas presaging the concept of reincarnation are common to Eurasian hunter cultures and south to the Caucasus and the Indo-European homelands. Here, then are the Cernunnos' triad's attributes:

Success-Wealth Underworld-Death	Magic	Fertility Reincarnation

with magic as the connecting link or directing force which humans and gods assert, influencing the course of events for their benefits.

Cernunnos is the Gaulish deity whom Caesar equated with Roman Mars. This was more than chance resemblance. There is some evidence of for their common I.E. roots. Mars was not always a god of war. Originally he was a god of vegetation. Cato and Varro concur on this, telling us that it was to Mars that the farmers prayed for good crops and prosperity, and for protection of their cattle. He had an old title, from pre-Republican days, of Mars Silvanus, Mars of the Woods. The elements of War and martial spirit were later connected with him when Rome began its expansions and conquest. There is a myth recorded in Plutarch's "Parallela," in which Mars takes on a mortal woman as his lover. Her name is Silvia; she bears him a son whose soul is contained in a spear.

Mars War Plunderer	Mamurius Veturius Fecundity Venus' Lover	Mars Silvanus God of the Wood Protector of Cattle
------------------------------	---	---

At the other end of the Indo-European spectrum, in Vedic India, is the figure of Rudra, who may be cognate with Mars. He is the patron of the Keshin, long haired, woods-dwelling ascetics. And there is reason to think that Sylvanias, Silvanus, and Shiva are the same. The latter two share similar myths of travels in the Underworld. If we accept the Irish Wildman-of-the-Woods, Mad Suibhni (Swee' nee) as a late Christian euhemerization of Sylvanias/Cernunnos, then the Celtic Horned-god(s) made similar journeys to the Underworld, under or inside Magic Mountains. All these tales include a visit to a female figure who lives inside the Mountain and who is the source of wealth or knowledge. In Siberia she is the Reindeer Mother. Among the early Greeks she is the Bear Mother. On Shiva's journey, she is Devi, Madam Bramha, conqueror of the Bull-Demon, bulls, cattle, and herds. In the Caucasus she is Mother of the Dead, who suckles the soul of the newly dead, as the Reindeer Mother suckles each would-be shaman who finds his way through the labyrinth to her cave. There is nothing like her in African, Chinese, or Australian myths, no source figure who is a Lady-inside-a-Mountain. She is an Eur-Asian figure, probably of Paleolithic origin. In her, we may be seeing who "Venus of Willendorf" was.² Similar Magdalenian and Gravettian female figurines have been found far down in caves and caverns under mountains in France and Switzerland. These caves are often difficult and dangerous to climb down into, yet the walls are elaborately painted with figures of animals and outlined handprints of humans, or whole rooms painted red with ochre.

Footprints in the hardened clay show that dances and ceremonies were held here around her figurines, or around clay models of gravid or copulating bison. Here someone painted on the wall the famous “dancing sorcerer” of the Arièges, the proto-type of the Horned Man.

Cernunnos, King of the Wood, Lord of the Animals, he can be appealed to for difficulties with pets or with wild animals. His color is brown, burn aromatic woods or pine pitch or incense. Brown is a very special color; it is not found in the spectrum. It is a mixture of red and green with yellow for warm brown, or blue for cool brown mixed in, in lesser quantities. But there is no brown light. The sensation, brown, is created within the human visual system. This is fitting for Cernunnos, the mind-traveler, the shaman. Francis of Assisi, preaching to the birds, living in the forest, and specifying humble brown robes of local material for his Order, was in the old I.E. tradition of the Holy-Man-in-the-Woods. These old currents of thought change direction and name, but do not die out as quickly and as easily as textbook history would portray.

Cernunnos can best be experienced out-of-doors in the woods or wild places. After 2:00 a.m., and the last lights are out and radios off, even fairly tame bits of the out-of-doors, backyards, and gardens return essentially to Nature. Smells and sounds change. Try sitting like Cernunnos in his Gunderstrup pose in this setting.

If you cannot find a horned serpent, use some other symbol of the Mountain Mother,² and a torc, sign of the warrior and of his bond to his patron deity.

Suibhne the Wild Man in the Forest

Little antlered one, little belling one, melodious little bleater, sweet I think the lowing that you make in the glen.

Home-sickness for my little dwelling has come upon my mind, the calves in the plain, the deer on the moor.

Oak, bushy, leafy, you are high above trees; hazel bush, little branchy one, coffer of hazel-nuts.

Alder, you are not spiteful, lovely is your colour, you are not prickly when you are in the gap.

Blackthorn, little thorny one, black little sloe-bush; water-cress, little green-topped one, on the brink of the blackbird’s well.

Saxifrage of the pathway, you are the sweetest of herbs; cress, very green one; plant where the strawberry grows.

Apple-tree, little apple-tree, violently everyone shakes you; rowan, little berried one, lovely is your bloom.

Bramble, little humped one, you do not grant fair terms; you do not cease tearing me till you are sated with blood.

Yew, little yew, you are conspicuous in graveyards; ivy, little ivy, you are familiar in the dark wood.

Holly, little shelterer, door against the wind; ash-tree, baneful, weapon in the hand of a warrior.

Birch, smooth, blessed, proud, melodious, lovely is each entangled branch at the top of your crest.

Aspen as it trembles, from time to time I hear its leaves rustling, and think it is the foray...

If on my lonely journey I were to search the mountains of the dark earth, I would rather have the room for a single hut in the great Glenn mBolcáin.

Good is its clear blue water, good its clean stern wind, good its cress-green watercress, better its deep brooklime.

Good its pure ivy, good its bright merry willow, good its yewy yew, better its melodious birch...

At service August 12th, we found, to our dismay, that a rabbit had drowned in the Toll Uaigh. Though we buried it deeply beside Pithus, the evergreen member of our Grove Circle, the smell, probably from the mud at the bottom of the Toll, was, for a week or so, out of this world. (Pithus = pine. Pines are the trees of the dead.) During that week no deer came to eat our roses; no rabbits ripped up our clover and vole activity was at an all time low for the summer.

Maybe the Druids in the Groves of Esus back around 200 B.C., had the right idea; hang a few dead bodies from the trees and your Grove's flowers won't be devoured by marauding wildlife. Or as one of them was reputed to have muttered to Caesar's scribe; "Sacrifice, shmacrifice, it keeps the darn deer out of here."

At the meeting after services August 26th, it was decided to buy two more pine trees to plant East of the Grove Site to help screen us from view. It was also decided not to respond to the inquiry from the Institute for the Study of American Religion until we find out more about them.

Tom Cross found the following interesting reference to Lugh, in Welsh Lleu.

"In some other Welsh versions (of the Lleu mythology) not preserved by the Mabinogi, but mentioned by Gwynn Thomas in "Welsh Folklore and Folk Customs," it is said that Gwydion called after Lleu and chased him through the starry heavens, and it is added that Lleu was called Huan, which is a Welsh synonym for sun. This is the only direct reference to Lleu, or Lugh, to connect him with the Sun...which was not the product of some (later day) weird speculator." Otherwise Lugh as a Sun god stands unsupported, at least in Welsh. However, "There are references to Lugh begin a cobbler along with Gwydion, in the tale of Math Fab Mathonwy. And in the Lugoves, in Spain, which is named after this Pan Celtic deity, is the home of a Guild of Shoemakers. (The town) was called Lugos in Roman times." Lugh was the god of all crafts, and portrayed as competent in all of them, but his skill as a cobbler seems to have been particularly important. "Therefore, I believe that the Leiprechan or Leprachaun of Ireland are a fairy type derived from Lugh, the Samildanach Master of Arts and Crafts." Leprechauns as the people of Lugh, would have the precedent of the name derivation system that gives the Cornish as the people of Cernunnos, or the Rosmertis as the people of Rosmertia and the Irish as the people of the land of Eriu.

Relative to this year's Beltaine article discussing the Druids' relationship to and possible opinions about the Megalithic Stone Circles, a student of John Mitchell called to say there is indeed evidence that the Celts noticed and incorporated Megalithic monuments and lore into their own traditions. Among the Bardic survivals in Wales are some instructions as to how to lay out a Gorsedd's Circle, which should be built on conspicuous high ground, for holiday celebrations. The description of the placement of the stones or markers, aligned with high day sunrises, and the number of markers used, three for Beltaine, and Samhain, at the sunrise points, two for the Equinoxes, one for each Solstice, agrees with the construction of Boscawen-un Circle in Cornwall and the Tregeseal Circle near St. Just. Other Scottish and Irish megalithic monuments may have originally followed this plan, too. Either the Bards, or their forerunners the Celts, studied the deserted Stone Circles and incorporated their plan into Bardic ritual, or the Megalithic Builders, some of whom, such as the Windmill Hill Community, who were Indo-European, and the Celts both drew from the same ancient source. We would be inclined toward the first alternative. The evidence he cited in Michell and Aubrey Burl makes it clear that the Circles' stones marked the same High Days celebrated by the Celts.

It is becoming clear that the ancient Britons had far more astronomical knowledge than would be necessary just to keep the calendar rectified. J. Bronowski adherents feel that more would not have been necessary for "primitive" man and that therefore more knowledge was not sought. I would plead that innate human curiosity, if no other reason, would prompt further study of the heavens once some astronomical studies had begun. But think of the power it would give an ancient priesthood to be able to predict solar and lunar eclipses. The equinoxes and the solstices may be enough to keep the calendar aligned, but to predict and seem to control, solar and lunar eclipses would keep the king, the warriors and the rabble in line. From a paleo-political point of view this would not have been useless knowledge, but quite practical. Eclipse prediction does not require advanced mathematics, only observations over extended periods. The keeping of careful records over long periods of time is just the sort of thing at which ancient priesthoods excelled.

One of our members says, after reading the article on the "Wizard Light" in the Lughnasadh, 1982, issue, that she can remember creating this phenomenon for herself when she was a child. (Commercial: you, too, can order back issues and read them. Just 50 cents each with a SASE) Her older sisters would shut her in a closet or the coalroom to tease her. It being pitch dark in there and boring, she would amuse herself by generating sparkly lights and making them form into patterns and geometric designs. She says she never thought of herding them all together into a ball of light bright enough to see by.

Autumn Equinox will be celebrated at the Grove site at Live Oak Grove on September 22, 1:27 PDT which corresponds to astronomical Equinox, 20:27 Greenwich. Regular services will be at 1:00 PDT, that is Solar NOON, on September 9th and October 7th and 21st. Samhain will occur at 6:38 P.M. Pacific Standard Time on November 6th. Celebration will start at Sundown, approximately 5:00P.M. PST. Election of officers for 1985 will be held, as provided in The Druid Chronicles, at this service.

Notice:

Election of next year's officers will take place at the Samhain service and meeting, as listed above. This is our annual meeting as a Non-profit Corporation. The elected officers, to wit Archdruid, Preceptor, and Server, are our official Board of Directors, and will be making policy for a year. Start thinking about who you want to see in these offices. Archdruid must be fully ordained Third Order Druid. Preceptor must be at least Second Order, Server may be any Grove member. Archdruid handles religious matters, leads in the setting of spiritual policy, offers the sacrifice, and communicates the numinous world on matters, and is the chief financial officer of the Corporation. Server assists the Archdruid, and handles practical and people problems. If you cannot be here to vote, write in, or call us at 254-1387 and record your nominations and opinions on our answering machine, and generally make your wishes known.

Annual Meeting is 6:30 P.M. at 616 Miner Road, Orinda California.

Samhain Essay: The End of Summer

By Emmon Bodfish

amhain, Celtic New Year, the day between the Worlds. The Druid year starts with Samhain, in the fall of the year, just as the Druid reckoning of days begins each day at night fall. This marks the end of the harvest season. Any fruit not gathered in by Samhain Eve must be left in the fields to feed the birds and wild animals, or the Sidhe, as one would have it. According to Françoise Le Roux, whose article, "Studies on the Celtic Feast Days" has been translated out of the French by one of our subscribers, Jeanne Elizabeth, Samhain may be derived from Sam Fuin, Weakening or End of Summer. Other competing derivations from Sam Rad or Samhna are by no means disproven. Samh-rad, summer or Samhrach, quiet.

Like New Year's Celebrations everywhere, Samhain festivities fall into two sequential phases; one that signifies a return to Chaos, e.g. disposal of old goods, expelling of evil, reversal of usual habits of behavior, parties, suspension of taboos, and the return of the dead, all on Samhain night; and a second which signifies re-birth of the Cosmos and creation anew, e.g. lighting of new fires, beginning of a new season, inauguration of new ceremonies, reaffirmation of the existing order and installation of new leaders. This will be enacted at the Dawn Service Samhain morning, in the Reformed Druid tradition. The newly elected Arch Druid, Preceptor, and Server enact the first service of the new year; the Third Order Druids change their ceremonial ribbons to new, white ones, and winter begins.

News of the Groves

Live Oak Grove

September 22, one of our members went to the Fall Equinox Healing Conference at Forever Forests in Mendocino, California. She reports:

When we finally arrived at Annwyn, after many delays and difficulties, we found the morning workshop just ending and preparations for lunch almost finished.

Rather rattled from the unnerving ride up White Knuckle Hill, which cost us our gas tank when a rock put a hole in it, we were glad to renew acquaintance with the friendly trees of Forever Forest. I set up a camping place there for my tired toddler to nap before joining the others. Several others attending the conference were just arriving, shortly after us. In addition to the conference goers, and the local residents, there were a number of Pagan folk who had come to celebrate Equinox.

Last time I was here, I saw no finished houses; people were living in buses, campers and trailers. Gwydion had just begun to build the round, shingled dwelling now known as "The Shaggy Mushroom." Now there are two other rectangular houses on the parcel owned by Church of All Worlds, Forever Forest's home. It was in front of one of these, called "Goat House" that lunch was set out.

There, in the clearing, surrounded by oak, pine, redwood, madrone and manzanita, we formed a circle around the table and, after introducing ourselves, sang our thanks, praise and hopes in one of the many lively rounds that were used in the rituals that weekend.

Workshops and the Equinox Celebration were all conducted in a carpeted circle beneath a majestic madrone tree, the biggest I've seen. It appeared to be a permanent circle with cardinal point altars made of wonderfully gnarled old tree roots and branches. Following the instructions of the workshop facilitator, we learned to sense where the energy was blocked, clumped up, in each other's bodies, and where it seemed deficient. Then, by stroking and massaging, attempt to balance the energy.

Now with the deepening dusk, the businesslike mood of the day dropped away and the sense of being in a magical land intensified. Dreams of freedom, blending with shadowy memories of lifetimes past swirled in an exultant present of music and drumbeat and singing and dancing beneath the serene and starlit trees of Annwyn.

Stories of unicorns and mermaids and also of the blackguard developers who currently want to turn this wooded retreat and spiritual center into subdivisions and condominiums, entertain us as we eat our evening meal. I am amazed at my child's appetite. He, who at home makes mealtime a nightmare, was stuffing his mouth with handfuls from both hands. After the feast, and getting the little one to bed, I joined the others down at the hot tub. Up here it's rustic—a large old horse trough with a fire pit under it.

Next morning, after breakfast, we began Aura-cleansing/Chakra Workshop. After some warm up Yoga exercises, we began by balancing the energy in our own bodies. "It's like taking a psychic shower." Anodea told us, "Reach up and pull down the colors." Touching our visualized rainbow, we brought down one hue at a time, beginning with red, drawing it down to our first chakras. After orange and yellow, Anodea says, "Now the heart, just feel all that beautiful green." She demonstrates, rubbing her chest, purringly. By the time we got through blue, indigo and on to the violet of the crown, I could see a difference in each of us. Each person I looked at seemed more solid more “here.” Having balanced ourselves, we pair up for Aura cleansing. Gently we stroke the aura, shaking the negativity off our finger tips after each stroke, finding the places where it seems most concentrated. Around the face is where I found the most negative energy. After the entire aura had been thusly cleansed, the subject is encouraged to “Dump” the remaining negativity by squatting and letting it go as if it were physical.

All cleansed and balanced, we felt ready for bigger things and trouped en masse into Goat House to give it a psychic cleansing, a process which, we were told, guarantees to inspire one to give the building a physical cleaning, too. Using the same techniques as in the Aura-Cleansing, we stroked the energy down and out the door. We all felt much better by the time the whole process ended, and alertly ready to plan and enact the closing circle. Owing to other pressing business, our little group was not able to stay for the closing circle, but despite all our difficulties, we all found the weekend very, very healing.

Feedback On the Cleo Trom

Douglas Adams, in his Sci Fi book, “Life, The Universe and Everything” describes a spell very much like the Druid Mist for hiding things as small as a shopping bag or as large as a restaurant. It is called the “Somebody Else’s Problem” field (of energy). Magic is truly timeless.

* An Altar on the island between two trees that burns fire and water into the air from the earth.

“Where do you start with this stuff?”

Candle-Staring

How to invoke your first image.

A good method to use for starters, it is partly mundane, making use of a nerve cell refractory period phenomenon, and partly psychic, making use of willed control of a mentally formed object. This image/object is different from the images in visions which come about spontaneously and require no effort on the seer’s part to sustain them. These cannot generally be controlled and manipulated by those who witness them. Nor can hallucination be. The purpose here is to create a controllable phantom. This is a magical exercise, as contrasted with a visionary, contemplative, or meditative one, magic being defined here as psychic power and perception under the control of the will.*

Warning: Any of this takes practice; no instant wizardry. It’s like learning to play a musical instrument. You will have to start over from the top line umpteen times. Practice for about twenty minutes at a time; then forget about it for a while. Twenty minutes uses up about the amount of high level mental energy most people have on tap. It takes a few hours of quiet, or even a day or so of regular living, to reaccumulate this energy.

*Somebody once said the difference between a magician and a madman is control.

Instructions:

1. Get alone.
 - a. Make sure you are not going to be disturbed for half an hour.
 - b. Silence helps. Even music distracts. It takes up part of your mental energy to listen to and comprehend it, albeit at the unconscious level.
2. Darkness helps
 - a. A dark room or after sunset.
 - b. No drafts; the candle must not flicker
3. Sit comfortably about arm’s length back from your candle with the flame a little below eye level.
 - a. Set the candle against a black background, black felt is good.
 - b. The flame must extend above the top of the candle, not be down in a bowl or a hole.
 - c. Some people find it helps to draw a circle around themselves, indicating to themselves that for the next half hour nothing outside this circle concerns them.
 - d. In some way, mentally calm and ground yourself, letting go worries and plans, and all mental flotsam and jetsam that is normally flowing by.
4. Stare at the candle flame with a relaxed, not a pointed, kind of attention.
 - a. The first visual change you will notice is that you will see the circle of light around the flame, the phenomenon so often portrayed on Yule Season cards. Good, you’ve got your vision relaxed.
 - B. The second change you will see is in the flame’s image on your retinas. It will seem to waiver or move to one side, leaving a dark shadow or image of itself behind it.

Congratulations: You are already seeing little things that aren't there!

5. Now, you're going to make this dark image come to you.
 - a. Look steadily at the dark image without re-focusing on nearer or farther away objects and without turning your head.
 - B. When you've gotten the right focus, for long enough, the dark image will pull off of the candle flame and move toward you. When it does this, it may no longer be in the shape of the candle flame. It may change to a shape like this.

or some other shape.

6. The usual reaction is to startle, blink, and look away, at which the image disappears and you see a lot of bubbles of light and after-images of the candle.
 - a. Start again.
 - b. The first time I got this to work, it pulled free of the candle flame and then came toward me very fast. As in response to any solid looking object coming fast at my face, I dodged to the side and ducked. The image went on past me and through the space where my head had been. This is not a visual after-image, which follows your field of view as you turn.
7. When you get past the startle reflex and are able to continue to stare in a relaxed way at the image as it approaches you, it will
 - a. "Pop" ala soap bubble a few inches from your face.
 - b. Or, if you can hold very still, physically and mentally, and continue keeping your attention on it, it will come to you and seem to enter your head at the spot between and above your eyes. The location is known in the East as the "Third Eye" and in the West as the "Unicorn's Horn." There is no tactile sensation and nothing physical happens.
8. Now, you can learn to control this image. By willing it to do so, you can make it stop at any point between you and the candle, hover for a while, get bigger, and then come to you.
 - a. It is very slippery and will keep getting away from you at first.
 - b. A method of doing this which use has the feeling of projecting my energy out to the image, in midair, and moving it by pushing or pulling. Those are the subjective sensations of it.

The purpose of this exercise, besides helping you to get into a wizard-like headstate, is to give you practice at controlling visually manifested mental/psychic phenomena. Starting with one that is close to the mundane, you can verify to yourself that these manifest by means of your energy, and that you can control that facet of the situation. This is not only amusing and confidence building, but can be a good skill to have on further mental journeys.

Yule Essay: Mistletoe and the Golden Sickle

By Emmon Bodfish

ule, Winter Solstice is one of the four minor Druid High Days. It is associated with the Holly and the Mistletoe. All mistletoe symbolism and use we see around during this time of the year is a carry-over from pagan, most likely Druidic, customs of ancient Europe.

Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, gives us the best description we have of a Paleo-Pagan Druid ceremony, that of the cutting of the mistletoe. According to Stuart Piggot, the time for this ceremony was determined by observing the growth of the mistletoe on an oak tree. "The time of the rite was the sixth day of a new moon, and preparations were made for a feast and a sacrifice of two white bulls. A Druid in a white robe climbed the tree and cut with a golden sickle the branch of a mistletoe, which was caught as it fell on a white cloak. The bulls were then sacrificed and all present ate of them."

The golden sickle is inexplicable, as real gold will not hold an edge tough enough to cut through the woody stem of the mistletoe. Gilded, or simply polished, bronze, is more likely. Elsewhere Pliny writes of the ritual necessity of gathering the mistletoe left-handed, after first fasting, and of the Celts plucking Selago without using an iron knife, barefoot and with the right hand through the left sleeve of a white tunic, but these are private rites, not public ceremonies.

We realize that two white bulls are difficult to come by in most parts of the country now, and hard to keep until Yule. (My lease says "No pets.") But a feast among friends and some holly sprigs and mistletoe hung about is definitely in order. The feast at Live Oak Grove will be on the evening of the twenty-first, after Yule service. Watch this space for pictures.

GROVE ELECTIONS

In line with our charter as a non-profit corporation, we had our annual meeting and election of officers, Samhain eve, Nov. 6th, 1984. Officers for 1985:

Arch Druid :	Larry Press
Preceptor:	Emmon Bodfish

Favorite candidate for Server withdrew, stating that couldn't take on the responsibilities of office at this time.

For the fifth year, now the R.D.N.A. was represented in the Bay Area Interfaith Council Thanksgiving Pageant. Though largely Christian, the Council includes Buddhist, Hindu, Sikhs, Taoist, Jewish, and Ba'hai groups. We participated as part of the Neo-Pagan Coalition with C.O.G. and Temple of Isis. Holding up the Druid end, Emmon read the Hymn of Amergin from Lebor_Gabala. "Stick to the classics," he says.

Samhain

Welsh Folk Customs for Pagans at Nos Galan Gaeaf (Eve of Samhain)

By Tom Cross

- 1 Before the Eve of Samhain, gather pieces of bread, cakes or pancakes. This is to be called in Welsh hen solod or hel bwyd cennad y meirw, or collecting food for the dead and the food is soul cakes. This food is to be given to those who have passed on.

In Celtic folk belief, Samhain or Calan Gaeaf is the time when the dead are close to this world and it was believed that on the eve of Samhain, when the Otherworld was closer, the dead came back to earth. This is the time when we can look back at those who have died and reflect on the ones that we miss and remember them and honour them. One of the ways we can do this, is by the archaic rite of feeding the dead which was practiced by the ancient Indo-European ancestors and still practiced in other cultures today.

2. At the Samhain bonfire, or coelcerth, as it is called in Welsh, which is lit at night on the eve of Samhain, the soul cakes which have been gathered may at this time be eaten by those celebrating and a portion of each piece is to be thrown into the fire as an offering not only to the deities but also for the dead.
3. When the food has been placed in the fire, a eulogy for the dead may be recited and other charms or prayers uttered in commemoration of those who have died. Also, the gods and the spirits of the dead may be asked for help in the coming season or for the year. As an example thanks may be given to one's parents or relatives who have died. They will be listening!

4. The fire should then be circumambulated three times each time ending on the west side. Some ecstatic Celtic music could be played. This should end this ceremony and each person should be ready to go home. Staying behind could be for those looking for the dead, or as in Welsh folk belief, the tailless black sow or Ladi Wen (white Lady) who haunts the eve of Samhain. It is speculated that the Ladi Wen represents the old year.

A rhyme from Caernarvaonshire for Nos Galan Gaeaf:

Hyn a gei di genni leni.

Mayest thou bless thy whole family,

Oimelc Essay: Brigit

By Emmon Bodfish

imelc the festival of Bride, Bridgit, Bredes, the daughter of Dagda, and Celtic goddess of fire and the hearth. She is also patroness of poetry and the source of creative inspiration, which the Gaels regard as a supersensual form of fire. Always one of the most popular deities, the fifth and sixth century Christianizers of Ireland were unable to eradicate her worship, and instead adopted or rather co-opted her into their own pantheon as St. Bridgit. She was not, however, a Christian. Modern evidence suggests that she was of ancient Indo-European origin, cognate with Agni, god of fire in the Vedic tradition, and with hearth goddesses all over Europe. The masculinizing of goddesses was a frequent occurrence in the East and Middle East as nomadic pastoralists settled down and became agricultural and urbanized.

Bridgit is also associated with the Sun, which in Celtic countries is feminine, "na Ghreine," and which is carried in a chariot and served by a young male deity, son of the Sky God, usually Lugh or an Apollo-like figure. This may be a similar pattern to the one for Danu, the Earth Goddess, whose statue was annually transported through the countryside in a ceremonial wagon attended by a young, possibly virgin male priest. Traces of this ritual come from all over pagan Europe, according to Prof. P.V. Glob, but the best descriptions come from Scandinavia, where the ceremony persisted into Medieval times.

On Oimelc, statues of Bride were carried through the streets to her temple, where a perpetual flame burned on her altar. This continued in Ireland under Celtic Christianity, with only the name being changed to "Saint." There and in Scotland, the tradition is still repeated when the dawn shows pink colors, it is because Bride, the Sun-Maiden, hangs her cloak on the beams of the morning sun. In Bara and the isles, up until the last century, she was addressed at dawn as just that, the Sun-Maiden, and even the thin layer of Christianity, laid on in Ireland, was ignored here.

In the oldest Indo-European traditions, the Moon is masculine and may be associated with Cernunnos, the hunt and forest magic. (J. Duran, after Gimbutas, 1982) The feminine moon goddesses, usually connected with water symbolism, are thought to be of Pre-Indo-European origin.

Bride was one of the most popular deities, and most often worshipped and appealed to by the common people, judging from the statements of early Christianizers and from the large number of charms, spells, and songs to her that persisted into Medieval and some into modern times. An old fire charm for kindling a damp hearth, and in Scotland it's always damp, goes: "To Bride, Ruler of fire, give me/us this little bit of perfect fire, now." Highly effective, I use it daily.

Remember also that matches were invented by a Scotsman, a Gael. The word "match" comes (some think) from the Scot's Gaelic word "Maide" meaning "little stick." The fire sticks used to kindle fresh fire for the sacrifice are spoken of in the Vedic tradition as the Parents of Agni; Birch bark, in the primitive tinder-kit, was known as "Bridget's wood." The line from Bride, early Indo-European fire-goddess, through Agni, who is Bridget in her Asiatic male guise, leads, according to the entomological dictionary, to our word ignite and ignition, via Latin. So to keep all this relevant, when you put your foot down on the accelerator these cold mornings and turn the key, invoke Bride, Goddess of fire:

"Ah, Bhride, Banreigh na Teintean, thoir dhomh an beagan teintean lan."

Live Oak Grove

The main road from Route 24 to Live Oak Grove's Site is now open again. The county has repaired it after two years and several petition efforts by the local residents.

We have planted the two additional pine trees we have been planning. These, when they grow, will give us cover from staring neighbours to the East and North. We bought them in early December but then decided to put off planting them and let them stay down at the house and attend the Yule party, decorated in shiny trinkets and paper birds. Now, duly consecrated with spirit and merriment, they are planted at the Grove Site.

Notes on Oimelc and Brighit

Oimelc (sometimes spelled Imbolg) is known as the pagan Celtic festival from Irish lore is said to translate as "sheep's (ewe's) milk" and has many associations with the goddess Brighit and later with St. Brigid—Christianized as a saint. According to Cormac's Glossary (circa 900), the goddess Brighit was daughter of the Dagda or as three daughters of the Dagda. She was an expert in poetry, learning, prophecy or divination, healing and craftsmanhsip. Then, according to the Life of Brighid (the saint), she was born "neither within nor without a house, at sunrise; is fed milk by a cow who is white with red ears" (these colors suggest a likely supernatural origin), "she hangs her wet cloak on the sun's rays and her house appears ablaze." According to Gerald of Wales (Giraldus Cambrensis) Brighid and her nuns guarded a perpetual sacred fire and Solinus, in the 3rd century A.D. mentioned that Minerva's sanctuary in Britain contained a perpetual fire. It seems most likely then, that Brighid the saint is a euhemerized goddess Brighit. Therefore, Brighit has many functional associations: lactation of sheep and cattle, arts and crafts, learning, healing, fire, at the hearth and sun, also with rivers and motherhood, and also she is a triple goddess or triune of goddesses.

The British Minerva that Solinus wrote of, seems to be Briganti (or Brigantia) the tutelary goddess of the Brigantes who is cognate with Brighit. There are many non-Celtic Indo-European cognates and parallels, such as Berecythia, Brihati of Thraco-Phrygians and Indians...the Indo-European root being "high" or "exalted" etc. Brighit also has Celtic counterparts such as the Gallo-Brittonic Matronae or Matres, triple mother goddesses sometimes called Sulevia and known also in Gaul Belisama ("most brilliant") and Romanised as Minerva. As Brigantia, her names survives in Britain as names of two rivers, Brant (in Wales) and Brent (in England), as Matres or Matronae the name survives as the river Marne in France.

In Christian legend, Brighid the saint appears as mid-wife to Mary thus reflecting her motherly functions and Lá Brighid (law breed) (St. Bridget's Day) seems to be a purificatory festival—in commemoration of the purification of Mary. Fire was a purificatory element to the ancient Celts as fire was used to purify cattle as in needfire and Bealtaine rituals. Brighid as fire and motherhood goddess was very suited then as a mid-wife to Mary in this purification. On La Brighid or St. Brighid's day, a doll made from a churndash as the image of Brighid called a Brideog was carried about from village to village and all women had to bow before it as it was paraded about. On this day, rushes were woven into crosses, called St. Brighid's cross, which bring good luck on harvests and yields. These crosses resemble the ancient triskelion and swastika more than the do Christian crosses. The triskelion in the three legged or armed type of pictograph that today is an emblem of the Isle of Man and Manannan Mac Lir. These symbols of the triskelion and swastika were ancient solar symbols and were used in Indo-European religion—although the swastika has come to be popularly associated with Nazis and the third reich of Hitler it was depicted by the ancient Germanic peoples and also by Greeks, Indians and Celts. In ancient Germany there was, as described by Tacitus, a spring festival celebrated around a mother earth goddess called Nerthus, in which her image was paraded around in a wagon to communicate blessings for peace and a good year. This, of course, parallels Oimele and similar customs around Brighid.

As Brighit was a triple goddess, there were many other triple goddesses in Celtic as well as other Indo-European mythologies. Brighit was mother of Brian, Iuchir and Iucharbha (also called MacCuir, Mac Cecht and Mac Greine—sons of the Hazel, Plough and Sun) who married another triune of goddesses; Banbha, Fodhla, and Eriu whose names are metaphoric for Ireland (Eriu is an older spelling of Eire). Sometime Brian, Iuchir and Iucharbha (or Uar) were known as the three sons of Danu, perhaps making Danu and Brighit either the same or confused. Danu also seems cognate with Danu, Mother of Vrtra in the Rig Veda, Vrtra being the same as the Old Persian god Verethragna. Vrtra was a demonic god opposed to Indra to the Vedic Indians, but Verethragna was a hero god. At any rate, Danu seems to go back to an Indo-European root having to do with “dripping or flowing water,” also the root of the name Danube and other central and eastern European river names. The Norns of Norse-Germanic myth, the Parcae of Roman Myth and Moirai of Greek myth are all triple in form and are what we call the Fates who control the destiny of mankind. The Morrighu* of Irish myth seems to correspond as triple in form also, as Badb, Macha and Nemain, however, they seem to be better paralleled in Germanic mythology as the Valkyries in function. Both are war goddesses who, as birds, pick up the slain in battle. Badb is the hooded crow who with her beak pecks at the corpses. Valkyries sometimes appear in bird form and they take slain warriors to Valhalla. In Greek myth, the three Moirai (Fates) were joined by other goddesses, such as, the three Graces and the nine Muses, also a multiple of three. However it was Pallas Athene or Athena who corresponds in function to Brighit as well as Hestia and Artemis. If one could group Athena, Artemis and Hestia as a triune, one would have a parallel to Brighit.

Thus we have:

Celtic	Norse	Greek
Brighit or 3 Brighits or 3 Matrone	3 Nornir: Urd, Verdandi and Skuld	3 Moirai: Clotho, Lachesis and Atropos
The 3 Morrigan: Badb, Macha and Nemain	13 Valkyries-choosers of the slain.	3 Furies
Banbha, Fodhla and Eriu: the 3 goddesses of Ireland		3 graces, 9 muses
Arianrhod (Welsh)	Germanic: Austron (Eastre --goddess of Easter and of dawn)	Eos (Greek) of dawn Ushuas (Vedic) goddess of Dawn

*Welsh equivalent of an aspect of Morrigan in Aeron (from Brittanic Agrona) a goddess of battle and slaughter; Aerfen (Welsh) goddess of the “end of battle” (cf. Aeron and Aerfen to Badb and Nemain). Rhiannon may be compared to Macha. Note: The 3 daughters of Dôn (Danu) in Welsh myth: Gwernen (alder), Elan (push, drive), Maelan (profit, material gain)—all are also names of rivers. In Welsh myth there is Modron mother of Mabon (Mabon ap Modron) from Gallo-Britannic Matronae.

Spring Equinox Essay: Spring Rites

By Emmon Bodfish

quinox, the beginning of Spring, one the four Minor High Days in the Druid tradition. The Sun crosses the celestial equator, from Southern Declination to Northern, and the day and the night are of equal length. This is the time of renewal, the beginning of preparations for the summer to come. The holiday is older than Druidism; stones in the megaliths mark this sunrise. Plowing and planting begin. It is the season of egg gathering. The giving of painted eggs as gifts and offerings predates Christianity, or the introduction of chickens, originally a wild Indian pheasant, to European barnyards.

The Leechbook records this chant of English (Brythonic, really) farmers in the spring rites circa 950 A.D. The Christian church had not yet begun its campaign in earnest to expunge old pagan ways or else re-name and "Christianize" them as it would over the next five hundred years.

Erec! Erec! Erec!
Mother of Earth
Hail to thee, Earth!
Mother of mortals.

Be fruitful in
The God's embrace
Filled with food
For the use of man.

In England, prior to the adoption of the Gregorian calendar in 1752, Spring Equinox was the beginning of the new year. It is still celebrated there as "Lady Day." In the Gaelic world, the new season, Samhra, summer, won't begin until Bealtaine, but the new year began on Samhain in November.

The emphasis of this season is balance, as day and night now stand balanced. Time to make recompense for old mistakes and receive the reward of our winter's patience. The tree is the birch, Bride's tree, the tree of Spring and Dawn, at the East point of the circle.

Oimecl meeting, first on the agenda was to resolve the problem of the office of the Server, who, in Live Oak Grove is also the Secretary on the Board of this non-profit, religious corporation. Last High Day we had voted to leave the post of Server vacant until we had worked this out.

Larry Press, A.D., suggested splitting the post into two offices and electing a Server and a Secretary.

Willowoak offered the counter proposal that the office of Server/Secretary be shared between two people, because each of the two candidates, Bob Blunt and herself, have different skills.

"This way I can learn about being Server, and he can learn how to be a secretary to a non-profit corporation," as she said.

Howard clarified how this might work, and the motion was seconded and passed. Then Bob Blunt was duly elected Server/Secretary and Willowoak Co-Server and Under-Secretary. Both will be members of the Board.

(Enough red tape, and it isn't even red ribbon season yet.)

We planted the agreed upon three birch trees, putting them at the Spring Equinox sunrise point on the Grove Circle.

The trunks need to be covered, wrapped to protect them from direct sunlight in this clime. As tying the burlap around the trunk with string may have contributed to the troubles of our last birch tree, this time we have sewn cloth loosely around them, and held it on by a method more like suspenders than a belt.

"When I joined this religion, I never thought I'd be sewing clothes for trees."

—The Preceptor

On March 2, we planted the May pole meadow with wild flower seeds. We transplanted donated clover and violets into the Grove Circle, and around the base of the Maypole.

At the business meeting after services March 10, we discussed what we could plant as ground-cover in the Grove Circle which the deer and the voles wouldn't devour. Next, we discussed the Missal-Any Policy Statement. The Under-secretary objected to the use of the word "Neo-Pagan" in Section 3, as limiting it to those traditions and groups which have been established in the last few decades, and excluding people from other, older traditions. Larry Press, A.D., stated that he felt that "Neo-Pagan" included every tradition, and the Preceptor said that he thought it included those traditions, no matter how old, which have recently found the freedom to surface, "bloom and flower." It was decided that, since there was no way to correct the camera-ready-copy of the Policy Statement at this late date, it would be run "as is" and comments, additions, and corrections invited from the members. Two people also wanted to add to section 8, making it more specific. Submitted material must be legible, camera-ready and reproducible, but not necessarily typed.

The postage rates are going up in February, by 2 cents someone said. And as we are at the ragged edge, we voted to raise the cost of subscriptions to "A Druid Missal-Any" to $3.00 a year. That's eight issues.

Druid's Chant

Great voice that calls us in the wind of dawn,
 Strange voice that stills us in the heat of noon,
 Heard in the sunset,
 Heard in the moonrise
 And in the stirring of the wakeful night,
 Speak now in blessing,
 Chide us no longer,
 Great voice of love, we will not grieve thee more.

Willow Oak, who is a Millay fan found this in a book, Collected Poems—Edna St. Vincent Millay where it is designated as a previously unpublished poem. It was written for a Tree Ceremony at Vassar College in 1915. So the “greatest American lyric poet” remembered the “Oak-Men,” as one derivation of “Druid” holds it to mean.

I will rise early on the morning of Monday,
 I will sing my rune and rhyme,
 I will go sunwise with my cog
 To the nest of my hen with sure intent.

I will place my left hand to my breast,
 My right hand to my heart,
 I will seek the loving wisdom of Him
 Abundant in grace, in broods, and in flocks.

I will close my two eyes quickly,
 As in blind-man's bluff moving slowly;
 I will stretch my left hand over thither
 To the nest of my hen on yonder side.

This is a hatching spell peculiar to this egg-time of year, from the Scottish Highlands, circa 1800. In the Gáidhlig introduction by the collector, Alexander Carmichael, there is a quote from the 102 year old lady from whom he collected this and other runes. In it she tells of the customs, purely pagan, of placing a bit of the native soil on the breast of a corpse before burial. This is a custom I have heard from many sources in the Neo-pagan community, and from my Celtic relatives as a child. However, this is the first “academic” reference or precedent I have been able to uncover. It may have been a part of the Ancient Druid funeral rites, or from an even older Pagan stratum. I have heard it called the “releasing soil” now-a-days. It could well be incorporated into N.R.D.N.A. traditions. We would appreciate any feedback anyone out there has on this.

Beltane 1985

Volume 9 Number 3

Beltane Essay: Maypole and Shamanism

By Emmon Bodfish

Beltane, major Holiday of the Druid year, and beginning of the Season of Life, marks the point on the sun's ascent when it is half way between Equinox, level, and Solstice, culmination. Bonfires are lighted on hill tops and feast prepared. The Maypole dance, which crowns the festivities, is probably older than Druidism, or than the migration of the Indo-Europeans into Europe or India. There is speculation from both academic and traditional channels to the effect that the Maypole and the Sacrificial pole may have a common origin in the spring and autumn rituals of the early Neolithic pastoralists of the Eur-Asian Steppes. At this season these ancestors of the Siberian, Turkic, Tartar and Indo-European peoples, celebrated an animal sacrifice, in which the animal to be offered was tied to a richly decorated post, which was the center and focus of the ritual and dancing. Ribbons, streamers or threads of bright colors figure in the rites and records of the descendent cultures.

The Rig Veda describes the stake to which the horse sacrifice is tethered as "brightly beribboned" with colored banners streaming down it.

In the Siberian Shamanistic rituals, which preserve the earliest traditions, the reindeer or pony sacrifice is tied to a freshly cut young larch or birch tree. The tree is festooned with ribbons, streamers or colored threads. The colors are always those associated with the particular deity or deities being addressed. The Shaman of the Buryat and his assistants, nine youths and nine maidens, dance. The Shaman, in trance, conducts the spirit of the slain animal up, along the path of the streamers to the top of the tree, and on up to the heavenly abode of the waiting deity. In healing and initiation rites, ribbons are also used to indicate soul-paths.

In the volumes of data collected by Fraser, are descriptions of the traditional cutting of the maypole in Europe, in which the tallest young birch in the woods was selected, cut and set up in the village square. These traditions probably pre-date Christian or Roman contact, and seem to have been very little affected by them. Their similarity all across Europe and the Steppes of Asia would argue for a very archaic origin.

But the May dance also includes strong Pre-Indo-European elements: the circle dance, the gathering of buds and flowers, maybasket giving, and the Green Man symbolism and costumery. These may speak of an older, agrarian tradition, perhaps brought by the first farming peoples coming into Europe from the Near East and the Mediterranean and melding with the indigenous (from Ice Age?) peoples of Europe. The farther East one goes towards the Steppes of Asia, the fewer of these milder customs of the May one encounters in village life and folk tradition, until among the never Christianized tribes of Siberia, there is found the pure animal sacrifice, tethered to the be-ribboned Axis Mundi, the World-Tree.

News of the Groves

Our new birch trees are leafing out and thriving. On Equinox we held an egg hunt for the children up at the Grove Site. Willow Oak hand painted a dozen or two eggs, for the occasion. The tradition of decorated eggs goes back 6,000 years, but the one here with the Druid (R.D.N.A.) sigil is, I believe, a first.

Finding an egg under the Birches

Pouring out the offering to the Big Oak

To a Birch-Tree Cut Down, and Set Up in Llanidloes for a Maypole.

Long are you exiled from the wooded slope, birch-tree, with your green hair in wretched state; you who were the majestic sceptre of the wood where you were reared, a green veil, are now turned traitress to the grove. Your precinct was lodging for me and my love-messenger in the short nights of May. Manifold once (ah, odious plight!) were the caroling in your pure green crest, and in your bright green house I heard every bird-song make its way; under your spreading bough grew herbs of every kind among the hazel saplings, when your dwelling-place in the wood was pleasing to my girl last year. But now you think no more of love, your crest above remains dumb; and from the green meadow and the upland, where your high rank was plain to see, you have gone bodily and in spite of the cost to the town where trade is brisk. Though the gift of an honorable place in thronged Llanidloes where many meet is good, not good, my birch, do I think your rape nor your site nor your habitation. No good place is it for you for putting out green leaves, there where you make grimaces.

No more will the bracken hide your urgent seedlings, where your sister stays; no more will there be mysteries and secrets shared, and shade, under your dear eaves; you will not conceal the April primroses, with their gaze directed upwards; you will not think now to inquire, fair poet tree, after the birds of the glen. God! Woe to us, a cramped chill is on the land, a subtle dread, since this helplessness has come on you, who bore your head and your fine crest like noble Tegwedd of Old. Choose from the two, since it is foolish for you to be a townsman, captive tree: either to go home to the lovely mountain pasture, or to wither yonder in the town.

—Welsh; Gruffydd ab Addaf ap Dafydd, fl.c. 1340-c. 1370.

Poison Oak and Plantain

Now, at the beginning of Poison Oak season, Carlene Skeffington of New Hampshire offers the following:

A Live Plantain Leaf

In June, when my right thumb and forearm broke out in an extensive poison oak rash, I remembered reading an article that suggested rubbing leaves of Plantago spp. on the affected area. I tried it, and the itching, redness and swelling stopped! With the experimentation I found that it was best to extract the juices from the leaves by crushing them in a mortar before applying it to the rash. Only one application each morning for about ten days was necessary. The Most effective were the healthy leaves with prominent linear ribbing and as few hairs as possible. Leaf hairs act as an irritant if rubbed directly into the rash.

The Green Balloons wave in the wind, and the residents of Hampshire St., a small and residential byway in the Mission, gather around. "OK," says Cheryl Kollin, "this is a glossy privet, and were going to show you how to plant it. First dig a hole."

Everybody laughs. It's 9 a.m. on a brisk Saturday morning, but everybody is cheerful, fortified by strong coffee and sweet, doughy Mexican pastries. Kollin holds up her hand.

"Be sure to dig a notch in your hole for the watering tube." The watering tube resembles a mailing tube filled with pebbles. "The tube is important because it gets the water deep, which encourages the roots to go into the ground rather than up on the surface where they can buckle your sidewalk."

Everybody nods. Buckled sidewalks are the bete noir of urban tree planters; steps must be taken.

Solstice and Stonehenge

By Emmon Bodfish

idsummer, Solstice, Greine-Stad, Sun-stop, today the Sun reaches its most northerly declination, at 2:44 A.M. Pacific Standard Time. This is the festival of the Goddess Danu, mother of the gods and men. Bonfires are lit on hilltops and the night is danced away.

Tossing grain or coins into the air this day is said to help one's prosperity. This is the morning that the Sun would rise over the heel stone at Stone Henge, but for the fact that the Earth has processed far enough on its axis since 1500 B.C. to move the sunrise point out of line with the ancient markers. In the 18th and 19th centuries, English Druid groups held ceremonies there. But now the Henge is fenced off and protected, and accessible only with permission of the government. The huge numbers of tourists were eroding the soil around the monoliths and there was concern that the monument would be damaged. The smaller, less well-known stone circles, such as Callenish or the Maidens are still accessible to the public, as is Avesbury.

The Druids did NOT build Stone Henge. It antedates their arrival in Britain by many centuries. It was William Stuckeley, in 1717, who mis-located them there. He did some of the best antiquarian field work of his day, but his later theorizing wildly outstripped his data. The mistake was an honest one, however, considering what was known in his day. He showed that the stones were not a memorial to King Arthur, nor a Roman temple, as had been previously supposed. He was the first to accept them as definitely pre-Roman. The only knowledge of pre-Roman Britain he had came from the Roman and Greek writers of the Classical period. They said that Britain was inhabited by Celts, whose priests were the Druids. So, if the stones were pre-Roman, Stuckeley reasoned, they must have been assembled by the Druids. He knew of no other candidates. We now feel that Stone Henge and the numerous other stone circles were set up by at least three different, pre-Celtic races, best described, I think, by Clannad's phrase, "the race no one knows." Clannad is an Irish music group who have produced several records, of which their latest, "Magical Ring" is, in our opinion, their best. (We highly recommend it.)

In many English, Irish and Welsh villages, bonfires are lit in the squares, or in Scotland, it is the day for a community picnic on the moors. Then, on mid-summer's night, the shortest night in the year, which will be the twenty third, (long, boring, astronomical explanation here omitted) single women would put a bouquet of Mugwort or St. John's Wort under their pillow, to bring dreams of their future husbands. If you try this, let us know what happens. We need this research.

A Different Derivation of the Name

Dalon Ap Landu

Dalon Ap Landu, the obscure Welsh tree god mentioned in RDNA literature and rituals, has usually been translated Leafy one of the tree(s), or Leaf, son of Tree, from the old Welsh. But now a completely different meaning has been brought to our attention.

Dallan	Ap	Landau
Blind also Having second Sight/prophecy	Son of	McLear, or Mamman McLear A Sea God

Whether the spelling is "Dallon" or "Dallan" is unclear because no one has been able to find the original source reference from which David Fisher took the god's name. This new derivation was suggested by way of analogy to Dallan Forgail, a historical individual, a bard and chronicler who lived circa 400 A.D. in Wales. He is mentioned in an Irish fragment called the "Tromdamh Guaire." This means literally the "heavy company of Guar," that is, the heavy company that the bard Guar kept. By "heavy," he may have meant either profound, or politically powerful, or dangerous. I am trying to locate a copy of this.

Other obscure references: In her article in "Ogam" journal, Le Roux mentions BRICRIU, an obscure Irish trickster god, which she feels may be analogous to Loki. Has anyone ever heard of Bricriu?

Tom Cross, Post Oak Proto-Grove, mentions that the ritual drink of the Berserkers was Mead. Is there a mead-honey-Soma connection to Vedic India, or was Mead simply the strongest alcoholic drink then available?

New Religious Order Formed

At sunrise on Beltaine, Grove members Emmon and Willowoak performed the founding ritual of a new contemplative order, the Peaceful Order of the Earth Mother.

Designed to meet needs not covered by the usual RDNA activities, the order imposes dietary and other restrictions on members and provides meditative training and experiences not otherwise available.

With this rite, the pair made formal commitments to their new order, and to one another as members of it, then took an oath of secrecy and obedience to the laws of the order, something that will be required of all members. Vows of celibacy and poverty, however, will be optional.

From The Druid Chronicles (Evolved), 1975

The following article was originally written as a course supplement for a class entitled "Witchcraft: the magic of ancient Classical and Celtic beliefs in a Contemporary Society," taught by its author, Michael Nichols. It has been mildly edited in order to make the data more relevant to Reformed Druids, but it is essentially intact. Comments by the Editor appear in brackets. God names with the Druid Sigil attached [* is used instead in ARDA2] are of particular relevance to Reformed Druids. Mike depended almost entirely upon one book (MacCulloch's), which is an excellent one, but others of equal interest may be found in A Bibliography of Druidism. It should be noted that Celtic Paleopaganism is a highly controversial subject and experts will frequently disagree with one another. Therefore this article should be taken as merely a starting point in your researches in the field.

Introduction

The first writers to attempt any clarification of the topic of Celtic Paleopaganism were the Romans, who helped very little with their habit of replacing the names of Celtic deities with the names of their own Roman deities. A modern scholar attempting to recapture the lost legacy of Celtic religions finds that he or she has rather limited resources. Briefly, these are: dedicatory and votive inscriptions, manuscripts dating from the Middle Ages but perpetuating much more ancient traditions, stories and chronicles and mythical legends, and most importantly, the Bardic tradition which inspired Gallic, Breton and even Norman minstrels.

Such religious anthropology is discouraging and tedious, yet in this field there is one scholar who stands out and deserves all the accolades that a grateful Pagan can bestow upon him. Unfortunately, his mammoth contribution is seldom remembered, or acknowledged, or even realized. The man in question is the Canon J. A. MacCulloch and his 390 pages of amazingly exciting research was published in 1911 c.e. under the title The Religion of the Ancient Celts. All research [others would disagree with such a sweeping conclusion] in this area since 1911 c.e. is merely a footnote to this great man's pioneering efforts. It is for this reason that the bulk of the following material is culled from MacCulloch's extensive work, for his own publication is long since out of print and is exceedingly hard to find.

[MacCulloch's book can be gotten in microfilm from several places, however. Also to be highly recommended are the works of Squire, Piggott, and MacCana.]

The Gods of Gaul and the Continental Celts:

Though many Druids are concerned more with the traditions developed in the "British Isles" it must be remembered that these majestic and magical deities ultimately had their origin in the beliefs of the Continental Celts [who were spread all the way into Turkey!] and one must keep in mind at all times that the great majority were local, tribal Gods, of the roads and commerce, of the arts, of healing, etc. There were very few Pan-Celtic deities. MacCulloch quotes another authority, Professor Anwyl, to this effect: 270 Gods are mentioned only once on inscriptions, 24 twice, 11 thrice, 10 four times, three five times, two seven times, four fifteen times, one nineteen times (Grannos*), and one thirty times (Belenos*). If the notes on the following deities seem brief, you may console yourself with the understanding that it is all that we know of them:

The following Gods were most frequently associated with the Roman God Mercury, and are said to have had many of his attributes:

Artaios (Artaius): A Bear God, and God of Agriculture.

Moccus: A Swine God, a Corn God and a vegetation spirit.

Cimiacinus: God of Commerce, Roads and (perhaps) Leys.

Ogmios: God of Speech, binding humans with His eloquence.

Dumias: God of Hilltops and Mounds (and beacon points?).

Alaunius, Arcecius, Arvernorix, Arvenus, Adsmerius, Biauxius, Canetonensis, Clavariatis, Cissonius, Cimbrianus, Dumiatius, Magniacus, Naissatis, Tocirenius, Vassocaletus, Vellaunus, Visucius: Gods whose attributes and functions are not specifically defined, though generally identified as Mercury-like. [Several of these deities may be the same, under different spellings.]

The following Gods are associated with Apollo, both in His capacity of God of Healing and God of light:

Grannos*: God of Thermal Springs, name means "burning one."

Borvo (Bormo, Bormanus): God of Bubbling Springs, "boiling one." Votive tablets inscribed to these two show that They were often invoked for healing.

Belenos*: Sun God, name means "the shining one" [from root "bel," "bright," "good."], the most popular and widely known of the Celtic Gods.

Maponos (Mabonos): God of Youthfulness.

Mogons (Mogounos): Sky God, God of Plenty, God of Increase.

Anextiomarus, Cobledulitavus, Cosmis(?), Livicus, Mogo, Sianus, Toutiorix, Vindonnus, Virotutis: Gods whose attributes and functions are not defined, though Apollo-like. Certain Gods in this group are said to have been worshipped in a circle of stone by priests called Boreads [from Greek myths of a land called Hyperborea, the land beyond Boreas, the North Wind]. There is a report by one of the Classical writers that every 19 years the Sun God appeared dancing in the sky over this stone circle, playing a lyre. Many past and present scholars speculate that the circle may have been Stonehenge and the 19 years refer to the 19 year Solar-Lunar cycle said to be measured by these stones [see "The Mysteries of Stonehenge" for a detailed reporting of this matter].

The following are tribal War Gods associated with aspects of Mars, and there many (some 60 are known):

Caturix: "battle king."

Belatu-Cadros (Belacetudor?): "comely in slaughter."

Albiorix (Albius?): "world king."

Rigisamus: "king like."

Teatates (Toutatis, Totatis, Tutatis): a tribal War God, regarded as an embodiment of the tribe in its warlike capacity. Lucan regards Him as one of the three Pan-Celtic Gods, the other two being Taranis* and Esus.

Neton: "warrior."

Camulos: pictured on coins and war emblems.

Braciaca*: God of Malt and Intoxicating Drink, such as the Irish "cuirm" and "braccat" [not to mention "na h-uisci beath—the waters-of-life! Braciaca may also be a God of Altered States of Consciousness and may be related to the Smith Gods].

Alator, Arixo, Asterix, Beladonis, Barres, Bolvinus, Britovis [consort to Britinia, perhaps?], Buxenus, Cabetius, Cariocecius, Camenelus, Cicollus, Carrus, Cocosus, Cociduis, Condatus, Cnabetius, Coritiacus, Dinomogetimarus, Divanno, Dunatis, Glarinus, Halamardus, Harmogius, Ieusdrinus, Lacavus, Latabius, Lenus, Leucetius, Laucimalacus, Medocius, Mogetuis, Mullo, Nabelcus, Ocelos, Ollondios, Randosatis, Riga, Rudianus, Sinatus, Segomo, Smertatius, Tritullus, Vesucius, Vincius, Vitucadros, Vorocius: War Gods whose attributes are not specified.

The following Gods are equated with Jupiter, as Ruler of the Celtic "heaven," "Otherworld" or afterlife [and as Sky God and Thunder God].

Taranis*: (Taranoos, Taranucnos): God of Thunder and Lightning [also Fire, Storms, the Sun and protection from all of these, as the name is obviously cognate with Thor, Thunder, Donner, Tyr and a number of other inter-related Thunder-Fire-War-Demon Killing Gods. Quite possibly He is also related to the Sylvannus/Esus/Cernunnos trinity and/or Sucellos mentioned below.]

Sucellos: pictured as a bearded God with a hammer, God of Creative Forces, of Life and Death, of Fertility. He is considered an "All-Father."

Cernunnos: "the Horned One," pictured as a three-faced God, squatting, with a torque and ram's headed serpent, and sometimes holding a cornucopia [He is the one usually shown with antlers or other large horns, and with furry legs, cloven hooves and a large phallus (erect). More than one scholar has pointed out the similarities both to the Hindu deity Shiva and the postulated "shamanistic" cult of the Horned Sorcerer"]. He is considered a God of Abundance, an Earth and Underearth God, Lord of the Underworld, and an Ancestral God [also as a God of the Hunt and God of the Wildwood. Among Wiccans, He is the most widely worshipped male deity, combining all of the above aspects, plus a few more (including Sun God, God of Animal Life, etc.) For a picture of how He is usually conceived, see the end of "A Basic Wiccan Rite."]

Sylvanus (Silvanus) and Esus: pictured with a cup and hammer, a Wolf God and a God of Woods and Vegetation, an Underworld God of Riches (cattle). As Eusus, He is many times associated with a bull and three cranes.

(Cernunnos, Sylvanus and Esus form a trinity comparable to Diana/Hecate/Selene [or Jupiter/Neptune/Pluto]. Sometimes They are seen as three separate deities, while at other times they are viewed as three aspects of the same God. The confusion is felt in that Aeracura is a Consort to one of the three, but it is not clear which one. If the three are considered to be as one, the problem is greatly reduced.)

Dio Casses: a collective name for a group of Gods worshipped by the Celts, possibly Road Gods. On some of the inscriptions, the name Cassiterides occurs, which was an early name for Britain, meaning beautiful or pleasant land.

Grouped Goddesses were considered more important than individual Goddesses, Who were known only as Consorts to certain specific Gods [so much for the theories of the Celts having a matriarchal religious system]. Professor Anwyl gives the following statistics: there are 35 Goddesses mentioned once, two twice, three thrice, one four times, two six times, two eleven times, one fourteen times (Sirona*), one twenty-one times (Rosemerta), and one twenty-six times (Epona). The following listing includes both individual and grouped Goddesses.

Belisama: "shining Goddess," representing Woman as the first civilizer, discovering agriculture, spinning, the art of poetry, etc. Perpetual fires burned in Her temples. [Also known as the Goddess of Light, and sometimes as Consort to Belenos].

Sul (Sulis): "to burn," associated with a cult of fire.

Nemetona: a War Goddess.

Andrasta (Andarta): "invincible." Sometimes worshipped [it is alleged] with human sacrifices.

Sirona* (Dirona): associated with Grannos, the "long lived" Goddess of Healing Wells and Fertility. [in England, She is also a Goddess of Rivers and of Wisdom]

Vesunna and Aventia (Avenches): also associated with Grannos.

Stanna: "the standing or abiding one."

Sequanna: Goddess of the Seine River.

Bormana and Damona: associated with Bormo.

Dea Brixia: Consort to the God Luxovius.

Abnoba, Clota, Divona, Icauna, Sabrina, Sinnan: River Goddesses.

Dea Arduinna and Dea Abnoba: both Forest Goddesses.

Rosemerta: Consort to one of the Mercury-like Gods, but which one is not clear.

Epona: A River Goddess and Goddess of Animals (especially Horses).

Deae Matres: grouped Goddesses, usually three in number, representing fertility and abundance.

Berecynthia: an individual representation of a triple Goddess.

Abonde: A fairy Goddess who brought riches to house.

Esterelle: a fairy Goddess who made women fruitful.

Aril: A fairy Goddess who watched over meadows.

Melusina and Viviane: two extremely popular fairy Goddesses [the latter of Whom was responsible for distracting the wizard Merddyn in the Arthurian Cycle—which are full of references to disguised Celtic Deities.]

Calendar

Midsummer Service will be held at sundown and Live Oak Grove on June 20, 1985. (On the grounds of the Druidical belief that the night precedes the day, in the reckoning of time.) Regular Services will be on June 30, July 14 and 28. For more info. (415) 254-1387.

A Druid Missal-Any Lughnasadh 1985 Volume 9 Number 5

Reaping and the Last Sheaf

By Emmon Bodfish

Lughnasadh, Feast of the First Fruits, begins the harvest season. Traditionally it marks the Funeral Games for Lugh, Celtic Sun-God, and by now it is clear that the summer is waning, and the Sun retreating southward. Our harvest this year at the Grove is hay, and apples, and the promise of Elderberries and Holly.

In line with the local fire prevention campaign, we were required to cut down the hay in the two and a half acre meadow at the bottom of the property. (This issue's trivia fact: the bent wooden handle of a scythe, the tall kind the Grim Reaper carries, is called a "snath." We had to order one through our local hardware store when the old one broke.) To speed things up, we also used a weed whip. While out there mowing, I thought: We should try enacting the old Celtic ceremony of "the cutting of the last sheaf." Up until the introduction of mechanical reaping machines in the last century, it was the custom in all the Celtic countries, and many on the borders of them, to leave standing the last "stook" of hay or grain, and then all those that have worked at the reaping of the field take turns throwing their sickles at it. The one who knocks it down is declared the "King of the Harvest" and the shout goes up that he "has got the Old Woman," presumably the spirit of the grain/hay/field, which has been driven into the last sheaf as the reapers advanced across the field. In some areas it was called the "Maiden" or the "Corn-Baby." In each case though, the sheaf was dressed up in makeshift clothes like a woman or a child, and is carried to the Harvest man's home on the last wagon amidst raucous shouts and song, "like a wedding procession" according to a Welsh source. It was hung up over the hearth, or, in Ireland over the door, or in the barn. In some places it was saved until Yule, when it was fed to the cattle, to keep them healthy. In other places it was kept until the following spring and then scattered over the field before it was sown. (Wrapping the trunks of birch trees in burlap...dressing the Last Sheaf, trimming and decorating Yule trees, ...What is this Celtic desire to put clothes on plants?)

On the Continent, in Gaulish lands, it is a woman who cuts and binds the last sheaf, after which she is called the "Oat-Bride" or "Hay-Bride" or whatever after the grain. She is escorted home amidst dancing and songs typical of weddings.

We left the last stook of hay standing in the field, and on Sunday, after the regular Druid ritual we went out in company and tied the tuft of hay into a sheaf with a rope of braided rush-grass. All the males took turns throwing the short sickle at it, and Larry A.D., knocked it down. He was declared King of the Harvest and the hay-sheaf was dressed up in a cap and apron which Willow-Oak had made. Larry carried it back on a pole.

As we have no cattle to whom to feed it on Yule, we will save it to scatter over the field.

Gaulish Gods

By Thomas M. Cross
Post Oak Proto-Grove

In my spare time (applying for new jobs) I did some research in Gaulish iconography and language and I have found some possible equivalents (linguistic etymological cognates) for major Irish gods that I have hitherto not seen in any books. Perhaps these were unavailable to past Celtic mythologists, or they are simply oversights. Clearly there are dozens of equivalents in the interpretation Romana that even MacCulloch overlooked and it even makes Caesar's interpretation inadequate for the ancient Roman purpose...for later many other Roman gods were equated with Gaulish gods.

In Belgica, the god named Loucetios appears. The name means "lightning" and appears elsewhere as Leucetios cognated with the Irish lochet. In Lugdunensis, Belisamaros appears as the male or masculine cognate of Belisama. Belisama's name appears in a Gaulish inscription of which I have no translation but it is written in Greek letters...in a rough transliteration of the Greek letters her name appears as Belesami which is probably with an oblique case-ending (dative or ablative), otherwise -i is genitive. On the other hand, Belisami could be a masculine genitive for Belisamaros however if you break the name down you have Belisa + maros (maros = "great" in Welsh mawr or Irish mór) at any rate the -os ending is usually masculine and is equivalent to Latin second declension -us or Greek -os.

Clearly Gaulish case-endings are so similar to Italic and Latin that it seems obvious that Celtic was closely related to Italic. In most of the Gaulish inscriptions of the Roman period, Gaulish is scanty and is usually only one word of Gaulish (a proper name) appearing in Latin sentences so one usually sees Gallic deities spelled in Latin with Latin case endings.

Bormo or Boruo is not necessarily the same deity as Bormanus. Bormo is usually paired off with Damona (Cow) and Bormanus is paired with Bormana. Bormo/Boruo is the root of the French Bourbonne, the root of the name of Bourbon in Bourbon whisky...this is an interesting parallel considering that Bourbon be given to that type of uisce beatha we have in America and that its name is rooted in the name of an ancient Gaulish god of boiling springs.

In Lugdunensis, there appears a possible cognate of the Irish Danu and Welsh Don, the mother of the gods, in Donnia which the Romans equated with Minerua. Maponos appears in Lugdunensis, however the name is spelled Mabonos, which in Britain appeared in ancient inscriptions as Maponus (notice the Latinized spelling). A sea god appears in Lugdenensis also called Moritasgos which seems to be a form of moritex "sailor." Perhaps Moritasgos is similar to Manannan/Manawydan?

In Aquitania, the god Vindon equated with Mercurius appears who name is definitely cognate with Irish Fionn and Welsh Gwynn ap Nudd. Sucellos appears there but the name is spelled Secuelos. There is an equivalent to the Irish Shannan perhaps in Siannus(?). In Aquitania, Boruo appears again but with an epithet Boruo Albius. Damona appears as Damona Matuberginnis, and there is Viducus-Mercurius...perhaps Vidu is cognate with Welsh Gwydion or gwyddon ("wise man"). Elsewhere and in Aquitania, Adsmerios-Mercurius, Mar-Tritullus, Rgisamos-Mars, Mogetus-Mars, and Maglo Matonio the first element Maglo is of the root of Welsh Mael (as in Maelgwn) and Matonio which seems cognate with Mathonwy or Math ap Mathonwy etc.

In Narbonensis, Mars is equated with Britouius, Budenicus, Buxenus, Olludius, and Pollux is equated with Vintios whose name could be the root of Welsh gwynt "wind" otherwise gwynt is from the Latin ventus. Cathubodua appears there and elsewhere as Cassibodua often equated by modern scholars with Badhbh Catha, but I recall the druid Cathbad in the Tain.

In the Danubian area, there is the Celtic god Cernenos whose name appears to be another spelling of Cernunnos (the horned god whose name appears on the altar dug up in Paris with the first letter missing -ernunnos), but in the Danube Cernenos, he is equated with the Roman Jupiter. One may also recall that other statues of male gods appeared with horns (which have been broken off since) which were Gallo-Roman Mercuries or Marses. Therefore we need not think that horns imply any special function or department. Too often we think of the horned god as a Chthonic god and I think this widespread concept is the result of the Wiccan and Margaret Murray theories* The Lugoues appear in the Danube region also it does in Spain. Lugoues is plural for Lugu which is undoubtedly Lugh or Lleu of insular tradition. Perhaps the Lugoues were a triple Lugh as Lugh could most probably been a triple God (MacCecht, MacCuill, MacGreine).

In the Danube region, there is Jupiter as Nundinarios; also a god of the Rhine? in Rhenus. The Gaulish word renos or rhenos means "river" which is the root of the name of the Rhine.

In the Alpine region, there is Mars-Vintius which recalls the Vintios-Pollux of Narbonensis.

In eastern Gaul, part of the older Belgica but latter called Germania Superior by the Romans, there appears Ciccollos which sounds much like Cichol Grigenchos of the Irish Lebor Gabala Erin who was a Fomoir. Also there is Meduna whose name seems to be cognate with Ireland's Medhbh (Medb) of Connacht in the Tain. This goddess's name means "mead" according to modern scholars and Meduna seems to be the feminine of medus (Gaulish for mead). Medb is also supposed to mean "intoxication."

Lenus appears in Germania Superior (Belgica east) and his name appears spelled in Greek letters, evidently Lenos in Gaulish as the Greek letters are transliterated. His name means probably "ocean" and is equivalent with Ler (Irish) or Welsh Llyr. There is Nodat equated with the Roman Mars—definitely another version of the Irish Nuadu or Nuada which also appears in the Welsh as Nudd and as Nodens and Nudens in ancient Britain (in Britain the Romans equated him with Jupiter).

Among the Treveri (Trier) they had many of the same deities in their pantheon (if one may use that term) as found all over the rest of Gaul, including a goddess called Boudina which has the root boud (victory) cognate with Irish buadh and Welsh budd.

The Gaulish terminology of words having to do with magic or religion are:

BACVCECS = possessed of evil spirits

TALAMASCA = female demon of the earth who appears in trees

CARAGVS = fortune-teller

NEMETON (NIMIDAS, NEMETOS) = a shrine, sacred place, a consecrated clearing, or simple "that which is sacred" (nem—"sacred" or "heavenly" from an Indo-European root meaning "vault of heaven")

CAVAROS = (transliterated Greek letters kauaros) "giant" cognate with Welsh cawr.

Kauaros

DVSIOS = a male demon, an incubus (or dusmus glossed by ancient Roman as "diabolos")
 VINDOMAGOS = paradise (modern Welsh gwynfa) literally "white-plain," but vindos (gwynn) was used also as "blessed" or as a noun for "bliss."
 BILIOMGOS = "plain of the sacred tree" Bilio is Gaulish cognate of Irish Bilé "sacred tree" which may remind one of the sacred trees which play many important parts in Irish lore and of the Norse Yggdrasil.

News of the Groves

Live Oak Grove

The gophers have returned in force to plague our lawn, now that the hills have dried up and the soil everywhere around us, being unwatered, is adobe brick. Since the Offering Shaft is lined in Terra Cotta, they can't tunnel into it and fill it us, as they have in previous years. This year we are planning to plant Euphorbia lathyris bushes. "Gopher Bane" around the edges of the circle. We hope that works.

Humbolt

Last Sunday, a "solitary Third" Order Druid, Les Craig/Hargar, came down out of the mountains of Humbolt. She came out to visit and brought her mother with her to see the Grove Site. Les organized a "between Moons" contemplative service/meeting under the huge Vigil-Oak a ways up the hill from the Grove. She said she is suffering from "ritual burn-out", and would like to try a democratic, anarchistic style of Druidism, and would like to hear from other who might be interested. It is a tribute to the breadth and flexibility of the Druid (RDNA) format and soul that we can do these kinds of experiments and that almost all style and needs can be included in the RDNA circle. Write to her c/o the Missal-Any address, here.

Fall Equinox Essay:

Brian Micheal and Bonnachann

By Emmon Bodfish

all Equinox is associated in the Celtic parts of the British Isles with the gathering of root crops. Many of the old customs have continued, in the Highlands and the Islands, and are enacted now in the name of the Micheal-mass festivals. Micheal is the Christian personality most often substituted for Lugh, or even Llyr, by the Old Celtic Church when it first came to the Celtic countries in the 4th and 5th centuries. The flaming sword and warrior aspect of the Archangel may have suggested a similarity to Lugh-of-the-Long-Arm and his spear in his defender, protector role. Most particularly, the quality of "shiningness" links the two.

Alexander Carmichael, collecting oral folklore in the 1830s, notes that in the Highlands, St. Micheal is spoken of as "an Brian Micheal," that is, the Demi-god Micheal. Christian saints, such as Columba or Andrew were called "Naomh" the usual translation of the Latin "sanctus." Brian Micheal rides a winged horse, and is the patron of sailors and ships, the former province of Llyr. There is no basis for either magical horses or control of the sea in the Biblical Archangel's exploits that I recall. The same powers and a fiery steed are attributed to him in Cornwall and Brittany, but never in Greek or Roman Christianity, i.e. south of the Alps.

Since some tiny carrots have sprung up in our lawn, we may do a version of the Highland Carrot ceremony come Fall Equinox. (The benefits of using kitchen compost for fertilizer.)

While one of our members went to the gathering at Harbin Hot Springs, the remaining Live Oak members celebrated Lughnasadh with a Bonnack Bake. Bonnacks, or in Scot's Gaelic "bonnachann," are small, unleavened cakes of sweet meal, often mentioned in old Celtic song and lore. The Romans on Hadrian's Wall describe Pictish raiders baking them over their campfires on the flats of their swords.

When it ripened, we cut the rye and wheat that had sprouted spontaneously in our Grove Circle. We decided to make some ceremonial bonnacks out of it. We thrashed it by hand, rubbing the grain heads between our hands, letting the grain fall on a clean white cloth, as described for the old Highland rites. Stacey discovered the best method of winnowing. She put the rubbed grain, still in its husks, in a slopping sided bowl, and blew lightly down the near side of the bowl, puffing the fine chaff up the opposite side and out, all the while shaking the grain in the bowl to bring more chaff to the top.

We made a fire of the last of the wood that Joan Carruth, ex A.D. of Live Oak Grove, current A.D. of Birch Grove, had donated when she moved East a few years ago. The fire burned down to good glowing cooking coals while we took turns grinding the grain in a hand mill, a never-used-before pepper mill, actually. We baked the bonnachann on the flat of a sword, in the old Pictish (Cruithnig) tradition, Ra'pheal lending his sword for the purpose. During the grinding we chanted the old Highland Quern Blessing, Larry reading the English and Emmon reading the Gaelic. Although we were prepared to bite into something "not so wonderful" and eat it anyway, the result were surprisingly good, especially with sweet butter. As Ra'pheal said, "Boy, this is bread 'from scratch'."

Bonnach Recipe

By Emmon Bodfish

Cut your grain with a bronze sickle when the heads are an even tan and dry. Thrash it over a clean white cloth and winnow it with your breath. Grind it until it is a fine meal. Mix it with whiskey and water and pat it into cakes. Cook slowly over a smooored fire, (on the flat of a sword) without turning them. (8-10 min.)

"Tha bonnach min milas aig Bride a' taobh d'an sliabh."

A Note on the Pronunciation of Gaulish Words and Names:

All vowels should be given their continental values as in Italian. The letters v and u are the same and should be pronounced as u in Luna; before vowels as English w. C and g should always be hard as in classical Latin. The diphthongs ae, ai should be sounded as the English "i" in like; oe and oi should sound as English oy in boy. The letter s should always be sounded unvoiced and never as a z- sound. According to J. Whatmough (Dialects of Ancient Gaul) and other Celtic philologists, the accent in Gaulish and Brythonic should be on the first syllable. Thus Atepomaros (Aht-ep-o-ma-rohs), Sucellos (SOO-kell-ohs), Maponos (MAHP-on-ohs), Cernunnos (Kairn-oon-ohs), Vindon (Wind-on), Matres Suleviae (MAH-tress SOO-leh-wee-ah-ee). In those names that are most Latinised, the accent should generally fall on the penultimate syllable (i.e. the second to last syllable.)

Samhain 1985

Volume 9 Number 7

Samhain Essay: Samhain Customs

By Emmon Bodfish

amhain, the break between the years, is one of the four major High Days of the Druid calendar. Throughout the Celtic lands, Samhain was the Great Gathering. Wars ceased, and representative Druids, Bards, Ovates, Kings, and Equites met at sacred sites, on the Plain of Murthema or with Conobar at Emain Macha in Ireland, or at Carnac in France. Similar convocations almost certainly met in Britain and Scotland, and perhaps in the Shetlands and the Orkneys as well.

The word Samhain may be derived, according to Francois LeRoux, from “sam fuim” meaning “weakening or end of summer,” though competing derivations from “sam rad” and “La samhna,” “rest” and “reunion” must also be considered. The LeRoux derivation concurs with the traditional date near the first of November, reflecting the Celtic division of the year into two long seasons, Summer and Winter, analogized to day and night. And as the Celtic calendar reckoned the night before the day, with each date beginning at sunset, the new-year began with Samhain, or sundown Samhain eve. It marked the end of the harvest. Anything still ungathered in the fields was left to the wild birds and the Pucas, Wood Sprites.

The rites and rituals have been lost, and we must piece together fragments from oral traditions, from 10th, 11th, and 12th century manuscripts of Irish law and commentaries, old customs and descriptions found in the Cuchulain and Find(h) epics. We gave a rendering of one such description of a Samhain ceremony from the old Irish in last Samhain's Missal-Any.

One of our subscribers, Jeanne Elizabeth, has translated some of LeRoux's work on the social and historical significance of the holiday, from her articles in the French journal “Ogam.” As far as I can find, these essays have not been available in English.

Samhain, LeRoux emphasizes, was first of all a universal observance, required, on pain of exile, of every member of the community. It was called the holiday of obligation.

“Samhain is first of all a holiday of obligation, an approximate expression when it is applied to an ancient holiday, but practical, in order to express the restrained tone and universality. Such a holiday, was celebrated with dignity: An assembly was held by the Ulates each year, that is to say, three days before Samhain and three days after, and the High Day of Samhain itself. It was the time when the Ulates were in the plain of Murthema, and they held the assembly of Samhain each year. There was nothing in the worlds that was not done by them at this time to enhance the games, gatherings, reunions, pomp and magnificence, with costly goods and banquets, and it is from there that came the (custom of) the three days of Samhain in all Ireland.

‘Conchobar himself served them at the holiday of Samhain, because of the reunion of a great crowd. It was necessary to nourish the great multitude, as all those of the Ulates who did not come to Emain on the night of Samhain and the three days after Samhain, lost their reason, and their sepulchral mounds were prepared, each one's tomb and his headstone set the following morning. There were great provisions at Conchobar's the three days before and three days after Samhain that marked the feast at his palace.’

So runs the stanza from the Birth of Conchobar. At these gatherings, kings were chosen or reaffirmed. Debts and quarrels were settled and laws for the coming year enacted. It was a sacred and magical time, and the corridor to the Other World, to the Ancestors and the Gods, was open, and communications, and even goods and people, or at least their souls, could pass between our world and the Other. The Sidhe Mounds were said to open, and horses or children who had been lost, spirited off by the Sidhe, or other denizens of the Other World, could return or be brought back. But likewise the Deities and ancestors could exact reprisal for offenses against them, or demand changes and send signs confirming or denying victory or prosperity. Kings who had broken their “Guise,” ritual taboos, or warriors who had made unjust war, were in particular danger of being struck dead or carried off at this time.

A typical Samhain tale is found in the Echtra Nerai epic:

On the eve of Samhain Ailill and Medhbh, king and queen of Connacht, offer the prize of his choice to whomever succeeds in putting a withe around the foot of either of two captives who had been hanged the previous day. Nera alone accepts the challenge. He goes to the gallows but he only succeeds in fixing the withe after the corpse has instructed him. The corpse then complains of thirst and Nera carries him on his back to a dwelling in which he finds water. Having replaced him on the gallows, he returns to the royal court of Cruachain only to find it in flames and the severed heads of its people near by. As the attacking warriors move off, Nera follows them into the Cave of Cruachain, a famous gateway to the otherworld. Once inside the sidh he is discovered but is permitted to remain. He takes a wife from among the women of the sidh and from her he learns that his vision of the destruction of the court of Cruachain was but a premonition: it will come true next Samhain, however, unless the sidhe is ravaged before then. He sets out to bring warning to his own people, carrying with him fruits of summer—wild garlic and primrose and golden fern—to prove whence he had come, and he finds his friends still seated around the cauldron as he had left them, though much had befallen him in the meantime. When Samhain returns, the Connacht warriors invade and plunder the sídh and carry off the three great treasures of Ireland. But Nera remains behind with his family in the sídh and there he will stay until Doomsday.

Nera remains behind as exchange for the treasures, or as reprisal for the plundering. This illuminates one side and meaning of Celtic sacrifice, and may also echo the more ancient ideas of the death of divine victims, priests married to Goddesses, or who assumed a God's identity. The Nerthus traditions of Germanic society are a close parallel. The priest who tended Nerthus' wagon during its annual summer journey through the countryside was sent to join Her at the end of the ritual pilgrimage. The bodies of some of these male attendants, found with Her wagons in Danish bogs show, according to Prof. P.V. Glob, slight muscular development and hands that had never done rough work. These were not slaves. Neither were they prisoners of war, i.e. warriors, nor criminals, the two most common groups used for sacrificial purposes.

Nera could be a memory of a cultural parallel. He (1.) accepts a magical or magic-laden challenge, more the stuff of a Druid, first function/caste, than a warrior; (2.) he sees a vision and prophesizes; (3.) he is married to a supernal being; (4.) he leaves the mortal world, forever, to join her and serve as recompense for the treasures gained by mortals, his kinsmen.

In modern N.R.D.N.A. celebrations of the holiday, vigils are in order, and vision-quests prayers for guidance in major life-changes are in order. It is a time to tie up loose ends and settle debts, to, as Jim Duran said, "get straight with your ancestors," deceased relatives and departed friends. If you are keeping an all night vigil, leaving out a plate of food or a remembrance for the spirits or departed friends is one way.

I've been asked on several occasions if there is a Druidic trickster god. Bricriu, a character in the Táin Bó Cuailnge, and possibly a euhemorized god, comes the closest. He comes even closer to being a sort of Celtic Discordia. His epithet was "Poison Tongue."—Emmon Bodfish

The Feast of Bricriu

Of the many Ulster tales not specifically related to Táin Bó Cuailnge one of the most important is Fledh Bhricrenn, "the Feast of Bricriu." As the title suggests, the setting for this story, as for so many others in Irish literature, is the communal feast, an occasion of primary importance in all heroic societies. The prime mover here is Bricriu the trouble-maker, the Irish counterpart of the Scandinavian Loki. He invites the Ulstermen to a great feast which has taken a year to prepare, but they are very willing, indeed anxious, to forgo the honour, knowing full well his propensity for setting his guests by the ears. He will not be put off, however, and promises stern retribution if they refuse: "I will stir up strife among the kings, leaders, heroes and lesser nobles, till they will slay one another...I will cause enmity beneath father and son so that they will kill each other. But if that be not possible, I will set mother and daughter at a variance. And if that be not possible, I will cause strife between the two breasts of every woman in Ulster so that the smite each other till they rot and putrefy." In the face of such a threat, the Ulsterman cannot but acquiesce.

Live Oak celebrated Fall Equinox here on the 22nd. Our Lughnasadh Corn Doll joined the party.

But more urgent, we will be holding the annual Grove Elections at the Samhain Meeting and Celebration. This will also be the time to elect the directors of our Legal Non-profit Corp. Nominations are now open, write in, phone in, holler in, but don't ignore. We will be electing an Arch Druid, a Preceptor, and a Server, also a president, treasurer and secretary for the Non-profit Corporation. Co-secretaries and other directors can also be elected to the board. The catch is that they have to sign their names to the annual tax form, and let the government have their addresses. Consider this if you or your nominee are allergic to government paper.

Do not get mad at our answering machine; you may be old and weak some day too.

EDITOR's NOTE 2002: Unfortunately it was the incorporation as a non-profit corporation that led to the Live Oak Grove's downfall. Because money and land was involved, the Grove's "have-nots" wanted what the "haves" had. Emmon worked so hard for the non-profit status and it meant so much to him. Because of the coup on this election day, a "proper" Grove was not reformed, we don't know what happened to LOG. The have-nots got a hold of it and it consequently died. Stay tuned.

How To Take An Anglo-Saxon Shower

Jon Carroll
San Francisco Chronicle

I have this theory that long ago, before the Anglos and the Saxons had the Normans pillaged their way to island hegemony, the Celts understood about plumbing. Pipes and U-joints were to them as bird calls and bent grasses were to the American Indian.

The invaders were threatened by this superior knowledge, and forced the proud Irish and Scots and Welsh to destroy their illuminated tomes of sewage lore. Dismantled were the elaborate aqueducts; beheaded were the master plumbers and their rubber friends.

Yule Essay:

Bards, Ogma and Ogham

By Emmon Bodfish

Yule begins Winter, Geimredh, season of the Bard. The File and Bards, like the troubadours who followed them, practiced their art "from Samain until summer" as in the old poem of Forgoll, the Bard, who tells King Mongan a story each night from his wise repertory. And, as Keatings explains, commenting on the Old Irish, the winter practices of the File, lodging from house to house in exchange for their songs and stories, had become such a great burden for Ireland, that a king had the idea of banishing them:

"It is by Aodh son of Ainmire that a great assembly of Drom Ceat was convened where there was a gathering of the nobles and ecclesiastics(?) of Ireland. Aodh had three reasons to convene this assembly, the first of them being to banish the File and Bards because they constituted a heavy burden and were hard to govern."

At this time, Keatings adds, almost a third of the well-born men in Ireland belonged in some way to the Bardic class. "And from Samhain to Beltaine, they lodged at the homes of the nobles of Ireland." The project failed because Conchobar, to show his Druid orthodoxy and generosity, gathers up the File and Bards and maintains them for seven years, and also sends Cuchulainn to meet them. (It is not, in the light of this, accidental that we have more verse remaining about Conchobar than about any other Pre-Christian Irish king.)

The tradition continued after the Christianization. A folklorist whom the Rees quote recalled that

"Just until recently, the Irish story tellers, heritors of the Bards, also did not exercise their art during the summer. In order to feel at ease, it had to be winter and night had to have fallen."

The patron god of Bards and story tellers is Ogmios, Champion of Strength and Eloquence. Lucian, writing in the second century, equates him with Roman Hercules, but notes these differences. First, Ogmios is portrayed as an old man, white haired, but still powerful. The Gauls, he learned through his native acquaintance, associate eloquence with the old champion, and not with Hermes, whom they see as too young and callow. On one of the temples or art works then extant, Ogmios, he says, is pictured leading a joyful band of men, attached to him by thin chains which link their ears to the tip of his tongue, a striking visual portrait of persuasive ability. The Irish god Ogma or Oghma, is clearly the same divine persona, though Prof. MacCana feels that the name may be a borrowing instead of a genuine cognate. But the figure appears, often qualified by the title "Grainaineach" of-the-Sun-like-Countenance, and The Honey-Mouthed, both in Ireland and Wales as on the Continent. He is also known as "trenfher," champion, or literally the "heavy man." In insular traditions he is not only the patron of eloquent speech, but the inventor of writing, in the old Irish system of Ogham letters. This is a system of writing made up of bars of varying lengths placed above and below a central line. It is of uncertain origin, but clearly designed for carving on stone, or at the end of square pillars.

It continued in use into the Early Middle Ages. MacCana believes it probably evolved out of an earlier set of magical symbols, perhaps some of the same ones that gave rise to the Norse Runes.

As Ogam came into use after the Celts were exposed to the Latin alphabet, MacCana contends it may have evolved thus: "seeing the utility of the Sound=Letter system of Latin script, the Gauls may have let the magic symbol whose name contained the sound stand for that sound in all words." Other scholars, such as Prof. Rhys, and Charles Squire, believe Ogam was the indigenous script of Ireland. They stress that it more closely resembles a binary or trinary code, akin to the bars and lines of the I Ching, than the picture writing of sound diagrams from which Mediterranean and hence all Western systems of letters evolved.

Most Ogam inscriptions are found in Ireland and Scotland, where the Romans never came. (Druidism is full of these riddles.)

Being in this way the God of Writing, it may not be an accident that Oghma is one of the very few Celtic gods for whom we have written records of his worship, i.e. prayers. Two "defixiones," inscribed tablets, were found in France on which Ogmios is beseeched to avenge the author and wreck a curse on certain individuals. In Irish sources, he is also the Champion in this sense of judge and avenger, and to him binding oaths are made. He is invoked as "the god who binds" the binding power of words and oaths, the spell-binding power of eloquence, so graphically portrayed by the thin golden chains by which he leads his listeners, in the scene described by Lucian. This ability to persuade, convince, and enchant with words was highly regarded in Celtic society, and a part of the training of Bard, Filidh, and Druid alike. LeRoux speculates that the “magic of Ogam” that Cuchulainn used in the Tain Bo Cuailnge to stop, single handed, the advance of the Connaught army, was not supernatural magic, but persuasion, or eloquent diplomacy and playing for time.

Thus, Oghma is the one to invoke in negotiations, when eloquent speech and persuasive ability are needed.

Oghmic Incantation

Here is an incantation to an Oghma like figure of “Sun-like Countenance” from the Scottish oral folk tradition. The Preceptor has used it and gives testimony of its utility.

The litigant went at morning dawn to a place where three streams met. And as the rising sun gilded the mountain crests, the man placed his two palms edgeways together and filled them with water from the junction of the streams. Dipping his face into this improvised basin, he fervently repeated the prayer,

Ionnlaith mise m’aodann
‘S na naodh gatha greine,
Mar a dh’ionnlaid Moire a Mac
Am bainne brac na breine.

Gaol a bhi ‘na m’aodann,
Caomh a bhi ‘na m’ghnuis,
Caora meala ‘na mo theanga,
M’anail mar an tuis.

Is dubh am bail ud thall,
Is dubh daoine th’ann;
Is mis an eala bhan,
Banruinu os an ceann.

Falbhaidh mi an ainme Dhe,
An riochd feidh, an riochd each,

An riochd nathrach, an riochd righ:
Is treasa lion fin na le gach neach.

I will wash my face
In the nine rays of the sun,
As Mary washed her Son*
In the rich fermented milk.

Love be in my countenance,
Benevolence in my mind,
Dew of honey in my tongue,
My breath as the incense.

Black is yonder town,
Black are those therein,
I am the white swan,
Queen above them.

I will travel in the name of God,
In likeness of deer, in likeness of horse,
In likeness of serpent, in likeness of king:
Stronger will it be with me than with all persons.

*A later introjection which does not rhyme.

Samhain—Due to an unfortunate misunderstanding, half of the members were under the impression that the vigil was the night of the 7th – 8th of November, although it was the evening of the 6th through the morning of Samhain Day, November 7. “For they (the Druids) count the nights before the days.” Lacking a quorum, those of us present voted to postpone the elections until regular services the following Sunday, November 10. To all those who missed the vigil: We apologize. Those who missed out held a vigil at the Grove Site the following night.

At elections, November 11, 1985, Emmon Bodfish resigned as Preceptor. The officers elected were:

Offensive Opinions Department

(Some people like it, some people hate it. It grew out of a discussion of Cernunnos, and last Fall's Missal-Any...)

- T: "Well, I'll concede on the matter of Cernunnos (being Celtic) but I still think He is connected with Val Camonica and Paleolithic hunting magic."
- E: "I agree; I'm not fighting you on that. In fact I think that Jim Duran DOES connect Him, as Cernunnos, with the pre-Bronze Age horned gods like at Val Camonica, and before that with the hunter's rock paintings from the Stone Age, and with the Siberian Reindeer Shamans, too."
- T: "They were still going in the 1920s and '30s. In Mircea Eliade's book Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy he goes into that."
- E: "Have you got Jim's tape of his seminar, 'The Horned God of Europe?'"
- T: "Yeh, I've got that one. It's on there."
- E: "He sees all of Northern Europe and Western Siberia as one Paleolithic cultural area: similar myths, concepts, and graphic motifs, similar mental pictures. They've all got the Reindeer Shaman Theme: the shaman who leaves his body and travels to the Reindeer Mother, the "Mother of Herds," the Earth-prosperity Dispensing Deity, and brings back the souls of reindeer or some other prey animals, and scatters them in the forest to increase the deer, whom the hunters can then go out and harvest. That's the general idea of the myth, anyway. And it's found all across Central Siberia and Northern Europe to Cornwall and Ireland. He's one of the most persistent archetypes, the Flying Shaman who brings back food and prosperity, if we keep the taboos and are good." Connected to Pluto, maybe, the Underworld deity who also sends prosperity.

- T: "I think fauns, Pan, Satyrs, Zandharva types are also related to Cernunnos, and the reindeer deities. I think the original Indo-Europeans, the Kurgan people, for example, were slightly more agricultural than the Finn-Ugric, Ural Altaic Siberian types. They were slightly less nomadic, as they moved into more fertile lands where they settled down."
- E: "But He's still food and fertility oriented."
- T: "Indo-European third function – obedience, resourcefulness, health, fertility, fecundity, loyalty."
- E: "And according to Kieswetter, the Flying Shaman is still with us, under the pseudonym of an obscure Cornish saint, who probably never existed. We call him "Santa Claus;" he'll get a lot of press for the next few weeks."
- T: "The saint you mean is probably St. Cornely, who I've read in a lot of places has something to do with Cernunnos."
- E: "Have you seen the 19th century painting in Murray's book, the one where he still has little horns on his forehead?"
- T: "That's funny, Santa having a Reindeer-Cult connection!"
- E: "Count'em: He lives at the North Pole and has flying reindeer; the Shamans in Siberia fly 'through the Pole Star' on their ecstatic journey. Santa Claus brings us presents from there, a 'right merry old elf;' the Shaman brings back reindeer souls, hence food and feasting. Santa has elves, i.e. familiar spirits, that work for him; so do Shamans. The special red coat and pointy cap Santa wears, his having a special outfit, riding a flying deer or a flying horse, it all sounds right out of Eliade. Does this mean that all those department store Santa Clauses are doing a 'god-assumption' ritual?"
- T: "Could be. But Christmas trees are Nordic-Druidic, the Indo-European strata."
- E: "But I agree with you that Cernunnos, or really the Horned God, Cernunnos is just one instance of Him, is pre-Indo-European, or maybe Proto-Indo-European, too. The Indo-Europeans may have brought Him with them from the Caucus homeland. So this year let's get ourselves red suits and participate in this 10,000 year old religious ritual: eat until you drop."

Oimeic Essay: Baby Naming

By Emmon Bodfish

imeic, Thaw, Lady Day, birth of the lambs and goats. This is the Festival of Bride Fire Goddess, Divine Midwife, Ruler of the hearth and the byre, and guardian of birth. It was to Bride that the old Celts prayed and sacrificed when a child was being born. Then, after She was thanked for a live birth, the child was ushered into the Celtic community by the Druid naming ceremony. The parents in ancient Britain did not name the child, but rather the foremost Druid of the clan or fife offered a name, based on the circumstance at the birth. In the case of "great souls," heroes or heroines, a Druid connected with the future child's family might receive a vision, and prophesy a name and destiny for the child.

Françoise Le Roux in her study, Les Druides, describes three instances of Druid namings that have survived in the literary fragments of Pagan Celtic Culture. (So much of the rich Celtic Bardic work was lost in the Romanization and then more again in the Christianization of Europe and the Isles; we must piece together a heritage from what is left to us, mostly by the Irish Bardic Schools, and in the oral folk traditions. We have nothing comparable to the Bramanas of India, or even the Islandic/Nordic mythologies, though there is ample evidence that such a body of knowledge and art existed in the Celtic World.) A re-naming could occur in adult life, in the case of equites, (warrior-caste) or Druids, on the basis of their deeds, particularly if the warrior left his household and became a member of a different clan.

Ms. LeRoux (Translated from the French by Jean Elizabeth)

"The Druids intervened at the beginning of life, just, as we have seen, they occupied themselves with death. In Ireland, they officiated by giving a name, based on a particular detail or noteworthy happening. It is this that Cuchulainn, formerly named Setanta, got his name from the Druid, Cathbad. Having killed the fighting dog of the blacksmith, Culann, he, himself, rendered such equitable judgment that King Conchobar and his Druid, Cathbad, were astonished at the little boy:

'What judgment will you render on this, boy?' said Conchobar. 'If a young dog of the same line exists in Ireland, I will bring him up just to the point where he is as capable as his father. Meanwhile, I will myself be the dog who will protect the flocks, the goods and the land of Culann.'

'You have rendered a good judgment, little boy,' said Conchobar. Cathbad declared, 'In all truth, we could not have rendered a better one ourselves. Why don't we name you Cu Chulainn, the dog of Culann?' ... And from this moment onward he had this famous name, Cuchulainn, because he had killed the blacksmith, Culann's, dog." (Ogam, XI, 214-215)

King Conchobar's naming is even more interesting:

"A child was born with a worm in each hand. He was taken, in the fetal position to the river that was named Conchobar; the river passed by him on his back. Cathbad took the child and gave him the name of the river, Conchobar, son of Fachtna; having taken the boy and put him on his lap, Cathbad gave thanks for him, and prophesized about him." (Ogam, XII, 240)

A simple sign was enough. At the beginning of the Longes mac n-Usnig, the Exile of Usnech's Sons, the Ulates were assembled for a great feast in the house of Fedlimid. They received the announcement that Fedlimid's wife is with child. The Druid, Cathbad, then foretells that the baby will be a girl of extraordinary beauty and magnetism. She will have skin like snow, blond hair, magnificent blue eyes, ruddy cheeks, flawless teeth, and lips as red as coral. But, Cathbad adds, in order to get this treasure of a child, the Ulates will end up fighting each other.

"Cathbad then put a hand on the mother's stomach and the unborn babe stirred under the touch of his hand. He said that in all truth the baby would be a girl, that Derrriu would be her name, and that she would be pure, surrounded by evil." ("True, but surrounded by weakness.")

She must have also had considerable Bardic talent, by the later accounts and the poems that are attributed to her. I include a translation of one that survives. It is from the Penguin Classic A Celtic Miscellany and her name is spelled Deirdre, in the Scottish fashion, translator unclear, the editor, perhaps, Ms. Betty Radice.

—E.B.

21. Deirdre Remembers a Scottish Glen

Glen of fruit and fish and pools, its peaked hill of loveliest wheat, it is distressful for me to think of it—glen of bees, of long-horned wild oxen.

Glen of cuckoos and thrushes and blackbirds, precious is its cover to every fox; glen of wild garlic and watercress, of woods, of shamrock and flowers, leafy and twisting crested.

Sweet are the cries of the brown-backed dappled deer under the oak-wood above the bare hill-tops, gentle hinds that are timid lying hidden in the great-treed glen.

Glen of the rowans with scarlet berries, with fruit fit for every flock of birds; a slumbrous paradise for the badgers in their quiet burrows with their young.

Glen of the blue-eyed vigorous hawks, glen abounding in every harvest, glen of the ridged and pointed peaks, glen of blackberries and sloes and apples.

Glen of the sleek brown round-faced otters that are pleasant and active in fishing; many are the white-winged stately swans, and salmon breeding along the rocky brink.

Glen of the tangled branching yews, dewy glen with level lawn of kine; chalk-white starry sunny glen, glen of graceful pearl-like high-bred women.

We loved the piece on Santa Claus and the Horned God, keep up the good work!

Spring Equinox Essay:

Votive Offerings

By Emmon Bodfish

pring Equinox, the Sun crosses the Equator and shines down over the Northern tropics. It is dawn at the North Pole. This is one of the four Minor Celtic High Days. The grain of the last sheaf, made into the Corn-doll last autumn,* has been taken down from its place of honor, torn apart and scattered over the field prior to plowing. This holiday is one of renewal: planting, cleaning, fasting and "taking the bathes," visiting holy wells and springs. In Southern Britain, if I recall an oral tradition correctly, it was associated with Sulis, Goddess of hot springs and the Rites at Bath, and perhaps in Gaul with Sequanna, Goddess of the source of the River Seine. Here, in the valley of Dijon, numerous votive offerings to Her have been found, and traditions dramatically emphasizing Her powers to cure the sick were recorded by classic writers. (c.f. Barry Cunliffe, though he does not list his sources for this.) Twenty-two wooden plaques, carved in relief to represent internal organs, one, better preserved, showing anatomically accurate depiction of trachea and lungs, have been recovered.

"The Celtic religious sense was strongly marked by the principle of reciprocity. To save a life, another would be sacrificed. Similarly," Cunliffe states, "if sacred waters were used by someone wanting a cure, a gift in exchange was expected of the user." Votive offerings found in this spring portray the hopes of the pilgrims who brought them, like the exquisite statue of the little blind girl from the shrine of Sequanna. Other carvings are of organs or limbs, perhaps to communicate with the Goddess or to focus the ritual's participants attention on the afflicted part. Wooden votives were carved from the heartwood of the Oak, and may depict the entire figure of the donor, sometimes holding the offering he has brought; a lamb, a jewel, a bar of silver. Most have very individual faces, as contrasted with the smooth, archetypical faces of Celtic God statues."

This is a time to get healthy; do a sauna or visit the Hot Springs, re-organize and get ready for Beltaine.

The Heathen on the Heath:

Balance and Planting

By Les Craig-Harger, Humboldt County, CA

On the farm, the day of equal-night may pass, as usual, unmarked by any observance, yet no less sacred; sacred is each moment to its own purpose. Remember the day of planting, and keep it holy, for few hours separate the rain and clumping mud from the onrushing Too Late, wherein seedlings rise just in time for the devouring heat of midsummer, and bolt before any but the birds and mealybugs have tasted them! Forget not the blessed days of foal-gentling, before the young horse can overcome its wobbliness and see what tottering and snail-paced wimps we two legs are! And are the fowls laying, and where—sacred to this purpose are a thousand times and places, including the tool shed, or your tennies drying on the front porch.

And so sometime after the blooming of the first roses, and the setting out of beans and tomatoes from the greenhouse, someone may notice that spring has, indeed, sprung, and too bad we didn't have time for a Maypole last week...

One may be thankful for the Equinox as it whizzes by, seeing that the daylight hours finally hold their own with the hours of tripping over the water-hose and falling in the compost pit. One may recognize the rich generosity of the Mother in the blackness of dirty fingernails, and the smell of last year's dead leaves calling out to this year's living plants. On the day of the Equinox I may be on my hands and knees in the rain, planting with my fingers in a narrow raised bed, so that each row can be reached without putting my weight on the moist earth. I may be hunting ducks' eggs in the dew, with my son gathering feathers behind me. This year, I may be watching the cow calve, or frantically stringing fence against the incursions of milk stealing steers. But meditations may creep across the back of my mind, meditations of this day of balance, or precious and minutely-measured time—of economy, the ever shifting economy of life and of the earth, which makes hay, as the sun begins to shine, of all our smaller concerns.

In the city, our time is worth money. I could lay aside my shovel, take pen in hand, and prove to myself that in not renting a tractor to till my garden, I am earning perhaps eleven cents an hour. But what cosmic Boss offers me money for this time? and is not my time mine to keep or use, as well as sell? If I compare the time of buddy boots, dripping sweat, and peace with the time of driving cars and sitting at desks, I laugh. And if my time is not entirely my own, but also Hers, shall I offer Her days of my good, smelly, biodegradable toil, or hours and minutes of noise and spewing hydrocarbons? (Hours and minutes, which by Her own executive fiat, may not come until the time for planting is past, for it would take a worse farmer than I am to roll a thousand pounds of metal over the fragility of wet ground, when my own feet can tread their appointed walkways, and fingers and Garden-Weasel, while inefficient, will at least not undo the work of a year's composting.

And what do we plant? As we follow Mother around the garden, clumping like children in Her cast-off shoes, which game of creation shall we play? Each has its own rules; every garden must be a little ecosystem, hopefully favoring plants over pests, and competing successfully with a system of crabgrass, slugs, gooseberry runners, and aphids that already works perfectly well, thank you. The hardy radish will crowd out the weeds, but how many radishes will one family eat? Perhaps I can sell them turnips again this year, if I chop them up finely in Chinese food, or dissolve them in lentil soup. Carrots love tomatoes, and vise versa, but neither of them loves my heavy acid loam; can I till in some sand, without merely creating a playground for the gophers? (My onions, potatoes, and garlic are planted—long before the Equinox—in old truck tires with wood or wire beneath them; for such gopher-ambrosia as these, I must create not only a separate ecosystem, but a separate little planet, inaccessible to nature's little restaurant critics.) The years teach me to recognize lost causes, too; Bak Choi will substitute for celery and cabbage both, and the mealybugs will at least share it with me. We ask for what we want, and do what we can to earn it, but the final choice is at the Mother's whim, varying from year to year. One year someone wished me either piss or peace, and got the accent wrong, for peas were upon me until long after summer should have withered them, whether I ever cultivated them properly or not. The next year, everyone ate a lot of borscht; the next, we learned a thousand and one ways to cook banana squash. I cannot bring myself to despair of eggplants, artichokes, or corn, but surely She laughs at my efforts, as each year's one-meal harvest is celebrated with a toast of "Better luck next time!"

So I'll raise a dented beer-can to this day of balance, before I've forgotten it (and drink the half that doesn't get poured in the slug-traps) and then go on to do as I've always done, celebrating not days, but seasons of labor and years of learning. Like most of Her mob of grubby kids, I love our Mother more than I bother to tell Her; and perhaps as we lesser mothers of forgetful offspring do, She know this. Another year of Her rough patience with my efforts has begun...

A prehistoric mural from the neolithic shrine at Catal Huyuk, Turkey. The 72 honeycomb-like cells seem to represent a natural calendar. Some cells are filled with symbols that look like bees, blossoms, and barley. The placement of the symbols seems anchored to the vernal equinox. (From Echoes of the Ancient Skies).

I liked the whole idea behind the derivation of Santa Claus from Cernunnos or the horned god in general. What was Herne the hunter anyway? Who was Herne...obviously he is the West Germanic cognate of Cernunnos...INDO-EUROPEAN *KERN- *KORN- "horn"

Latin: cornu = horn

Gaulish: carnu = horn (other dialects: cernu=horn)

Germanic: hernu = horn (Old English: hornu perhaps)

Grimm's law about K becoming Germanic H would mean that Herne is as ancient as Cernunnos and both coming from P.I.E. and therefore Herne is not borrowed from Celtic unless before the Consonantal shift of before 300 B.C. or earlier. The Germanic shift of Indo-European consonants called Grimm's law etc. is supposed to have occurred at least before 300 B.C. This would mean that proto-Germanic pempe would become Germanic femfe and eventually Gothic fimf, and Old English-Anglo-Saxon fif ect.

The neophyte brahmanic student or brahmacharin was given an antelope skin cloak from his guru during his initiation...along with the sacred thread or cord, plus a staff made of a special sacred wood...Doesn't this get-up put to mind the shamans of Finn-Ugrian types or what one might imagine the Celtic Druids. AND...if the antelope fur cloak still had the antler or horns intact, would that not resemble the dancing sorcerer of the Trois Freres cave and other upper Paleolithic and bronze age figures of alpine and central western Europe, which were supposedly shamans doing hunting magic rites. This would tie them in with Indo-European priesthoods such as Brahmans, Bhlaghmens, Flamines, Druids, volkhvy, Ktistai, hierophants, hotri, adhvaryus, magas (magi) atarvans, goturs, gaotars, gutuaters, gydhurs, etc.

Where the Brahmin student is given his sacred cord and belt, the Druid student was given his sacred torc and belt...both had staves of sacred wood and both had cloaks of the fur of a horned animal of one sort or another. The brahmanaran had a guru tutor him in an ashram whilst the druidic-pupil was tutored by his ollamh in a secluded nemeton school...both were furnished with huts both in India and Europe and both included studying wisdom, myths, poems, verses and stories by rote frontwards and backwards, both were done by mnemonic devices such as singing and reciting and much listening and repeating. Both students had to attend to sacred fires and keep them burning...and both greeted the sun every morning and early evening.

That's probably much of the similarities and close they were to some original Indo-European method of learning and worshipping.

Anyway, I want to get this off quickly and I'll make time to get the rest of my letter and more to come soon...

Beltane Essay: Fire Making

By Emmon Bodfish

eltaine, May Day, festival of bonfires, greeting to Belenos, the returning Sun. It is the beginning of summer, Season of Life. In old "Celtdom" cattle were moved to the highland pastures; modern Third Order R.D.N.A. Druids exchange their white ceremonial ribbons for red ones.

In ancient Britain, Ireland and Gaul, according to the witness of the Classical writers and to numerous folk traditions, all fires were extinguished on Beltaine Eve, and a "new, clean fire" kindled by the Druids, "through means of friction, from logs of Oak." In Gàidhlig this process is called "tog an teine," lifting fire out of the wood.

Making fire by friction is a ceremonial skill that one or a few members of each Grove might want to try.

The bow and drill method is the easiest.

Make a fire-board of Oak, well seasoned, very dry. With a knife or a pointed stone, make a shallow hole, a cup, near the edge of the board. Whittle a "V" notch in from the edge of the board, with the "V's" point at the cup. Don't cut through into the cup/hole. Making the notch, which is undercut, wider on the bottom side of the board, helps. Place your tinder in the notch. (More about tinder later.) With the board on a firm, dry surface, hold it steady by kneeling on it, or holding it down with your foot as you drill. Put the drilling stick in the cup and hold down on it with the "fire hold" block. Then with the bow, spin it as fast as you can. Persistence and consistent speed pay. Use a "fire-stick," i.e. a drill, of at least 3/8 inch diameter. Thinner sticks dissipate heat and cool off too quickly. And, as our Humboldt County "Third" says, it also helps to have someone else to push down on the top of the "fire-hold." "As we work a bow back and forth like that, our arms automatically tend to rise." If no one else is around, hold down on it with your chin. (Paleolithic fire-holds are the joy of Old World archeologists.)

The fire-stick can also be turned by hand. I have not done this and I don't know anyone who has been able to get this way to work. It may have to be a group endeavor, with a number of people spelling each other in relay. But, so I'm told; "Use a longer drill than you would with the bowed method and roll it between your palms. When your hands reach the bottom, quickly let go and return them to the top of the stick and keep it spinning." With either of these methods, it is easier and surer if you have a group of people. With the right choreography, this could be worked into the Beltaine Ceremonies as an effective part of co-operative ritual.

After a while, you will see smoke waver up from the cup-hole then hot black powder will well up and out into the notch; keep turning, faster. Press down harder. Press the tinder into the notch and against the red hot glowing firestick. If you turn the drill fast enough, sparks may jump out and catch the tinder. When you see a red, glowing area in the cup or on the notch, gently remove the fire-stick, and breath on the glow till it becomes a bright gleam. Then pick up the fireboard and tinder together and press the tinder around the incandescence. Carefully breath it into life. This part takes practice and finesse, minute attention, and great awareness of the right moment. In other words it is a meditation. Mastery over fire, like playing the violin, is not learned easily. In many pre-agricultural societies it is considered one of the marks of the Shaman or Adept.

For tinder, I use the feather "wolf-lichen," Letharia vulpine, that grows on Orinda coyote bushes, with lots of fine, dry splinters of resinous pine or juniper, and thinly shredded paper at the center of the bundle. Bradford, in his survival books, recommends lint, from your pocket, and very dry pine needles or shredded bark. ("finely shredded pieces of the "Wall Street Journal" soaked in lighter fluid is great."—Good-Gulf the Wizard) When the tinder begins to flame, gently set it to the kindling under your previous readied altar fire. Continue breathing on it auspiciously, coaxing it into a blaze. From this "new clean fire" re-kindle all your fires. By now you know why pre-industrial people kept fire burning, and never let it go completely out.

An Aside

"Match" is from "maide" meaning "little stick" in Gàidhlig. The match was invented by a Scotsman. Be grateful.

The Heathen on the Heath: Growth and Life

Beltaine, Belanos, love's return. The sacred shampoo commercial, Lord and Lady finally looking up, enraptured, to meet each other's eyes and fling themselves, slow-motion, into each other's arms. Fulfillment blossoms forth in a smugly profligate burst of life, without regards for our priorities; weeds, rabbits, gophers, and bugs share the celebration with humanity's pampered pets. Who invited the piratical jays, the defiantly rapacious boar? Never mind, you guys; I think She did. Anyway, they're not leaving, and where's the beer?

Beltaine, bright blossoms, how does your garden grow? With glistening backs and gaily discarded shirts, and a thousand things I don't remember planting, and none of it all in a row. My own strawberries could take lessons from the wild ones that have crept in through the fence, and the big, bold blooms of the flower garden struggle in vain to keep up with their more fragile sisters of meadow and creekbed. And our own turn to wildness as well, howling dog and disappearing tomcat in their turn, playing hard at the only game in town. The ducks are a scandal to the jaybirds, and the jaybirds are a scandal to everybody, but scandalous thoughts come easily to mind at this time of year.

I have seen snow on this day—doubtless some manic prank for my especial benefit—but if I want to can tomatoes this year, I will Have Faith and set the starts out, now. Pleasure coaxes us to faith, to belief in the unknowable future;

why else would I trust my corn to a wind called the Freight Train, because it comes every day at four o'clock? Of course, I stake everything, giving the neighbors something to laugh at when the entire assemblage arrives in their yard, green plastic ties gaily fluttering in the residual breeze. Still there are some covenants ineradicable and unbroken, and this day will see the Earth Mother's signature to Her indelible word: the sleek twin banner of the new-sprung squash plant, and the opulent green of the potato leaf. How richly She engraves the simple promise: you shall not starve.

The breeze is perfumed with paradox; roses and garlic, those old lovers of garden-book fame, confuse the nose together. The compost heats up evocatively, and the barnyard is definitely a barnyard, unless the wind is blowing through the lilac bush.

This, they tell us, is the Season of Life, as opposed to the Season of Sleep. This is because this is the Season of Damned Little Sleep, as the screech-owl's mad laughter proclaims its own inexplicable business to the world at large, and deer bound crashingly by the window, no fear of anything but boredom.

Life.

Life! LIFE! Wake up, oh Party Poopers, and celebrate Life! And restless at our Lady's command, we do. For is it not Her pleasure-principle that draws us to her purpose, starting with air but inevitably going on to the harder stuff, while She, our Connection, smiles and gently suggests? We lust and are fruitful, hunger and work, desire and create. And gently, irresistibly, she draws us on.

Beltaine. Blessed be, my people. Look about us, and see the endless, pointless, perfect purpose of our existence.

Poetry from A Celtic Miscellany

12. May-Time

May-time, fair season, perfect is thy aspect then; blackbirds sing a full song, if there be a scanty beam of day.

The hardy, bushy cuckoo calls, welcome noble summer! It calms the bitterness of bad weather, the branching wood is a prickly hedge.

Summer brings low the little stream, the swift herd makes for the water, the long hair of the heather spreads out, the weak white cotton-grass flourishes.

...The smooth sea flows, season when the ocean falls asleep; flowers cover the world.

Bees, whose strength is small, carry with their feet a load reaped from the flowers; the mountain allures the cattle, the ant makes a rich meal.

The harp of the wood plays melody, its music brings perfect peace; colour has settled on every hill, haze on the lake of full water.

The corncrake clacks, a strenuous bard; the high pure waterfall sings a greeting to the warm pool; rustling of rushes has come.

Light swallows dart on high, brisk music encircles the hill, tender rich fruits bud...

...The hardy cuckoo sings, the speckled fish leaps, mighty is the swift warrior.

The vigour of men flourishes, the glory of great hills is unspoiled; every wood is fair from crest to ground, fair each great goodly field.

Delightful is the season's splendour, winter's rough wind has gone; bright is every fertile wood, a joyful peace is summer.

A flock of birds settles...; the green field re-echoes, where there is a brisk bright stream.

A mad ardour upon you to race horses, where the serried host is ranged around; very splendid is the bounty of the cattle-pond, the iris is gold because of it.

A timid persistent frail creature sings at the top of his voice, the lark chants a clear tale—excellent May-time of calm aspect!

23. Suibhne the Wild Man in the Forest

Little antlered one, little belling one, melodious little bleater, sweet I think the lowing you make in the glen.

Home sickness for my little dwelling has come upon my mind, the calves in the plain, the deer on the moor.

Oak, bushy, leafy, you are high above trees; hazel, little branchy one, wisdom of hazel nuts.

Alder, you are not spiteful, lovely is your colour, you are not prickly where you are in the gap.

Blackthorn, little thorny one, black little sloe bush; water-cress, little green-topped one, on the brink of the blackbird's well.

Saxifrage of the pathway, you are the sweetest of herbs; cress, very green one; plant where the strawberry grows.

Apple-tree, little apple-tree, violently everyone shakes you; rowan, little berried one, lovely is your bloom.

Bramble, little humped vine, you do not grant fair terms; you do not cease tearing me till you are sated with blood.

Yew, little yew, you are conspicuous in graveyards; ivy, little ivy, you are familiar in the dark wood.

Holly, little protector, door against the wind; ash-tree, baneful, weapon in the hand of the warrior.

Birch, smooth, blessed, proud, melodious, lovely is each entangled branch at the top of your crest.

Aspen, as it trembles from time to time I hear its leaves rustle and think it is the foray...

It is on my lonely journey I were to search the mountains of the dark earth, I would rather have the room for a single hut in great

Good is its clear blue water, good its clean stern wind, good its

Good its pure ivy, good its bright merry willow, good its yewy

Summer Solstice Essay: Firbolgs and Tuatha De Danann

By Raphael McKeen and Stacey Weinberger

Midsummer, Summer Solstice, the Longest Day of the Year, is one of four Minor High Days of the Celtic Calendar. It is a feast celebrating the glory and the peak of the Sun God Belenos' (meaning "the shining one") power. On this day the altar fire should be especially large and a sacrifice of green branches and mistletoe be made. It was upon Midsummer Day that the people of the Goddess Danu, the Tuatha de Danann, took pre-Celtic Ireland from its earlier inhabitants, the Fir Bolgs.

It was upon the mystic first day of May that the Tuatha de Danann landed on the coast of Ireland in a dense fog without being opposed by the Fir Bolgs. The Tuatha de Danann then proceeded to "druidically" form showers and fog-sustaining showers over the country and caused the air to pour down fire and blood upon the Fir Bolgs. The Fir Bolgs had to shelter themselves for three days and three nights, after which time their own Druids put a stop to these enchantments by counter spells.

After a parley at the Plain of the Sea, the Fir Bolgs and the Tuatha de Danann agreed to exchange weapons, so that each side might be able to come to some opinion as to the opponent's strength. The people of the Goddess Danu offered the Fir Bolgs peace, with a division of the country into two equal halves. The Fir Bolg King Eochaid would not have this. The Tuatha de Danann however, impressed by the Fir Bolgs' weapons, decided to retreat farther west into Connaught to a plain then called Nia (now called Moytura), where they drew up their boundary line at the extreme end. This was in front of the Pass of Balgaton, which offered a retreat in case of defeat. Nuada, King of the Tuatha de Danann, sent an ambassador offering the same terms as before. Again the Fir Bolgs declined, but agreed to a truce of one hundred and five days in order to become battle-ready.

It was on Midsummer day that the opposing armies at last met. The people of the Goddess Danu appeared "in a flaming line," wielding their "red-bordered, speckled, and firm shields." Opposite to them were aligned the Fir Bolgs, "sparkling, brilliant, and flaming, with their swords, spears, blades, and trowel-spears." A deadly hurley-match was begun in which thrice nine of the Tuatha de Danann met the same number of Fir Bolgs. The Fir Bolgs emerged the victors. This was followed with more parleys and battles, fought with equal numbers on each side. After four days and a terrible slaughter upon each side, the Fir Bolgs were reduced to three hundred men. Those remaining were offered a fifth part of Ireland—whichever province they might choose. They agreed to this and chose Connaught, ever afterwards their special home, and where, until the middle of the seventeenth century, men were still found tracing their descent from Sreng, a warrior of the Fir Bolgs.

So when you gaze into the Midsummer fire, think of the power and beauty of the Light and before the Sun begins to wane for another half year, remember the Fir Bolgs with their flaming swords standing up to defeat by the Tuatha de Danann.

The Celtic Calendar

Copyright Thomas M. Cross for the Bard; The Druid Missal-Any

In the 19th century, a few fragmentary Gallic calendars were found in France. Only one of them collected was found in a near complete form in bronze plaques or tablets. This huge Calendar has been named the Coligny calendar by its discoverers. It was engraved with Latin letters of the style of the late republic or early empire in the Gaulish language. The calendar contains 62 consecutive months, the names of these months, numerals marking each night (or 24 hour period), and notes concerning the division of these months into halves and marking the mat "good" from the annat (abbreviated as ANM) "not-good" days and months. The calendar was lunar and not solar and therefore it follows closely the same type of calendar used in ancient Athens and the Sanskrit Hindu calendar all three of which are like the Jewish calendar. These lunar calendars have in common the intercalary month (an extra month) added twice in a five year period which keeps its months in the same season each year. The modern Western calendar which we use today is a Roman calendar unlike the lunar and so instead of adding a 13th month every so often, we have our year divided into months which add up to 365 days and add an extra day every four years. The lunar calendars have 12 months—half of them 29 days the other of 30 day lengths which only adds up to 354 days and every two or three years an extra 30 day month is added making 384 days in those years. Since the earth takes 365 days and six hours to complete a revolution around the sun, a lunar calendar is 11-1/4 days too short and a solar calendar of 365 days is one quarter of a day too short. The Coligny calendar adding an intercalary month of 30 days ever 2 1/2 years thus balances itself out thus:

Lunar Five Year Period: 1,830 days

Roman-Julian-Gregorian Five Years: 1,827 days

Number of Days in 5 solar revolutions: 1826.25 days

As one can see the Roman calendar is nineteen hours or three-quarters of a day too long in a five year period. The Julian year (named after Julius Caesar who hired a Greek astronomer living in Alexandria, Egypt named Sosigenes to design a calendar like the Egyptian solar calendar but more accurate) had an extra day added every fourth year to the last month of the Roman Year, Februarius. From the time of Caesar the Roman empire always used this calendar and after the conversion of most of Europe to Christianity this calendar remained in use. In the 16th century, Pope Gregory decided it would be necessary to make a further adjustment of the Roman calendar so that the extra hours that accumulate after a long period should be dropped so that the time reckoning would be more accurate. It took a while before the English adopted it, but they finally did so in 1752 and thus it also came into use in the English colonies in America. When the change was made they called it New Style, this angered many people who felt that they had lost days from their lives when the 11 days were dropped so that April 1st became April 12th. Those who still stuck with the Old Style (Julian) calendar were called April Fools and that's how April Fools' Day got its start. How did this effect the Celtic feasts? Well, with Old Style All Soul's Eve (Samhain) would have been on November 1st, 1752 which in New Style fell on November 12th, thus Old Style Oct. 31 was now Nov. 11 at sundown.

Many would say at first, that the Old Style Samhain is more correct with the old way, but is it? Not really. You see, the solar year remains 365.25 days and the Old Style (Julian year) got slowly – though very very slowly ahead of itself over the centuries. Lunar calendars (like that of Coligny) creep ahead of the solar year also and a little quicker—so with both of these calendars they had to periodically correct the time reckoning. The Gregorian reform has balanced out the jumping ahead; the calendar is more accurate. Some calendars have no regard for accuracy between keeping the solar and lunar years in harmony. The Moslem calendar for example is a very primitive lunar calendar—lacking intercalary months but merely going by the phases of the moon with 29 day months only. Thus the Moslem calendar lacks the extra intercalary month and the alternating 30 day months like that used in the Athenian, Hindu, Jewish and Gallic-Coligny calendars. Thus a particular month of their calendar may shift from spring to winter, to autumn to summer until they lose years over centuries; the Moslem era therefore has less years than the Julian-Gregorian in the same period of centuries (going by Julian-Gregorian centuries). The Moslems are losing time in their era by their method of time-reckoning. Since the Gregorian calendar is more accurate in terms of time reckoning, it would be silly for neo-pagan Celtophiles to shift Samhain from November 1st to November 12th. Only a few centuries of the Julian era (beginning 46 B.C.) had passed when the Christians came to Ireland and thus Samhain (Gaulish trinouxction Samonios) “three nights of ‘Summery’”) was marked into the Roman-Christian calendar or Julian Calendar. Thus the Celtic Fire Festivals (Samhain, Oimele, Bealtaine, Lughnasadh) were preserved by their adoption into the Julian calendar as Christian feasts (All Souls and All Saints, Festival of Lights or Candlemas or St. Bridget's Day, May-Day and Lammas). Other pagan festivals of other peoples were adopted into the Roman-Julian calendar as Christian feasts. As anyone can see, the Celtic calendar's four great feasts are safely worked properly into the Gregorian calendar.

Coligny Months	Duration	Northern*	Translations
Samonios	mat 30 days	Oct-Nov	Hefydd, Samhain samon=summer
Dumannios	anm 29	Nov-Dec	? “dark moon” Du+mann
Riuos	mat 30	Dec-Jan	rhewi “frost” Welsh
Anagantios	anm 29	Jan-Feb	?
Ogronios	mat 30	Feb-Mar	oer “cold” Welsh
Qutios	mat 30	Mar-Apr	?
Giamonios	anm 29	Apr-May	Gaeaf, Geimhreadh Giamon=winter
Simusonnos	mat 30	May-Jun	?
Equos	anm 29	Jun-Jul	Archaic for Epos “horse”
Elembiuos	anm 29	Jul-Aug	?
Edrinios	mat 30	Aug-Sept	Welsh edrin “noise”
Cantlos	Anm 29	Sept-Oct	Welsh cantell “circle”

*If Alwyn and Brinley Rees in their Celtic Heritage are correct, then it could be that Giamon is the first month in the southern half as comparison with the Hindu calendar tradition shows; both being from a common Indo-European tradition. Thus the Coligny calendar is the Northern Gallic calendar, the southern Gallic calendar would begin with Giamon as the first month of the year.

The Gaulish Language

By Thomas M. Cross

The first Celtic language to pass beyond this world was probably Gaulish—once spoken in regions we would now call France, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria, Bohemia, southern Germany and in Galatia of Turkey and perhaps Portugal and Galicia. This language was in most respects identical to the P-Celtic Old Brythonic ancestor of Welsh, Cornish and Breton. The main differences between the dialects of Gallo-Brittonic (Gaulish and Brythonic) were lexical, but like Goidelic (archaic and primitive Irish) the language had declensional endings similar to that found in Latin, Greek, Sanskrit, Icelandic, Old English and Lithuanian. In other words, Gaulish shared the same characteristics of most all Indo-European languages in that it was highly inflected. Certainly this was the very tongue spoken by Diviacus known by Caesar and Cicero and the Druids described by Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela and probably known to Poseidonios. James Travis theorized that the Druids probably had known a counterpart to the Rig Veda which he calls a “Druid-veda” in his book Early Celtic Versecraft. His investigation of the earliest verse forms in Celtic languages show that linguistic conditions which proceeded these first written verses must have shared the same Indo-European inflectional characteristics we find in such languages as the Vedas and other I-E verse forms. The accent was on the initial syllable and syntax was free or less fixed. Rhyming was probably unknown as we know it today, but the main device used was alliteration similar to that we find in the early verse of Germanic languages.

Gaulish is only known to us from inscriptions (which employed either Greek or Roman letters), from glosses made by Romans or Greeks and from reconstructions based on phonetics and historical linguistics. How Gaulish was pronounced can only then be conjectured from phonetic rules and by the spelling used in the inscriptions. One of the problems is in the use of the Roman and Greek alphabets. Evidently those who could write Gaulish had to represent the pronunciation as best he could from the letters that we learned from Latin and Greek spelling, thus the sounds shared by both Gaulish and the other languages would use the corresponding letter. In ancient times, spelling was based more on pronunciation than it is today—as for example modern English or modern Irish in which the spelling represents older and obsolete pronunciations. Thus when we read Gaulish inscriptions using Roman letters, we must give the letters their Roman or Latin value as they were pronounced at the time the inscription was produced. To double check we may consult the phonetic rules of Celtic etymology. But some learned Gauls invented some letters such as the barred D “D̄” [There is a bar drawn through the D in the quotations] and barred S “S̄” [there is a bar drawn through the S in the quotations] which probably represent the soft or voiced th and “sh” sounds respectively. Also the Gauls may have used the Greek chi x to represent the ch sound represented in loch. The vowels must have had the “continental” values with the exception that in most unstressed positions they became schwa like the u in hut or the o in other. The Gauls would often spell the same word using e and i as alternatives and therefore we can see that a sound somewhere in between was used perhaps nasalised or similar to the i of English hit when spoken with a twang. Others say that Gaulish had the sound of the French u or German ü (like saying English “ee” of need with lips pouted in position of saying the oo of food).

Gaulish, unlike modern Celtic languages, did not have mutations or aspiration, the initial consonants did not change according to any grammatical rules. This phenomena was in its infancy developing later in the stage of lenition (consonants changing because of the final sound of a preceding word or because it is flanked by vowels) and eventually become systematic as the languages rapidly developed before literacy was widespread. At the same time that Celtic languages began developing mutations already the declensional endings began disappearing. It is very probable that the loss of the declensional endings were mostly responsible for the development of mutations as well as the fossilising of the syntax.

Some Basic Gaulish

Verb “to Be”:

esmi	I am
esi	thou art (you are)
esti	he is esmos	we are
sueste	you (plural) are sent	they are

Pronouns:

Singulars:	I	Thou	He	She	It
Nominative	eg	tu	is/es	si	id
Accusative	me	te	im/em	siam	id
Dative	moi	toi	io	iai	io
Genitive	moue	toue	eso	esa	eson
Plurals:	We	You	They (masc.)	They (fem.)	They (neut.)
Nominative	snes	sues	ioi	ias	ioi
Accusative	snes	sues	sons	sans	sons
Dative	nebis	suebis	iobis	iobis	iobis
Genitive	neseron	seuseron	eson	esan	esan

Gaulish had basically four cases nominative (subject), accusative (object), dative (prepositional), and genitive (possessive – denoting ownership or origination) and sometimes a vocative case (used when directly addressing someone). There was also Plural and Dual numbers. An example can be made in the masculine proper name Segomarus:

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	Segomarus	Seogomaroi	Segomarou
Accusative	Segomaron	Sgomarons	Segomarou
Dative	Segomaru	Segomarobis	Segomarobem
Genitive	Segomari	Segomaris	Segomarou
Vocative	Segomare	Segomarus	Segomarou

The feminine noun benna “woman” (from Indo-Eur. *gwen)

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	benna	bennas	bennai
Accusative	bennan	bennans	bennai
Dative	bennai	bennabo	bennabem
Genitive	bennas	bennon	bennai

magos “plain” Irish magh, Welsh ma Masculine noun

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	magos	magesa
Accusative	magon	magesa
Dative	mages	magebos	magebem
Genitive	magesos	mageson

rix “king” Irish ri or ri, Welsh rhi Masculine noun

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Rix	Riges	Rige
Acc.	Rigim	Rigons	Rige
Dat.	Rigi	Rigobis	Rigebem
Gen.	Rigos	Rigon	Rigou

mens “month” Irish mi, Welsh mis

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	mens	menses	mensou
Accusative	mensim	mensins	mensou
Dative	mensai	mens	mesobem
Genitive	mentos	menon	mensou

mater “mother” Ir. mathair, Welsh mam Feminine noun

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	mater	matres	matres
Accusative	matren	matrens	matrens
Dative	matrei	matrebo	matrebem
Genitive	matres	matron	matriou

Lugus (proper name) Irish Lugh, Welsh Lleu Masculine –u Stem

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	Lugus	Lugoues	Lugu
Accusative	Lugum	Luguns	Lugu
Dative	Lugou	Lugubis	Lugubem
Genitive	Lugous	Lugion	Lugouo

Medu “mead” Gaulish neuter u-stem, Irish medhbh, Welsh medd

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	medu	medoues	medu
Accusative	medu	meduns	medu
Dative	medu	medubis	medubem
Genitive	medous	medion	medouo

The I-stem Masculine endings

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	-is	-eies	-eie
Accusative	-in	-ins	-eie
Dative	-l	-ibis	-ibem
Genitive	-os	-ion	-iou

Feminine I-stem endings

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	-i	-ias	-ia
Accusative	-ien	-iens	-ia
Dative	-i	-ibo	-ibem
Genitive	-as	-i	-iau

Neuter I-stem endings

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	-i	-ia	-ia
Accusative	-i	-ins	-ia
Dative	-i	-ibis	-ibem
Genitive	-os	-ion	-iou

Masculine N-stem endings

	Singular	Plural	Dual
Nominative	-o	-enes	-ene
Accusative	-in	-ons	-ene
Dative	-l	-enobis	-obem
Genitive	-os	-on	-ou

This is just a few of the Gaulish declensional endings that have been reconstructed by Celtic philologists working with the inscriptions found in excavations and working with the etymology of Old Irish and early Welsh. Note that the Gaulish ending –os masculine of Segomarus corresponds with the Latin –us ending, Greek –as or –os and proto-Germanic –az (in Gothic –as) endings.

Many Gaulish words were Latinised and assimilated to Latin some of which survived into modern French, e.g. courma or (to) cereuis to cerevisia to cervoise “beer” or ale”.

Casanos (an epithet of the oak tree “holy one” to Latin cassanus to French chêne. Gaulish gleno “to clean” Latin glenare to French glaner.

Gaulish	English	Irish cognate	Welsh cognate
abona	river	abhain	afon
are	near		ar
beccan	small	beag	bach
briga	hill		bryn
cambo	crooked
ceto	wood		coed
cumbo	valley		cwm
dunon	fortress	dun	din
dubo	black	dubh	du
dubro	water		dwr
lindon	lake	lind	llyn
lis	hall		llys
maros	great	mór	mawr
monedos	mountain		mynedd
nantos	brook		nant
penno	head	ceann	pen
poullon	pool, harbour		pwll
tir	land	tir	tir
tracto	sand		draeth
innis	island	innis	ynys
nemeton	shrine, consecrated place
more	sea	muir	mor

Gaulish Religious Terms

	Cognates	Meaning
Druidactos	O. Ir. druidecht , Mod. Ir. draiocht	Druidism
Vindomagos (ouindomagos)	Welsh gwynfa	“paradise “white plain”
Bacuceos (bahkook-os)		possessed by evil spirits
talamu	Ir. talamh	“earth”
usus		an incubus (according to Latin gloss)
talamasca		female evil spirit “earth hag”
cassos or caddos		holy (as in Cassibellaunos and Casanos) caragos		a fortune telling
morimarusa		“sea of the dead”
iipomiiduos (epomeduos)		horse sacrifice (cf. asvamedha of Vedic)
bilomagos		“plain of the sacred tree”
nemeton (nimidas)		“shrine” nemet=“sacred” (-as ending spelling variant)
uernemetis		“over shrine” (-is ending is genitive plural)
crotta	O.Ir. crot , Welsh crwth	“lyre” or type of string instrument cauaro (kaouaros)	Welsh cawr	“giant”

daculon		“sickle”
gutuatros		“invoker” (Latinised as gutater) attached to certain deities such as Moltinos, the gutuater Martis

Calendar

Summer Solstice in 1986 will occur at 10:04 P.M. Greenwich Time, which translates to 3:04 P.M. Pacific Daylight Time on June 21st. The Moon is full on the 22nd. It is not often that a full Moon falls on the longest day of the year. It must mean something. Time and arrangements for Celebration at the Orinda Grove will be announced.

Lughnasadh Essay: Tales of Lugh

By Emmon Bodfish

ughnasadh, festival of the funeral games of Lugh the Sun God, or, given by Lugh in honor of his father the Sun, depending on your tradition. It is the beginning of the Celtic harvest season, and is often called Festival of the First Fruits. Lugh, from the same root word as light and luminous, is one of the younger generations of gods in the Celtic pantheon. Like other Indo-European solar deities, his growth was rapid,, being the size of a 10 year old when he was 5, and gaining full manly size and skill by age 10 or 12. He is the multi-competent god, not specializing in one function, but capable in all. Even as a child he was expert at any craft or skill from his first attempt at it. As a boy of 8, according to Welsh legend, while his goddess-mother was measuring his foot for a shoe, he picked up a bow and arrow and shot a wren in the leg. This, the story goes on to explain, was the favorite demonstration shot of Celtdom's best crack archers. His mother was delighted, and Lugh went on to become a parent's dream come true. He was good at everything, polite, chivalrous, and an example of filial devotion.

Later as a young man, when he applied for admittance to the company of the elder gods, he is quizzed by the gatekeeper as to what he can offer. "I am an excellent smith," he says. "We have Goibhne the smith," said the gatekeeper. "We have no need of that." And this continues to be the reply as he lists each one of his skills. The gods already have one of their number who is an expert in that domain. Finally, frustrated, the boy shouts, "But do you have anyone who can do them all?" The gatekeeper reflects that, no, they do not. And so Lugh is admitted.

Lugh is the patron of craftsmen, apprentices, and artists. In another tradition, he is also associated with money and the accumulation of wealth. This is his only functionalistic connection with a harvest festival. The Funeral Games of Lugh, whose title for this high day may also refer to the fact that by now the Sun is past his Zenith, and is declining again toward the South.

In the R.D.N.A. traditions, anyone who has a garden, grows anything, etc., should save their first picked produce of the summer season, and bring it or a portion of it to the Service, to be offered up in the altar fire, with hopes of prosperity in the years to come.

News of the Groves

At the Orinda Grove Site, edible puffballs have sprouted next to the altar, (left side, of course.) Of all the ground covers we planted, the Dichondra did the best. The Gopher Bane plants that we so carefully tended up from mail-order seedlings turned out to be annuals. They set seed and died. The nursery didn't tell us this. Were we bilked? It's true they were one-shot, but there are no gopher tunnels around there this year, either. Perhaps for Lughnasadh we should gather in the seeds and thresh them and replant more Gopher Bane next year.

As the Lughnasadh sacrifice in the R.D.N.A. tradition offers up the first fruits of the harvest, anyone who has a garden, a farm or a flowerbox, might pick and bring an offering.

Some animal got hold of the sack of sacrificial meal and dragged it off and consumed it. I found the tattered and toothmarked bag. She/he will have to pay this back when she/he gets to the Other world.

New Publications

"Mermade" magickal arts catalogue and pamphlet was recently sent to us here at the "Missal-Any." While not exclusively Celtic, it has some interesting art work and products not carried elsewhere. As often before, every time you think you've seen it all in the Pagan community, something new comes along. Now, Pagan Paper Dolls.

"Well," as Eileen says, "why not?"

This may not be new to some of you, I don't know, since I have been out of the paper doll using circles for a long time, i.e. ever since I gave up teasing my younger sister and her friends, when some of them grew larger and huskier than I, and this pastime became too dangerous.

The Heathen on the Heath: Garden Wars

Okay, enough already! This is war. Sweat runs down too fast to blink away from my eyeballs, and my hands are too filthy to mop it away. How can so many slugs exist in the world, let alone in my garden? And where did that eighth duck go, and just what is it that got past my eight-foot fence, stacked tires and assorted whirligigs and wind chimes to eradicate half my potato plants? Hey, gang, there's a limit! Isn't there? At Beltaine you came to party. Now the sun is past the zenith, and you're still raiding the pantry. I've tried asking you to go home. No dice. And the dog has some inexplicable wound on his paw—boars? Bobcats?

This is war. Somehow mine ancient enemy, the wild gooseberry, has started some fifth-column activity amid the tomatoes, and sent spies among my mealybug-ridden brassicae. No use griping to Mother: She and her Consort are making hay while the sun shines, and hardly interested in the squabbles of the children.

Whoever first characterized life in Nature as peaceful had a somewhat warped sense of humor.

The very plants do battle; this winter my pruning-saw must break up a slow-motion barroom brawl between an oak, a madrone, and a whitethorn, all of whom can survive quite nicely if they will simply settle for their own spaces and leave each other alone. Fat chance! All living things demand to not only live, but win, preferably at the expense of any and all possible competitors. That herd of wild pigs must not only have the next ridge, but also my ridge, to find true happiness.

And what members of any one species think of each other cannot be printed and sent through the U.S. mail.

Where does that leave your everlovin' Heathen? Confused, mostly. While I have no compunctions about claiming the fruits of my own labor, and whatever else I can pry loose (I'm not even a vegetarian) there are certain human-engendered refinements on the art of war that I will not use. Mom may not care whether my tomatoes or her gooseberries grow in the garden, but that's not sufficient reason to dump assorted petrochemicals in Her water-table--or feed to my down hill neighbors, if it comes to that. I'll go after rodents with cats, traps, and a .22, but I have no desire to bring down my allies the redtails with the "friendly fire" of B-gon or DeCon. Can this be said to make a difference, in view of how the rest of my species chooses to nuke their nuisances? And ought I to be messing around in here at all? This garden is an invasion in itself, exotic and pampered organisms installed in the devastation of turf that I chose to call French Intensive Double-Digging. That's not what was here to begin with.

Thing is, an attitude of nobles oblige requires a certain amount of backup. Kindness is for what we control, and as I gaze in utter dismay on the ruin of my efforts, and the impossibility of reverting to humanity's original mode of participation (hunting and gathering) without overstressing an already depleted wild economy, I realize that my control over this environment is minimal. And wasn't that what I wanted?

Admittedly the fight is rigged. Pit me, with a rifle, against a boar with tusks and I'll bet on me every time. I ought to know; I rigged it myself...I, and forebears who shared my motives, long ago. Like the boar, we also want it all. Unlike the boar, we may someday be unfortunate enough to get it all, thereby destroying it. Will we someday live on chemicals, or mutated yeast, because we have won all our wars and there are no other surviving species?

The squirming, biting, struggling child takes endless comfort in the unarguable restraint of Mother's arms. But as the child ceases to be a baby, a little caution creeps into its protest, unaware at first: we don't want to hurt Mommy, after all. And hopefully, by the time we are big and strong enough to do Her real damage, we will have thoroughly absorbed the lesson that She has feelings, too.

Except that people-en-masse are always a little dumber than people one at a time.

Where are you in the world? Where are your battles, what have you won...and at what cost? Come, swap war-stories with me, for even if you are busily making chemicals out of other chemicals, or laying concrete over ground, we are all the same in this. Nobody gave us the right to be who we are; we have made ourselves. Nobody owed us a place in the world; we have taken it. This is our nature, as surely a part of us as greenness is of grass, to be channeled but never truly changed.

Just remember that perhaps it is not worth postponing, indefinitely at finite cost to the rest of the world, one's own last battle. For sus scrofa, homo sapiens, or any living creature, anywhere, there is but one ending. Let the sun blaze on into the night, drink deep, and gird yourself with honor. It is a good day, at least, not to know what's going to happen. And no matter how many sandbags we make of our environment, to pile around our laughable foxholes in the scheme of things, it's out there, waiting for us, somewhere: the fight we can't win.

Nobody's getting out of here alive.

Lughnasadh Celebration will be held on August 6th, at sundown, at the Orinda Grove Site. Astronomical Lughnasadha being on August 7, 1986, we will follow the Ancient Druid tradition of the night preceding the day.

The Decline of Druidism:

A Time-Line

Post Oak Proto-Grove

Gaul

- 43 B.C. to A.D. 14 Augustus forbids Roman citizens to participate in Druidic rites.
- A.D. 14 to 37 Tiberius persecutes the Druids of Gaul
- A.D. 41 to 54 Claudius has the Druids “very thoroughly suppressed”

Britain

- A.D. 61 Suetonius Paulinus massacres Druids on the Isle of Anglesey (Mon) off the coast of Wales.

Ireland

- A.D. 590 Synod of Drumceat restricts activities of the Druids in Ireland.
- A.D. 637 Druids abolished following the battle of Moyrath

Medieval Period

The class of the filidh take over many of the traditions of the Druids along with the Brehons, storytellers and ollamhs in Ireland and Gaelic Scotland.

Elizabethan to Cromwell Periods

Bardic schools are broken up by the English in Ireland and eventually in Scotland with the destruction of Irish aristocratic society.

Following the Cromwellian and Glorious Revolutionary Periods

Celts and Druids are re-discovered in England and Wales during the beginning of the enlightenment period and into the “Age of Reason” through the reading of classical literature. In the 18th century, some neo-Druidic (mesopagan) groups appear.

Romantic Period

Edward Williams “Iolo Morganwg” founds a neo-Druidic dogma from the study of Bardic relics from which he forges a Bardic philosophy under the influence of the Enlightenment, Romantic movements and “natural religion.”

There soon follows a revival of interest in Welsh antiquities which has a beneficial influence on Celtic scholarship and Celtic nationalism.

Twentieth Century

Rise of more Druidic orders based on Morganwg and 18th century “Druidic” lodges. Anthropology in its infancy is still under the influence of amateur archaeologists and amateur romantic social scientists which gives rise to unscrupulous scholarship such as Gerald Gardner’s Witchcraft theories, Margaret Murray’s theories and finally to Robert Graves’ The White Goddess. Following the works of Murray, Gardner, Graves etc. there appears many “wicca” groups and covens which claim to be practicing the “old religion” of ancient Europe.

Serious scholarship begins to investigate the ancient religions of Europe and the importance of the Indo-European culture and ideology is discovered by Georges Dumézil and many linguists, anthropologists, and religious historians.

Latter Half of the Twentieth Century

Following the publication of works by the serious scholars in Indo-European philology, history and archaeology, much of the lost knowledge of the Druids and Celtic peoples is restored and neo-pagan groups begin to incorporate the data. Many other neo-pagans are distraught by the truth of the old religion and decide that their traditions based on the erroneous works of Gardner, Graves, Murray is preferential in their own modern tastes. Neo-Druids based on the Morganwgic material is clung to since it appeals to their own tastes.

Therefore what has come from the Druids and survived into the myths, legends and sagas of the Irish, evidence from archaeology of Gaul, the iconography, bas-reliefs, classical testimony, Celtic philology, Welsh and Scottish tales, the folklore, the epic-type literature and with Indo-European comparative studies, much of what the Druids probably taught has been restored or reconstructed.

The question remains then, does anyone who wants to learn what the Druids probably taught wish to use that information for a basis of their religion or religious thought? If not, then I would ask such a person why would they want to identify with the Druids or why should they call themselves “Druids” or neo-Druids or any sort? What is it to be a neo-Druid? Would it not be self-contradictory to call oneself a Druid or neo-Druid and not be interested or make any use of the scholarship or information concerning what the ancient Druids taught? How can anyone be called a Hindu who never read any Vedic literature or disagreed with revealed knowledge of the Hindus? How can anyone be called Jewish who did not profess the religion contained in the Torah or any Jewish scriptures? How can anyone be called or call himself a Tao-ist yet reject the Tao Te Ching taught by Lao-Tzu? The neo-Druid who is not interested in Celtic mythology or historical Celtic religion as probably taught by the ancient Druids has little right to be called by such an epithet as Druid or neo-Druid? If one is more in agreement with Wicca or Christianity or is more interested in Shamanism than with Celtic religion, one is not a Druid, but rather a “Wiccan” or Christian, or disciple of Shamanism.

At least the followers of Iolo Morganwg are within a Celtic tradition, albeit not an ancient one.

Fall Equinox 1986

Volume 10 Number 6

Fall Equinox Essay:

More on St. Michael and His Pagan Associations

By Emmon Bodfish

all Equinox is associated with the gathering of root crops in Scotland and England, and perhaps, before the potato, in Ireland as well. Many of the old customs are preserved in the Highlands, enacted now in the name of "Michaelmas" festivals. Michael was the Christian personality most often substituted for Lugh, or, in other contexts, for Llyr, by the Old Celtic Church. The flaming sword and warrior aspect of the Archangel may have suggested a similarity to Lugh-of-the-Long-Arm with his magical spear. It also carries on the Celtic God's protective image and his function as defender of the people, but most particularly it is the quality of "shining-ness" that links the two.

Alexander Carmichael, collecting oral folklore in the 1800s, notes that in the Highlands, St. Michael is spoken of as "an brian Michael." That is "The Demi-god Michael." Christian saints, such as Columba or Andrew, are called Santo, Saint, from the Latin. Archangel Gabriel is "aingéal" a Gàidhlig word deriving from the Latin, or "Naomh," Gàidhlig for holy, sacred. No one else is "brian," demi-god. The Highlanders' Michael is pictured riding a winged horse, and is the patron of sailors and ships. There is no basis in the Biblical angel's character for this; it is probably a co-option from Llyr, God of the Western Ocean and Master of Horses. The same characteristics, and the combination of associations with ships and with a fiery steed, are attributed to Manannan MacLlyr, in Cornwall and Brittany.

The ceremony of the carrots, described by Carmichael, in connection with Fall Equinox and Llyr/Lugh's Time, is something that could be adapted to the present R.D.N.A. celebration. It follows.

From the Carmina Gadelica

On the 29th of September, a festival in honour of St. Michael is held throughout the Western Coasts and Isles. This is much the most imposing pageant and much the most popular of the Celtic year. Many causes conduce to this—causes which move the minds and the hearts of the people to their utmost tension. To the young the Day is a day of promise, to the old a day of fulfillment, to the aged a day of retrospect. It is a day when pagan cult and Christian doctrine meet and mingle like the lights and shadows on their own Highland hills.

The Eve of St. Michael is the eve of bringing in the carrots, of baking the 'struan,' of killing the lamb, of stealing the horses. The Day of St. Michael is the Day of the early mass, the day of the sacrificial lamb, the day of the oblation 'struan,' the day of the distribution of the lamb, the day of the distribution of the 'struan,' the day of the pilgrimage to the burial-ground of their fathers, the day of the burial-ground service, the day of the burial-ground circuiting, the day of giving and receiving the carrots with their wishes and acknowledgements, and the day of the 'oda'—the athletics of men and the racing of horses. And the Night of Michael is the night of the dance and the song, of the merry-making of the love-making, and of the love-gifts.

Some days before the festival of St. Michael the women and girls go to the fields and plains of the townland to procure carrots. The afternoon of the Sunday immediately preceding St. Michael's Day is especially devoted to this purpose, and on this account is known as 'Domhnach Curran'—Carrot Sunday. When the soil is soft and friable, the carrots can be pulled out of the ground without digging. When, however, the soil is hard, a space is dug to give the hand access to the root. This space is made in the form of an equal-sided triangle, technically called 'torcan,' diminutive of "torc," a cleft. The instrument used is a small mattock of three prongs, called 'tri-meurach,' three-fingered, 'sliopag,' 'sliobhag.' The three sided 'torcan' is meant to typify the three sided shield, and the three-fingered 'sliopag,' the trident of St. Michael, and possibly each to symbolize the Trinity. The many brightly-clad figures swing to and fro, in and out, like the figures in a kaleidoscope, are singularly pretty and picturesque. Each woman intones a rune to her own tune and time irrespective of those around her. The following fragment was intoned to me in a soft, subdued voice by a woman who had gathered carrots eighty years previously:—

'Torcan, torrach, torrach, torrach,
Sonas curran corr orm,
Michael mil a bhi dha m'chonuil,
Bride gheal dha m'chonradh

Piseach linn gach piseach,
Piseach dha mo bhroinn,
Piseach linn gach piseach,
Piseach dha mo chloinn.'

Cleft fruitful, fruitful, fruitful,
Joy of carrots surpassing upon me,
Michael the brave endowing me,
Bride the fair be aiding me.

Progeny pre-eminent over every progeny,
Progeny on my womb,
Progeny pre-eminent over every progeny,
Progeny on my progeny.

Should a woman find a forked carrot, she breaks out into a more exultant strain that brings her neighbours round to see and to admire her luck.

'Fhorca shona, shona, shona,
Fhorca churran mor orm,
Conuil curran corr orm
Sonas curran mor dhomh.'

Fork joyful, joyful, joyful,
Fork of great carrot to me,
Endowment of carrot surpassing upon me,
Joy of great carrot to me.

There is much rivalry among the women who shall have most and best carrots. They carry the carrots in a bag slung from the waist, called 'crisolachan,' little girdle, from 'crios,' a girdle. When the 'carrasaid' was worn, the carrots were carried in its ample folds. The women wash the carrots and tie them up in small bunches, each of which contains a 'glac,' handful. The bunches are tied with three-ply thread, generally scarlet, and put in pits near the house and covered with sand till required.

A Letter to the Editor:

I beg to remind Thomas Cross (Post Oak Proto-Grove, Lughnasadh edition) that scholarship is but one path to the Goddess. Perhaps our true roots' obscurity is an advantage, allowing us to do more seat-of-the-pants flying than is permitted by a religion of more cohesive background and authority. The occasional romantic sloppiness of Gardner, Graves, et al, does not negate their premise (that the Old Religion honored Nature in both male and female principles). Nor should it denigrate the poesy of their praise. In their day, both were revolutionary.

It may be that the ancients—of Northern Europe and of other places—knew a good many things that we do not. Trying to discover these truths seems a noble enterprise, but I am not about to limit myself to one cultural group, when that culture is no longer there to be immersed in. You and I may be different types of Neopagan Druid, but since Cathbad isn't around to object, "Druid" seems as good a name as any, for either of us.

Pictish

Post Oak Proto-Grove

The Picts seem to have spoken a pre-Indo-European language at one time, before the P-Celtic speakers conquered most of them in southern Scotland, and pushed the rest into its north-eastern extremity. Eventually the Picts were "Godhelicized" by Irish invaders who later colonized Scotland, and the Pictish dialects died out entirely. Our only evidence for this pre-Indo-European Pictish comes from a few inscriptions, carved in Irish ogam characters, after the Irish had settled in Scotland. Such evidence is so scanty that little can be made of this inscriptional evidence. Some contend that Pictish, (the non-Indo-European dialect,) is not related to any other language; others have tried to compare it with some other languages, without success. Some have compared it to Basque, (a pre-Indo-European or non-Indo-European Iberian language) as Sir John Rhys did, but this was unsuccessful. While many proper names of Pictish kings turn out to be Celtic, either P-Celtic or Q-Celtic, some of these names cannot be determined to be either, and seem to be non-Celtic, and even non-Indo-European.

From the Lunnasting inscription:

Ettocuhetts ahehhtannn hccuueuu nehhtons

From the Brandsbutt stone:

irataddoarens

St. Ninians:

besmeqqnanannovvez

Keiss bay:

netetri

Pictish Names which seem Non-Celtic and Non-Indo-Eur.:

Bliesblituth
Canatulachama
Usconbuts

Notice the extreme repetition of consonant clusters in the Lunnasting, Brandsbutt, and St. Ninian inscription which suggest a language which is phonemically very consonantal like that of the Causcassic languages, however the consonant groups are repetitions of the same letters or phonemes such as tt, hh, cc, vv, or uu, and nnn. Notice also that there are all single vowels of the Roman alphabet represented a, e, i, o, u, but not many diphthongs euu and oa and possibly ie in Bliesblituth—these diphthongs may form separate syllables and therefore might not be diphthongs. Notice the prominent s next to other consonants -ts, -ns in the endings of words such as Ettocuhetts, irataddoarens, nehhtons and Usconbuts and appears in the middle of Bliesblituth. This reminds me of the -s ending formed in Etruscan genitives of certain words such as clan "son" clans "of the son" and may also remind me of English and Anglo-Saxon genitives formed by adding -s or -es. This makes one wonder as to whether Pictish has affinities with a non-Indo-European language like Etruscan or with Germanic languages. If nehhtons is interpreted as a form of the Celtic Nechtán then we may have a genitive case of Nechtán in nehhtons.

It may also be a resemblance to Basque in that many Basque words end with -tz (cf. Pictish -ts) such as bortz "five," however Basque words tend to have a vowel following -tz e.g. -tza, -tze or -tzi; Basque has more open vowels and ultimate vowels, i.e. not flanked by consonants as much as Pictish. Finno-Ugric languages like Finnish and Lappish have many doubled consonants and consonant clusters like Pictish, but then, these languages are rich in vowel endings on words like Basque. Many Hs appear in Pictish inscriptions which suggests that it did not lack the aspirate H sound and would compare itself again to Germanic languages which in Grimm's law originated with Proto-I.E. initial K-sound. In Welsh, the H sound occurs initially on words from a rather late development from an initial S-sound (e.g. Samon = Haf, Sabrina = Hafren, etc.) The H sound occurs in Irish as a prefixed sound to separate words with an initial vowel and as a late development from mutated forms of consonants at the initial position of words. The internal or medial H found in Pictish seems to be anomalous to Celtic, Germanic or Indo-European phonemics as in ahéhhtann and ettocuhetts.

Lastly, we must conclude that Pictish will continue to elude us for a while until further archaeology can turn up more inscriptions and more helpful inscriptions. We would need to find some written documents in Pictish with some glosses in some known language such as Old Irish or Latin and we would finally be able to finally decipher Pictish and find out definitely its affinities or lack of affinity with other languages. Pictish is more mysterious than Etruscan in that we have found many Etruscan inscriptions in comparison.

The Heathen on the Heath:

First Fruits and Hunting

First fruits, late as usual—arguments with the neighbors—yellow grass, grey dust, and scorching heat. Balanced now are we? In the hardware store where I earn some of my living, a motley assortment of law-abiding types are buying their hunting licenses, with tags permitting them to ritually assassinate one or two adult male deer this season. Certain local subsistence hunters regard both the season and its regulations as ridiculous. But I count the hopeful license buyers during one workday, and then count the deer on my way home. The number of deer becomes less impressive, beside the number of hunters.

And the subsistence hunters—does concern for the continued stability of the deer population arise automatically from need? I doubt it. And the numbers of the needy are also increasing...

But the hunt goes on. From my own experience, in pursuit of one wild pig (which died to provide food for two families with hungry children, one of them mine) it seems strange to call it a sport. The hunt is a relationship, ending with the death of the other party. The pig wanted to live, and my cohort and I wanted to eat it. These goals were mutually exclusive; no amount of mystical hocus-pocus could ever convince me that the pig was a willing participant.

There was one moment, crouched on the hillside, with the immensely vital, prehistoric-looking beast looking directly at me, when I felt that the hunt was at an end; I had met the wild. My challenge had been offered and met. The pig was ready to attack or flee, but did neither. Here was life; its ending was anti-climactic.

But sorrow was also the feeling of a split second. Our children were fed. And something within me was changed.

The Hunter roams the greenwood, dealing death at will. Yet He guards His beasts, wears their semblance, instills in them His lust and power. And the Maiden-as-Huntress, in any pantheon, is the friend of Her creatures, mourning their destruction at the hands of conquering humanity.

So it is with nature. Animals do not hate their prey. Cats pounce with glee, eyes wide and ears forward. The dog pursues the rabbit with his tail high; he is playing. They are part of the world, and filled with the sense of being alive.

Is this the longing in the eyes of those who approach my counter, saying "Liscence and two tags, please," and paying the $41 that the government demands for their participation in the rite? The people whose actual means of making a living is many times removed from Earth's vitality will finally face the wild and have something personal to say to it. Balanced now are we?

With that same longing, I came to the Druids, and with that same longing, I came eventually to my untamed hill, to be one grubby, sweaty part of a world with more than people in it. Cars race over a concrete bridge; uncaring, the river flows beneath. Balanced now are we?

As day conquered night, and light conquers day, and our guaranteed annual year continues on its appointed course, I tell you; there is no need for faith.

Balanced now are we?

We may not be able to feel it, but it's there.

News of the Groves

Orinda Grove Site

Lughnasadha, as a festival of the first fruits, went off well. I was surprised at the number of feral plants that have "appeared" for members and born us fruit. One brought as offering the first tomato from a vine that "appeared on its own" in a pot of marigolds. I brought the first apple from the appletree that has been growing outside of my kitchen window for fifteen years, sprung from a Macintosh apple core. Small carrots still occasionally come up in the Grove Site, by the Monterey Pine, on the site of Joan's (First Arch Druid of Live Oak) compost pile. And our apple sapling beside the Lughnasadha caber, sprouted from a spit seed from the '83 feast, is growing rapidly.

The moral is clear:

Samhain Essay: The Other World

By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, Celtic New Years, the Day-between the Worlds...The Druidic year starts on Samhain, in the fall of the year, just as the Druidic day begins with the going down of the Sun. Samhain marks the end of the harvest which began at Lughnasadh. All fruit not gathered in by Samhain Eve must be left in the fields to feed the birds, the wild animals, and the Sidhi. The Pukas, mischievous spirits, will come for it, to steal its nourishing essence and leave the husk, or to despoil it, if it is not to their liking. Their mythic descendants swarm out in the form of myriad "Trick-or-Treaters."

Like New Years' celebration all over the world, Samhain festivities fall into two sequential phases: one that signifies the return to Chaos, and involves the disposal of old goods, potlatches, parties, suspension of taboos, return of the dead, and the mixing of the two Worlds, in Past and Future; and a second whose theme is the rebirth of Order and Cosmos, of creating anew, of preparations, and of the rites of Samhain Morning. (As we are not an official, organized Grove, here in Orinda, but a gathering of Solitary Third Order Druids, First Orders, and friends, the election that would ordinarily be held for officers in an R.D.N.A. Grove will not need to be held. Isn't it a relief?)

The beliefs involving the return of the dead on Samhain Night are based on the Pan-European traditions of Samhain as the time when the Other World is closest to this one, and when, therefore, doors, passages, may open between the two. In Celtic myths these gateways were usually located at the Sidhi Mounds, the megalithic tombs of the Celts' Pre-Indo-European predecessors. But ways were also said to exist through sacred lakes and springs, and through caves in the craigs. These doorways admitted passage in both directions. On special days, mortal heroes or heroines crossed to the Other World on quests, adventures or to obtain prophetic knowledge. Throughout Eur-Asia, the dead, who exist beyond time, are believed to know the future as well as everything that has happened in the past. Dead ancestors could help a favored descendent with this knowledge, or send health and prosperity, but first the petitioner must be in perfect estate, having broken no Geas, nor taboo, nor have incurred the censor of any Deity or Sidhi. In addition, the seeker must be in the good graces of the ancestor whose help is needed. Health or disease were from the ancestors in the Celtic Cosmos; to live well one had to be on good terms with the dead and with one's past. The past becomes present again on Samhain, between the years. All oblations and funeral rites due the ancestors must have been offered, and all debts of this World paid, if the traveler is to step lightly between the Worlds. If all was not in perfect order, the quester might become trapped or the ancestors could send disease and misfortune when the passage opened. Or the wronged dead could pass into this World, and walk in the time between the years, seeking revenge.

The concept of going to the Other World for help from disease or to secure prophetic knowledge is found in several different European Samhain traditions, as well as among the Celts, is probably cognate with, descended from the Other World journeys of the Paleolithic Eurasian shamans. Similar, but more complex and complete traditions and epics have been preserved among the Siberian shamanic religions. There, going to the Other World(s) and returning to one's mortal body are usually the privilege of the clergy, i.e. initiate shamans. But in Europe, on Samhain, the Other World is very close, in Celtic verse, just a mist apart. On this night, there is no treacherous journey through intermediate kingdoms or being-states. Tonight a mortal, albeit a hero or a heroine, could make the leap.

R.D.N.A members hold all night vigils, beginning with a bonfire at dusk when the first of the two Samhain services is held. All opened bottles of spirits must be finished by dawn, and there will be, then, no more fermented spirits in the Grove chalice until Beltaine. Plates of food and offerings should be set out, just beyond the firelight, for the souls of friends who have died in the past year. They may be invited to join the festivities.

At dawn the second Samhain service is held. All remaining liquor is sacrificed in the fire, and the Third Order Druids exchange their red ribbons and ornaments for the white of the Season of Sleep. There is pure water in the Chalice. The new year has begun.

In preparation, all debts should be paid, or arrangements for them brought into harmony. All rites due to the dead, and the past, should have been performed, and all obligations to the living brought current. Then enter the Time-Between-the-Worlds "without burden, without geas, without malice." Pleasant journeys!

Notes:

Gaulish was a declensional language like Greek and Latin and contained nominative, accusative, genitive, dative and sometimes a vocative form differing from the nominative for its nouns. It also contained masculine, feminine and neuter genders; plural and dual forms. The verbs of Gaulish are conjugated similarly to Greek and Latin. It was a P-Celtic language spoken in ancient Britain (known as Brythonic) and in most of France, Belgium, parts of Iberia, Austria, Switzerland and part of southern Germany and was carried to Galatia and Bohemia by colonies of Gauls before the Christian era. The main dialects of Gaul were Belgic, Lugdunensian, and Narbonensian. Belgic dialects became Brythonic* which in time evolved into Welsh, Cornish and Breton –the three surviving P-Celtic languages. Cornish died out in the late 1700s, but was kept alive academically until its revival in this century. In ancient times the Celtic languages did not mutate the initial consonant as they do today, but during the period they began to drop many declensional endings, the process of lenition and other phonetic eccentricities caused mutation.

The Heathen on the Heath: Dying

It is the dawning of our year, and the time to mourn our dead.

I mourn two men of gentle courage, Earl McKeever and George Russ. I cannot keen, or recite their deeds in epic verse; I was not so trained, and neither am I that big a liar. I wept when weeping was fresh and unavoidable. Now is the time of remembrance, and I remember each of them.

Both lived with disability; both died at the hands of murderers. What this means to the year that has ended, or the year that is beginning, or any years before or after, is beyond me—for which I am glad.

As always, I turn to the garden, to the land.

Plants are dying now, sinking to the ground, beginning to decay before the green of life has entirely left them. New growth fastens on the decay and is made strong thereby. This is the way of compost, and of those of us who bear the stigma: Survivor. Ruthlessly the living soul battens on memory. The mourner weeps proudly, wearing the names of the dead as decorations of battle.

And the earth does not judge us, nor does she care. Salmon run, and spawn, and die, and all their history is carried out to sea, along with the hope of their race. Leaves fall, and become rich loam. Myth degenerates into bedtime stories——and children dream.

And what shall we do, when sweet-scented loves and bright, clean angers of youth begin to disintegrate into the nameless depths of a mind no longer young?

Some of us become cynical, embracing disproof when proof proves impossible. Some of us set places for the dead at our tables, and turn down their beds, and berate the living world for slighting them; too, we cling to dead dreams as if loud repetition of their content would bring back our innocence, and vindicate its misconceptions as higher truth. To some of us, the passage of time is a pattern, immune to any attempt of ours to contribute. To others, time has not passed at all.

“When I die,” one friend told me, “the world ends.”

But I choose to inhabit a world that will outlive me, if only for company, and the desire to belong. I may not leave a mark on the face of history; there may be no place for me in any structured scheme of things.

But there’s always room on the compost heap.

Chapter of Not Having to Move Furniture in the Other World

Whoso knows this spell will have all his weekends free in Amenta.

May I not be forced to move furniture in the other world. That which is large, awkward, and extremely heavy, with sharp corners—may I not be forced to lift it.

The sofa—“I break your back” is its name; it does not fit through any door. I shall not carry the sofa; I shall not lift one end of the sofa.

The chest of drawers—“I fall on your foot” is its name. I shall not move the chest of drawers; I shall not carry even one drawer.

The pile of book boxes—it towers unto the ceiling; “pyramid of Khufu” is its name. I shall not carry one box; I shall not carry one book.

The waterbed—of myriad pieces is it made; no man knows their number. I shall not carry one piece; I shall not attempt to fit two pieces together.

I shall not move furniture in the other world, and all my weekends will be my own, for millions of years.

Yule Essay: Mistletoe

By Emmon Bodfish

ule, Winter Solstice is one of the four minor Druid High Days. It is associated with the Holly and the Mistletoe, prosperity and purification. The hanging of Mistletoe over doorways harks back to its protective function, as the All-Heal. Spirits that bring disease will not pass under it. All Mistletoe use and customs are carry overs from Pagan, most notably Druidic traditions.

Though kissing under the Mistletoe can't be traced back further than the 17th century, it is probably much older. It reflects the herb's Paleo-Druidic attributes of protection, fertility, and prosperity.

Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, gives us the best description of a Paleopagan Druid Ceremony, that of cutting the Mistletoe. According to Stuart Piggot, the ceremonial mistletoe must be cut from an oak tree. The time of the ritual was set by the Moon as in Pliny's description.

"The time of the rite was the sixth day of the new moon, after preparations had been made for a feast and a sacrifice of two white bulls. A Druid in a white robe climbed the tree and cut with a golden sickle the branch of mistletoe, which was caught as it fell on a white cloak. The bulls were then sacrificed and all present ate of them."

The golden sickle is a puzzle, as pure gold will not hold an edge sharp and tough enough to cut through the woody stem of the mistletoe. Gilded, or simply polished bronze, are more likely materials. Though Pliny was allowed to witness the ritual, he probably could not approach the Druid or examine the sickle.

Nor would he have been able to talk to a Gaulish Druid without an interpreter. Their ceremony was recorded in Roman Gaul. Gold may have been a description of color, or a quoting of hearsay. Elsewhere in his book Pliny writes of the ritual necessity of gathering the mistletoe left handed, after fasting, and of the Celts plucking Selago without using an iron knife, barefoot and with the right hand through the left sleeve of a white tunic, but these were private rites, not public ceremonies. There is no mention in them of the presence of a Druid.

Calendar

Winter Solstice is at 7:56 P.M. Pacific Standard Time on December 21st, that is 03:56 hours Greenwich, 1986. If you are near a clock, and remember, shout "Shaul!"

Post-Oak Proto-Grove

Druidism and Truth

An Editorial by Thomas Cross

The word druid itself is rooted in the same Indo-European source as the English word true and truth: names dru*—the zero-grade form of deru* "firm, solid, steadfast" which also gave us such words as tree, endure, durable, the Greek drus, Sanskrit druvam and so forth.

Since Druid means "he who is truthful" or "the firm, solid and steadfast one" (in Gaulish druis "druid" in nominative case, druidos in the genitive), it is appropriate that we look always for the truth and always utter the truth. In old Irish sagas, the druid or seer who utters a falsehood is cursed and some disaster befalls him and whenever he takes an oath he promises or swears that if he should utter a falsehood knowingly, he may be swallowed up into the earth or some other calamity take him.

In our modern information age that we are now entering, I urge that us modern day druids do our share of preserving truth and guarding against falsehood and dishonesty. I am of course speaking in terms of advertising, everyday speech, on the job, in school, in business, etc. The truth must be able to stand on its own. Truth is not opinion, truth is fact, truth is not values, but truth, though it be impersonal, often hurts when people cannot face it. I find that my greatest pet peeve is misinformation, misleading speculation, propaganda, deception in reporting and teaching. There is much deliberate writing of misinformation in the writings of the occult world. Often the authors are too lazy or too hasty to do the proper research for supporting their opinions or they deliberately falsify their sources and present pseudo-history as history or vice versa. There are so many popular misconceptions held by so many that the truth will be distorted for a long time in the folklore of the modern occultist and neo-pagan in the years to come—although we have the correct information available in most public libraries alongside the misinformation.

Another source of misinformation being disseminated to the general public (outside of the neo-pagan milieu) is the propaganda of the Christian Fundamentalists and Evangelists or "Fundagelicals", who deliberately report falsehoods about the beliefs of others in order to build "straw-men" of their religious and ideological competitors. Often the Fundagelicals report or present their own idiosyncratic or personal religious views as if they were fact—that is, as if they were the objective truth! The Fundagelicals, one might say, confuse fact with values or opinions—a blatant error in logic!

In the field of Celtic scholarship concerning the ancient or paleo-Druids, there is so much nonsense being passed off as fact that it is a time-consuming and tedious task to begin to research the subject. To the beginner and those who have fallen victim to the nonsense, I recommend that you read many of the books coming out in the field of comparative religion and mythology by Georges Dumezil, Jaan Puhvel, Gerald Larson, Bruce Lincoln (to name a few) and consult the works of Mircea Eliade—one of the great 20th century scholars. For those who are concerned about ecology and conservation, I recommend Lovelock's Gaia. For the general reader I would recommend The New Apocrypha—John Sladek, Psychology's Occult Doubles—Leahy and Leahy, The Psychology of Transcendence—Andrew Neher, the Dictionary of Misinformation—Burnam, More Misinformation—Burnam, There are Alligators in our Sewers—Dickson.

Also I recommend that all neo-pagans develop a skeptical side to how they view these things, to read between the lines, and question things and be curious. It is o.k. to be curious—in fact, it is healthy to be curious about life. Most everyone reading this newsletter, will probably think to him or herself, “Oh I always think for myself, I question things, I read between the lines” and so forth. I ask that you even question that and even question what I have written as you read. I am not suggesting that we be distrustful or become reductionists or overly critical and skeptical. I am suggesting though, that we become less emotional and more inquisitive about learning...that we don't just accept things because they merely feel good or seem to work. Playing around with metaphysics and making experiments with our consciousness is serious business and one can so easily fool oneself into believing things that are not the case which can have serious repercussions for the future. If anyone has read the book The Day the Universe Changed by James Burke or seen the series on PBS, you will understand on the worldly level also.

I recommend that you get a copy of a good simple-to-read book on Logic or Reasoning—especially if you have never studied the subject and read it carefully (I recommend Introduction to Logic by Copi). Take a course in logic at a local college or school, it will well be worth it for anyone. A fun pastime would be to identify fallacies while reading or watching TV or listening to the radio—(advertising is rife with fallacies and propaganda techniques). Pretty soon you can tear apart the arguments of books simply on grounds of incorrect reasoning or illogic.

I am sure this article will have offended many right-brain, purely emotional mystics, who believe that truth can only be found through some altered state or dream-world; my rebuttal to them is that they are not speaking of this world that we all must live in together. I am talking about the physical world, the here and now, and the rules for living here depends upon people getting along with each other, keeping the environment clean and inhabitable, avoidance of war, avoidance of crime, learning to live with the weather and climatic conditions and avoiding stress, disease, poisons and dishonesty. We all must face that we have to have the mundane necessities in order to survive and we cannot live by spiritual and visionary or magical experiences alone.

—Tom C.

Nonsense:

Or Popular Fallacies in the Neo-Pagan World:

That worshipping a Male deity is a trait of a male dominated society, or, that worshipping a female deity is the trait of a female dominated society.

That a society that used matrilineal descent was “matriarchal.”

That all patriarchal societies treated females as inferiors.

That the mother goddesses of Europeans in pagan times are derived from a pre-Indo-European matriarchal or matrilineal people, and/or that they all represent a universal Mother-Earth. That all celestial deities are Male deities.

That removing sexism from our language will help us to be less sexist. (the Turks and Persians or Iranians have almost genderless or non-sexist languages—yet their cultures are very sexist).

That religious beliefs can be handed down genetically—that certain races have certain types of souls or spirits.

Student Instructions

The name “Halloween” means “hallowed (holy) evening.” It is celebrated the day before All Saint's Day. In spite of the fact that Halloween takes its name from a Christian festival, it has never taken on a Christian significance. All of the customs associated with Halloween have pagan origins.

The Druids were an order of pagan priests in ancient Britain and Gaul. They believed that ghosts, witches, fairies, and elves came out to hurt people on Halloween. They also believed black cats were sacred and that they had once been human beings but were changed as a punishment for their bad deeds.

The Druids held a celebration on Halloween called Samhain, meaning summer's end, which marked the beginning of winter and was a time for feasting on food grown in the summer months. Our custom of decorating for Halloween with autumn leaves, pumpkins, and cornstalks came from the autumn festival of the Druids. On the night between October and November, the Druids built huge fires on hills as a protection against the evil to come. The believed evil spirits were waiting to rush in when summer was over. Many Druids stood around these fires and told of their meetings with spirits. They waved burning pieces of straw raised on pitchforks, for they believed this would frighten away demons and witches. In case this did not work, they also wore grotesque and terrifying costumes. They believed if they dressed horribly and walked around all night, the spirits would think they were demons and do them no harm.

We have kept many Druid customs by using pictures and shapes of ghosts and witches in Halloween decorations and by wearing costumes and masks.

The Druids did NOT believe that ghosts, fairy (fírr an Si) came out to hurt people on Samhain. And no Druids of ancient times ever made mention of witches, a pejorative term for members of the Old, also Pagan, Religion. There is no evidence connecting Druidism with any beliefs about black cats; a belief that is probably much more ancient and universal. There is also no evidence that the Celtic beliefs about reincarnation included the return of a person as a cat. Celtic myths and poems that deal with the subject show people's souls returning as people. For a brief summary of some of the Druidic beliefs about Samhain, see the Samhain Missal-Any for 1986. The bonfires on hilltops were beacons to herald the returning Sun, not "protection from evil." The straw and pitchfork story, I cannot find anywhere in Celtic myth, folklore, history or religion. There is no evidence that they ever dressed in "costumes." This is a later invention, possibly harking to memories of myths of Puccas, Celtic nature spirits who gleaned the grain left in the fields after Samhain, Samhain being the end of the harvest. As for line 7, column 2, there is no reference indicating that Druids ever dressed in poor taste nor walked insomniacally around all night. Vigils were held on Samhain. There is no evidence that any Druid ever disguised her/himself as a demon.

"Oh, Well," as Larry said, "It could have been worse. At least they didn't mention human sacrifice."

The Heathen on the Heath:

Seasonal Festivities

The wind is rising; it yowls like a ghost, or like my boojum-hunting Siamese cat. Modern society, to placate centralized authority, has its Halloweens and Christmases mixed up; Yule's defiance of the dark has always had a shiver in it, for all the blazing fires and gift-giving.

In the hills, our potlatches begin early and end late, with gifts displaying little of meekness, or modern good taste. It is a show of individual power and communal solidarity, an upraised finger to the society that names us separate and subordinate, and a jeer at the darkness. Animals are given, and food, and parts for woodstoves, and tools, and weapons. The well-to-do clothe their friends in gaudy finery; the poor may literally give the shirts off their backs. ("I got good wear out of this, but it'd really look better on you...") Some of these folk are Christians, and others evade all Gods equally; we pagans, for the most part, go in secret. But the Mother is there. Who can forget Her ways, when She blows off chunks of the roof and pours the bounty of Her waters down the backs of our necks at 4 A.M.?

The Really Together Pagan Farmer could perhaps use the Season of Sleep to catch up on same (barring the occasional invasion by the elements!) For all Her vaunted somnolence in these short days, Mom would do a lot of my winter work for me, had I only prepared. Clover scattered in the cornfield will both feed and weed it, while we who miss the boat get to experience winter's majesty firsthand, as we haul manure in the rain. And this is the litany of the Not So Together Pagan Farmer: "Next year, for sure, I'll remember!"

People of the towns and valleys charge about at breakneck speed, readying for their own midwinter festival. They beam in childlike glee at festoons of red and gold and green—anybody recognize those colors? Spend money like water, and then go home and feed their shrewd and skeptical children one version or another of the Santa Clause: there is or there ain't. The Heathen's child didn't wait for the huffing and puffing of grownup authority. "Santa's a spirit," he said. The Heathen's child happens to believe in spirits, being something of an imp himself. Will Santa come to him in visions? Guide him through the forest at night? Bestow amulets, misplace household objects, spook the cat? There have been a disproportionate number of small, impressively-antlered deer around here lately; perhaps I should have a talk with that kid.

Do people have a Yule instinct? With crèches and evergreens, candles in varying arrangements, and assorted bells and books, we all seem to gather in the dark, to give the Wheel of the Year a push out of midwinter's mud and snow. And thus we come to love a season of harsh truths. It is now that sickly animals will die, and terminally-ill people as well. It is now that the weather takes its toll, in sniffles and shivers, in stuck, crashed, or broken vehicles. And darkness settles in our thoughts and our hearts, depression and contention and unexplained tears: we need our festival now. The flame of Life's energy burns low, and it is our turn to fan the embers that once blazed so heartily, whether or not we noticed or cared.

So join now, my people, remembering who we are. Let not the traditions of others, whether openly sacred or merely The Way Things Are Done These Days, bind us in unawareness. Rather let us face our hardship and heartbreaks, wearying pasts and intimidating futures, and together make loud, rude noises at them. And so we shall be prepared for the Sun's return, and strengthened for the work that is to follow. Don't worry if it isn't easy, or if the holiday's merriment has a catch in it here and there. We have the freedom to debunk the real seasonal fraud, and admit: it isn't easy, or carefree, or exactly like being a kid again. Then, having admitted it, light the fire, pour the punch, and make the light welcome when it gets here.

It isn't easy. So why should Mom have to do it all alone?

Oimeic Essay: Bride

By Emmon Bodfish

imeic, the festival of Bride, Bridgit, Bredes, the Sun-Maiden, Celtic Goddess of Light, Fire, and the Hearth. She is the patroness of craftsmen, especially those that use fire, smithies and workers in gold. Gold is her color, and she hangs her cloak on the beams of the morning Sun. She is also the patroness of poets, source of Bardic inspiration, which, to the Gaels was a supersensory form of fire descending upon the mind of the poet. The symbol of fire-in-the-water signified her divine inspiration, and her favored poets could see fire burning at the bottom of her sacred wells and springs.

The Festival of Lights, Candlemas, on the Continent, a celebration presided over by “Lucinda,” from the Latin “the light bringer,” is rooted in old Oimeic festivals. The Light is now returning; the days grow perceptibly longer, thaw begins in the more southerly parts of Europe and in Ireland, and the sheep and kine begin to give birth. In this association, and as Goddess of the Hearth, Bride is also the Goddess of birth. (To co-opt her worship, which they couldn’t eradicate, the Christians invented Bridget, who was mid-wife to Mary and Jesus. No such character is mentioned in the Bible.)

In the R.D.N.A. tradition, Oimeic is celebrated when the Sun is mid-way between Solstice and Equinox. There is the milk of a sheep or a goat in the chalice, and thanks are given that the coldest time of the year is past. The Earth Mother begins to stir in Her sleep, and dream of Spring.

I will rise early on the morning of Monday,
I will sing my rune and rhyme,
I will go sunwise with my cog
To the nest of my hen with sure intent.

I will place my left hand to my breast,

My right hand to my heart,
I will seek the loving wisdom of Him
Abundant in grace, in broods, and in flocks.

I will close my two eyes quickly,
As in blind-man’s bluff moving slowly;
I will stretch my left hand over thither
To the nest of my hen on yonder side.

This is a hatching spell peculiar to this egg-time of year, from the Scottish Highlands, circa 1800. In the Gáidhlig introduction by the collector, Alexander Carmichael, there is a quote from the 102 year old lady from whom he collected this and other runes. In it she tells of the customs, purely pagan, of placing a bit of the native soil on the breast of a corpse before burial. This is a custom I have heard from many sources in the Neo-pagan community, and from my Celtic relatives as a child. However, this is the first “academic” reference or precedent I have been able to uncover. It may have been a part of the Ancient Druid funeral rites, or from an even older Pagan stratum. I have heard it called the “releasing soil” now-a-days. It could well be incorporated into N.R.D.N.A. traditions. We would appreciate any feedback anyone out there has on this.

[2005 Editor’s note: Emmon had this done at his funeral in 1999.]

Letters to the Editor

I especially have come to enjoy “The Heathen on the Heath” series—it’s well written and thoughtful, there is a place for both the scholarly point of view and “the country pagan” point of view. In my opinion, both are important.

I’ve lived in the country twice in my life, and it’s much easier to be a “real” pagan in the country than in the city. In my opinion—the natural cycles of the Earth and the seasons are far easier to follow and to be in tune with in the country—I long for the mountains and woods in my heart—I really don’t like living in the city, but for now, that’s reality I suppose.

Thom Cross tells me that the Celts really weren’t Chthonic oriented—or Mother Earth oriented, but were more sky and astronomically oriented.

Well, the Celts loved Nature from what I read—and I personally believe that some of their Goddesses were very much Earth Mother types (Dana or Danu for one example)—and in a way it doesn’t matter what the historic Celts believed in, or how they practiced their faith in the ancient times, but what we believe in and where we are going now.

I believe that Mother Earth needs our help, and now perhaps some of the “Balance” lost can be restored—perhaps I’m wrong—but that’s one of the major reasons that paganism is important to me—that I'm of Celtic descent is important too, but it's second to the feelings above.

I believe that modern pagans should become more involved in ecology—cause at least to me that is where the real “power” comes from—from our attunement to Nature, and to the natural cycles of building and decay—life and death.

I'm not trying to negate the role scholarship and study either, for these are very important too—but one can probably learn more about the role of one's life in relation to the whole, and to “the Gods” by a few days in the wilderness, than by weeks spent studying in the library, or in one's study.

I suppose that it comes down to a question of balance in our lives, as well as in nature (which are lives are a part of—no matter if we live in city or country), to balance the studying and scholarship, and the playing and questing in Nature out, one with the other—“the middle path” as the Tibetan Buddhists might say.

Circle Prepares to Go to Court to Fight for Wiccan Rights: We Need Your Help!

Our struggle to obtain a permit to continue operating our Wiccan Church on Circle Sanctuary Land has been going on for more than seven months, and now it is very likely that we will be going to court.

Our right to have our Church's networking offices and other religious activities in our remodeled barn was challenged in April by the county zoning administrator, who threatened to take us to court and fine us for non-compliance to the county zoning code. We then went through a series of intense public zoning meetings in July and August. After running into difficulties in the first two meetings, we got another attorney involved. This second lawyer, who has done work with the ACLU in the past, told us he was interested in serving as lead attorney should we need to go to court. I, along with both of our attorneys, spoke in our Church's behalf at the next meeting in late August. There was much heated debate between us and the government officials about whether or not we were a legitimate Church and whether or not we should get a permit. Finally, we were verbally promised by the local Town Board, the County Zoning Committee, and the County Chairman himself, that we would get a zoning change and permit to continue operating our Church on our Land as we have been doing for the past three years. Based on that promise, we entered into the additional legal steps necessary to obtain that permit, including filing a new application and presenting our request to government officials at more meetings.

However, our new application began running into trouble at the October meeting when the Town Board broke its promise and voted to recommend denying the zoning change to County Board which has the authority to grant the change. Despite this, we persisted in negotiations at a meeting on November 6 and won the Zoning Committee's recommendation for the change by a 3-2 vote. In addition, we even settled on the terms of our zoning permit with both the Town Board and the Zoning Committee. But our zoning change was defeated a week later at the county level by the County Board. Accompanying this letter are recent newspaper articles about that decision.

We now have done everything we can to obtain our permit without a court battle. There is still a chance that the County Board may reverse its decision by voting again, but this has seldom happened in County Board history. I am presently planning strategy with our team of attorneys, which now includes the two who have already been involved in the case, plus another who has had direct experience in dealing with a case of this nature in Wisconsin. While, due to counsel from our attorneys, I can not report exact what legal approaches we will be taking, I can tell you that we are preparing to go to court, even the U.S. Supreme Court if necessary, to fight for our right to operate our Wiccan Church on this Land.

As far as I know, Circle Sanctuary is the first Wiccan Church in the nation to be faced with such a zoning challenge. Whether we win or lose, what happens to us will affect efforts of other Wiccan Churches to obtain Church zoning in their own local areas as well as Pagan Rights in general. Therefore, it is vitally important for us to win—not only so that we can keep providing our networking services to Pagans throughout the nation and around the world, but even more importantly, so that Pagan religious freedoms are upheld.

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

* Send Money: we desperately need funds to win this battle. Any donation, large or small, is appreciated and is tax deductible. Send to: Circle Sanctuary Defense Fund, Box 219, Mr. Horeb, WI 53572 USA.

* Send Energy: Remember us in your meditations and rituals. Send us healing, strength, protection, prosperity, and success.

* Tell Others: ask other Pagans to send us money and energy, too.

Thanks for all Support you send us!

Spring Equinox Essay:

Horse Deities

By Emmon Bodfish

Spring Equinox, balance, awakening, a time of planting, a time in keeping with the theme of Irish Macha, Patroness of farmers, the Horse-goddess, who could run with the speed of a horse or become one. On the Continent She was called Epona. She was Rhiannon in Wales. She is a shape-shifting Goddess who can appear in human form, or in the form of a mare, or of a woman mounted on horseback. She is responsible not only for the fertility of herds, but of the ground as well. She is described in Celtic myths as the mother of kings or as capable of bestowing sovereignty on the rightful king. She is represented by the white mare whom the Kings of Ireland espouse at their coronations. Prof. J. Duran speculates that Macha and the mare represent the agrarian classes, the "Tuath," the third of the three castes in ancient Celtic society. (The other two were the warriors and the Druids. "Caste" is a poor word since these categories were not rigid, and some movement between them was possible, but it is used in Indo-European studies for lack of a better term.)

Macha may have been the Patroness of the Tuath, as Bride was the Patroness of Bards, and as the Morgani were associated with the warrior caste. Llyr, or Mamnon McLlyr, it is said, also has ancient equine themes running through His worship. There is a theory that He was a Horse-deity back on the steppes of the Indo-European homeland, and that only later, when the Celtic peoples reached the Atlantic coast and the Island, did He become a Sea-god. He is always portrayed in a chariot, or riding in a boat, or in a combination of both, as in His sea-shell boat drawn by porpoises. This considered, He may be more a charioteer or vehicular god than a Horse-deity.* Epona rides astride. Cernnunos, the other shape-shifting, fertility-bestowing deity, never rides. He sits on the ground among the wild beasts, and is spoken of as running with the deer. These latter two figures hark back to the earliest Eur-Asian levels, very likely to the Paleolithic. Similar figures may have been common to the Ice Age peoples of Eastern Europe and West Asia from whom the Proto-Indo-Europeans sprang. In that early time, in the art of the Magdalenian hunters, a similar theme can be seen.

The Paleolithic dancer wearing a horse-head mask is a woman. The men wear disguises of horned animals, bear, or mammoths. The connection between Macha, the female shape-shifter-shaman-magician, and the horse may be very old, paralleling the male enchanter of horned animals, from the time when the Horned Man and the Horse Woman danced in Paleolithic caves.

*Could He be persuaded to protect us nowadays in our cars?

The Debate Issue

(The Editor fiercely refuses to take sides)

A Rebuttal to Albion and the Irrationalists and the Anti-Intellectual and Anti-Celtic "Druids" (or Those who call themselves "Druids" 'cause they like the name)

I would like to point out that I never told him that the Celts were "astronomically" oriented nor did I tell him that the ancient Celts had no chthonic beliefs (at all). Mr. Albion has made a “straw man” of me and he uses an ad hominem argument by implying that I am anti-ecological or anti-nature because I happen to believe in BOTH the celestial and terrestrial.

Albion is apparently stricken with urban romanticism and somehow believes that knowing “too much” about the ancient Celts will somehow keep you from appreciating nature (which he equates with mother-earth). The Celtic peoples of pagan times were very much concerned with natural phenomena. This is clearly not the same thing as MOTHER Nature, whom we have seen on margarine commercials (and elves do not bake cookies in trees either).

The ancient Celts have been romanticized for three centuries or more, and the Druids have been characterized as anything from White-Robed Hermits to Astronomers and medicine men. I believe that we modern Druids are above this kind of la-de-da romanticism that contributes nothing to our intellectual and spiritual growth, but merely serves to obscure the truth behind pseudo-science and whimsical folklore and fairytales. If paganism or NEO-paganism has to hide behind pseudo-science and irrational obscurantism, then it is not better off than the rubbish promulgated by mad-men...the delusions, the fads and falsehood that will certainly lead our civilization to ignorance and ruin.

Mr. Albion has attacked the years of research I have put into reconstructing and organizing the vast amount of comparative studies on the Druids and what they might have actually taught. Because Albion has learned much from me* and because he seems to be disappointed in what the paleo-Druids were about, he has decided to attack the messenger for the message. However, he would not have been so quick to attack had he understood the significance of what the paleo-Druid's message had to teach, but unfortunately he finds his own reality a safe place than to try to comprehend the world of the ancient Celt. Of course it is not easy to understand the world-view of the ancient pagans—but nothing worth knowing is always going to be EASY.

Furthermore, Albion hasn't his facts straight...Danu (Anglicised as Dana) was not an EARTH MOTHER type so far as scholars can deduce, for the name Danu comes from an Indo-European root meaning “to flow” or “to drip” (see page 175 of Julius Pokorny's Dictionary)...going by the fact that Danu is cognate with the name of the Danube river (*Danu- in Celtic renamed Danuuius by the Romans) it seems that She is (or was) originally a River Goddess. This is not uncommon since rivers all over Britain and Ireland (also Gaul) are named after Celtic goddesses. Danu's role in Celtic myths is very shadowy and ill-definable—all we can surmise is that she is the Mother-of-the-Gods since the name Tuatha De Danann (= tribes-of-Goddess-Danu) and Welsh Mabinogi characters with divine names are frequently “ap Don” (= “son of Don” or “Son of Danu”). Also there are river names all over Britain resembling this Don/Danu: Donwy river, Don river (in Scotland) and the two Dee rivers (the Dee = Celtic Deua in Gaulish (or Brythonic) “goddess” the feminine equivalent of Deuos “god.”) Therefore, we have no real evidence for believing that Danu was an earth goddess.

Out of respect for the intelligence of Missal-Any readers I believe I am obligated to research and substantiate my assertions before I allow my ideas to be published...in Albion's case what he has written speaks for itself...as what many others have written in neo-pagan journals. If you were led to think that Danu was an earth goddess and it was never *well maybe not!

presented to you any other way, you would not know any better. Unfortunately, Albion didn't know or consider using a better and more plausible example of an earth goddess for the ancient Celts

(which I might add is quite obvious if one knows anything about Celtic mythology) that is Tailltiu who gave her name to Teltown—the site of an ancient shrine for ancient Irish pagans. The name Tailltiu is etymologically cognate with the Latin Tellus and these names go back to an Indo-European root meaning “ground, floor” Tel-* and this gave the Gauls their word for earth talamu (genitive talamun) in Irish this word is talamh. The ancient Romans had Terra mater “mother earth” or quite literally “mother land.” The Greeks had Gaia which James Lovelock used as the title of a well-known book...and well the Celts loved nature so much but...if you're like Albion: just go out to the country and make up your own religion...why give a rat's arse about all that boog larning' anyway!?!?!

I doan need no Sigh-enz to hep out the earth
Jest my reality.

The Irrational Pagan

(A Satire on Those Turned Off by Paleo-Druidism and Other Anti-Intellectuals Also.)

Bein' a pagan's nothin' more than goin' outside
Going out in the country and talkin' 'bout ecology

Yer only a true pagan when you go out in the woods
 And getchy self in tune with nature or Mother Earth
 We don't need Science and Tech-nology to make the world a better place for what it's worth.
 Though I don't care what they had to say
 I call myself a Druid anyway
 I also say I'm a Celtic-man
 Though I aint interested in their culture.
 It don't matter what's in history's plan
 I jest know what I fail in ma hort with nature
 So don't go telling' me 'bout them ancient folks
 You can only learn about them in books.
 It hurts my eyes and brain to read 'bout ancient stuff.
 So I bleeve what I fail in my hort is enough.
 What I hair yo sayin' man is that you bleeve in yer reality
 Well I got my own reality and it's a safer place for me
 In my own world where I b'long I get high on nature
 I pine for the trees and mountains where there's no one
 To contradict me or disagree (with humongous college words)
 There, I can say whatever I bleeve is pagan and Druidic
 I can say that I am a Celt or Tibetan Buddhist and
 No one can ask me questions about the Celtic or Buddhist bleefs.
 Yep, I'm safe in my own reality there in the country
 I am all alone to be a real backwoods mystic Aint it a shame though that I have to live in the big city
 Where there's a bunch o' other people talkin' and learnin'
 I feel so damn powerless against them high rise buildings
 I can only sound out magical energy to restore nature's balance.
 But hail there goes them damn scholars a-studyin' things again
 Tellin' me it aint enough to be sendin' out vibrations
 They tell me I got to read and learn things, damn that education!

A Reply to Thomas Cross' Rebuttal

By Albion

First off, I'd like to say that it saddens me deeply that I have obviously lost a good friend.

Thomas, my letter was not an attack upon you personally, though you obviously took it that way. I am truly sorry to have offended a friend over something like having different opinions (and it seems that we are indeed worlds apart in our views).

If I could offer some opinions here, (notice I said "opinions," that's exactly what I mean) I am going to ignore all the pointed jabs that Thom Cross makes at me personally, but I do want to address several of the issues that he raises.

I never meant to imply that Thom was "Anti-ecological" or "anti-nature," I can't see where he finds this from after re-reading the original letter (which by the by, was a personal letter to Emmon and was only published after he asked me if I minded if he did so) of mine.

On the contrary, I knew that Thom loves nature long before I wrote this letter.

Where in my letter in question, do I attack "the years of research" that you have done, there is a need for scholarship as I pointed out, but reading and studying will never take one all the way to a spiritual experience, it can help, but something more is needed.

It would be nice to know much more about what the Ancient Celts believed in and did, but even if I did know, it's doubtful that I would live or practice ritual in the same manner as they did. Paganism, like all living religion and true forms of spirituality, is an evolving and changing thing. I find it highly doubtful that we could go back to the world of the Ancient Celts, as time at this level is linear, we can only go forward (or around, as the case may be). The Celts, as all ancient cultures, did some rather ghastly and Barbaric things—that I personally would never want to be part of.

I stand corrected about Danu, however, as the meaning of words changed, Dana, or Danu, came to be connected with the land in general in Ireland, this holds true today, as well in yesteryear.

I think Thomas Cross is missing the point here, where paganism survived (at least in the British Isles) it was not usually the scholarly class who helped it do so, but the simple country people who had passed their beliefs on orally for hundreds of years, these people were not researchers, nor did their knowledge come from books—but it was passed down from generation to generation (by word of mouth).

I don't advocate "making up" one's own religion. I do advocate getting to know your own Higher Self, I do advocate getting out of the cities if it's possible, which in many cases it isn't—in these cases some sort of "quest" into Nature and your own relationship to Nature at all levels is in order, I feel.

I feel that we as a species are at a turning point that could go either way—certainly, being an active ecologist is part of being pagan (at least for me). After living in California for two years, the condition of much of the air and water in the heavier populated places is simply appalling to me. So much for my "urban romanticism".

I am proud to be of Celtic descent, I am interested in my ancestry and always have been.

I am not a "Druid"—since the real Ancient Druids all died off centuries ago (or thousands of years ago). What really qualifies one to be a "Druid?" There are many Druid-revivalist groups both here and in Europe, are any of them "real" Druids?

I have received teachings from an hereditary pagan from England, from two "Wicca" groups of modern origins, and done much research into Native-American Spirituality and Religion, as well as much reading into the Celts and everything Celtic, including their religion. I'm probably also affected by "Quaker" thought (or "The Society of Friends") which was the last branch of Christianity that I was associated with before I adopted paganism.

I am not especially fond of titles, but "pagan" serves quite nicely at this time.

I do not think of myself as a scholar, but as a reasonably simple person who wishes to see Life thrive and our planet survive these turbulent times.

If I have offended the readers of "A Druid Missal-Any", including Thomas Cross, I apologize. But, we are all entitled to our own opinions.

P.S. As to the mocking of my Southern accent: as Mark Twain once said, "You got the words, but you ain't got the tune."

Where is meaning, or mission, or will? There is a place for me in these hills, and right easily could I stagnate in it.

Seasons come to us, reminding us that we are neither omnipotent nor alone. But seasons have as many names as there are folk to speak them. I give rose-cuttings to a Wiccan neighbor

“for Brigid,” because if I said Oimele she’d say “huh?” And local farmers have other names for it: lambing-time, and also a pain in the ass, with bummers to nurse and marauders to repel—coyote, cougar, dog-pack. And then one must ask, are the berry-bushes cut yet? Does the nursery have seed-potatoes? The time to remember the Equinox, and planting, is in February, before it is too late.

Much is said in these pages of tradition, and of scholarship, and of knowledge that must not be lost. Others, I among them, point in turn to the knowledge that sits directly in front of our noses, just waiting to be ignored. Neither the traditional scholar, nor I, can do anything as a purist but yell at the other; in the vibrating tension between us is most of reality.

So let me say now that I do not set out to abandon the mythic awareness of our forefolk, but only to live a life with leaves as well as roots. If we are not merely the inventors of myth, but co-participants with the gods, then we must recognize that myth springs both from humanity and from the soil itself. Gladly will I learn what my people once knew of their homeland. But if you ask me (or even if you don’t; you can always read something else!) I will tell you what I learn from my own homeland, for that may well be the only thing on Earth that I know and you don’t.

Myth likes the grubby liberty of the hills, and hill folk join gladly in the game, taking to themselves small notorieties as straight-men to Nature’s comedies, or soldiers in mythic battles. There is a Trickster here, called The Buck You’d Better Not Shoot At: he’s robbed a thousand gardens with impunity, and whosoever shoulders a gun against him is injured in the attempt. I’ve seen him myself; he’s magnificent. There are good-lucks and bad-lucks, many of them founded in common sense: don’t hunt between the houses could hardly be called baseless superstition, nor could the rough interpretations of Karma or hubris that passes for common knowledge. “Something will hear you!” we warn our braggarts, and they turn pale and shut up. And “God” help the one who drives heedlessly by a neighbor’s stalled or swamped vehicle, for the local gods will not.

Where do these youthful, local traditions and the elder traditions of Celtic Druidism meet? I spent as many days as anyone else with neither any recognizable knowledge, nor any use for it; then a neighbor came to me. “You’re the Druid around here,” he said; “which trees should I be careful not to cut?”

I could have said that Druids don’t deal with things like that, except that what little I known of tradition states that our forebears were priests and cognoscenti, meant to be consulted by their neighbors. I could have said that Neopagan Druidism was a religion—but since when does that make it irrelevant? So “the Druid around here” spent a long day in a neighbor’s woodlot, trying to feel the life-forces of trees, inspecting roots for firmness and tops for fullness, and trying to remember snatches of an ecology course she took in 1970. Seat of the pants flying, indeed—but it might have been less confusing if I’d spent more time studying!

And there, perhaps, we have balance, if not stability. Just so is the spring a time of balance, though when it snows one day and cooks my greenhouse the next, it may be too pretty to appreciate it. The year is not an orderly, well-mannered procession; it goes by fits and starts. And learning, if it is to take us anywhere we haven’t been before, must see-saw between study and appreciation, with each testing the other.

And when I am confused, I shall admit confusion—not by intoning that there are Things I Was Not Meant To Know, but by realizing that I can’t see (or portray) the whole picture at once. I speak to you only as one person speaking, saying one thing at a time. We are not the people of the One God, the One Truth, or the One Way; we are like the forces of Nature that we worship—a howling confabulation of extremes.

This is our balance (as when we chant to a March windstorm, “Balanced now are we!” and burst into giggles.) Let no voice among us be silenced; this is what we are, and how we grow.

News of the Groves

Odd incident on Oimele Service held by a solitary Third, alone, for his own and the Goddess’ benefit. It had rained. The fire pit of the altar was soaked. The wood burned dully and smoldered, since, despite all precautions, it was probably damp. I wondered if it would ignite the sacrifice. This was the Oimele offering, a fresh bud sprig of pine, with some blooming Baccharis and green hedge from around the Grove. It sat on the coals and smoked a little. I waited, I kept my patience; I resisted the urge to blow on the fire. “Let happen what’s going to happen.” After a while, a small, blue flame started from one edge of the offering, died down and then revived, yellow-orange. The sacrifice began to burn from the base and the middle of the sprigs, and upward toward their buds. In its own burning, it rekindled the fire, which then burned easily, all the way down to coals. It is the only instance I have seen of the sacrifice igniting the fire.

From the manner in which the sacrifice burned, the Celts read the augury. This, then, is the divination from the coming season.

Beltane Essay: Maypole and Sacrifice

By Emmon Bodfish

eltaine, May Day, was always the most widely and universally celebrated of the Druidic and old Pagan High Days. It was also the least Christianized and distorted, even in the heyday of the church's powers. In Ireland, Wales, and parts of Europe the Maypole was a freshly cut young larch with a crown of green living branches at its top. The use of a tree of the larch family, decorated with streamers suspended down from its top, and other features of the Maypole dance are thought to hark back to the early Proto-indo-European deer and horse sacrifices, and the rituals around the sacrificial stake.

Rituals of this kind were preserved down to the present century in Siberia among the peoples of the northwestern quarter. These tribes once occupied a more southerly location, but have been driven steadily northward since medieval times. In the Neolithic, they are thought to have occupied the forest belt north of the Proto-Indo-European homeland around the Caspian and Aral Seas. Pursuing an essentially Mesolithic life of hunting and pastoralism, most of these forest peoples rejected Christianity and maintained their traditional religions down to modern times, and have, therefore, as Professor James Duran puts it, "been able to give us a window on the past."

They have likewise preserved their traditions in the face of the Russian State, which tolerates them as a folk curiosity. First studied and recorded in this century, they have been a rich source of information about Meso and Neolithic European cultures. The Russian anthropologist Popinov, in his extensive studies of these peoples, gives transcriptions of many of the traditional ceremonies that they have preserved.

In the Siberian pony or reindeer sacrifices, the animal was tied to a freshly cut young larch or birch which had been decorated with ribbons, streamers, and colored threads. In this offering, the Buryat shaman was assisted by the unmarried young people of the tribe, nine youths and nine maidens, who danced around the larch and the slain animal. The shaman, in trance, conducted the animal's soul up the path marked by the streamers to the top of the tree, and then upward to the waiting deity who received the sacrifice. (Ribbons were also used to mark out "soul paths" in healing and initiation rituals.)

In the East Indian Rig Veda, one of the oldest written Indo-European documents, there is a description of the stake to which the horse sacrifice is tethered. The pole is "brightly beribboned" with "colored banners streaming down from it."

The tradition of the Maypole may also draw from a second and even from a third source in the Eastern Mediterranean rites of spring, and in those of the Pre-Indo-European peoples of Europe. In the former, ribbon decorate effigies were carried on tall poles, and each pole-bearer was followed by a line of young girls dancing and singing. These rites were formalized and preserved in the Roman rites of Priapus and in the older, Pre-Indo-European strata behind the festivals of Dionysus in Greece. It seems that similar rituals were enacted in European villages as part or in addition to the dance of the Maypole.

The bare Maypole, in contrast to the May Larch Tree, seems to be a blending of these different lines. From the Mediterranean and the Pre-Indo-European sides it takes the bare form and Priapus' crown of flowers, and, in some areas, preserved his phallic effigy. From the ancient Indo-European line come the pole's central position within the circle of dancers, the long streamers, and the steps of the dance that weave them around the pole's trunk.

The R.D.N.A. has always held a Maypole dance. It is the Big Party of the year, and was once dubbed by the media "Pagan Christmas." We will be having a Maypole dance and celebration at the Orinda Grovesite, with food to follow. Isaac's group will also be holding a May Celebration on the weekend.

News of the Groves

Equinox at Orinda Grovesite saw the enactment of the traditional R.D.N.A. service for that holiday, followed by a sumptuous organic feast. The long tabled plans for leveling the Maypole Meadow were revived and the first two postholes begun. "What is this Reform Druidic obsession with digging pits in the ground?" at Orinda Site where I served my preceptorship, I learned Celtic history, meditation and posthole digging, or most precisely digging all kinds of holes and filling them back up again. For those of you who missed "the Army experience" you can get it now through the "church". The "daub and wattle" retaining walls which we made for a couple steps, as an experiment in this kind of construction, have held up well through the winter.

News from Post-Oak Proto-Grove

(Plus the rantings and preachings of T. Cross, including the debate and dialectic between purist Reconstructionist Druidism and Heterodox Eclecticism.)

Onomatophobia, onomaphobia—these are the fear of words and names. To be afraid of labeling oneself and other things about oneself is to be afraid to categorize things. To be afraid to refer to something in writing and any other communication is certainly a sign of a lack of self-confidence and certainly a lack of knowing whom one's self is. Honesty in the use of words, or phrases, that is, true communication is a very real and vital form of Life. It is, along with actions or deeds, a divine and human phenomenon that is important to the expression of love, of freedom, of joy, of thought and emotion. As the ancient Druids of Gaul were to say, according to Diogenes Laertius, "the gods must be worshipped, and no evil done, and manly behaviour maintained." And from the Colloquy of the Ancients (Acallamh na Senorach) Caelte told Patrick, that "truth in our hearts, strength in our arms, and fulfillment in our tongues" were the virtues of the pagan Irish.

The elder Druids, which we reconstructionists (such as me), accept as our forbearers both spiritually as well as in name, were deeply concerned with the speaking of truth—intellectual and spiritual honesty. The misuse of words is illusion—maya as the Indian Druids, the Brahmins, would call it. Perhaps, the whole universe, the cosmos, the order, as we have named it and as we have perceived it in our mythologies and metaphysics are all pure maya, and in order to transcend it we must get to know the illusion well enough to become disillusioned and then we can achieve the experience of deeply knowing and transcending the walls of illusion.

One cannot jump immediately from naiveté to transcendence without experiencing profound disillusionment first. But one cannot change the world without changing the self and to change the self is a process of transcendence, a process of disillusionment, of accepting the truth about one's self and the cosmic order. There is an eternal order to the external and internal world that does not evolve in any perceivable and contrived manner, the perceived evolution is within. The unperceived evolution is only identifiable by its results and not the process.

The gods of the ancient Celts are like those of the Vedic Indians, Germanic peoples, etc. because they evolved from their Indo-European forbearers as did the others, but the essential characteristics did not change by direct manipulation of the myth by people on the folk level. The Druids always strove to keep the tradition intact, to keep it pure from foreign influence, to be caretakers of tradition so that it would not be diluted by those who would use it for maya (for deception) to contrive to force it to fit some purely modern needs in their time.

The Druids were indeed the cognoscenti of the ancient Celts and not peasants practicing some deviant religion. Even the keepers of the traditions today, the seanchaithe of the Gaeltacht, tell the tales as they were told to them, that is they try to keep the tales word for word as they were transmitted, they avoid distorting and perverting the tradition...except, perhaps, a fabulist here and there, who may parody himself. Even those pagan cults which survived Christianity, were usually isolated and kept their traditions pure from some "new fangled" eclectic influence. By the way, any pagan cult of the British isles which professes to be a PAGAN religion or cult, is more than likely not to be any older than this century, but you can see the oldest pagan cults (which have more links with the ancient pagan religion) carrying on through the Catholic Church tradition (e.g. the holy wells, saints cults, relic cults, and other hagiographical sites and traditions). But it must be admitted that these are on a folk-level, not the products of the Celtic society of the time of the Druids. Many scholars have gone out into the field to work with the conservators of ancient tradition. The Irish Folklore Commission has collected hundreds of recordings of Irish seanchaith (shanachies—the traditional story-tellers) and published many transcriptions of the stories.

Similarly, the Parsis of India are continuers of Zoroastrian religion who fled Iran for Gujarat, India. There are still the Irani (Zoroastrians) of Iran, who knows what has happened to them since Fundamentalist Islam has risen there? But the mobads (the magi or priests) of the Parsis has not succumbed to eclecticism from the coming of western religious tourists who went there to study under them and over them in the twentieth century. Although, some theosophists did succeed in converting some Parsis to Theosophy, they were very few and the mobads or magi did not allow it to pervert their tradition which was handed down to them from the ancient magi (mobad is the direct linguistic descendant of magu-(patis) that ancient Persian word for a magus, our word is Latinized and Hellenized.)

Modern Parsis, though, do not inherit their religion through their genes; it's not a biological concept flowing through blood into the cerebrum. There are many people of Irish descent who could claim legitimate descent from the Druids, filidhe, and bards of Old Erin. If one has the last name of McNeilly, one may be a direct paternal descendent of an fili ("poet" "seer") since McNeilly derives from Mac an Fhileadh "son of the fili", and other names of Ireland and Scotland's Highlands derive from occupational surnames of the Druids and Bardic class. Some clans and septs were hereditary bards. I, myself, could be descended from ancient Irish satirists since my forefathers were the MacCrossans of Donegal, but my Welsh and Scottish forbearers do not have occupational surnames but other kinds of surnames and they are not paternal or patrilineal. However, these do not mean we are what our names mean any more than people named Smith are really smiths, or people named Baker are really bakers or people named Taylor are really tailors. Religion is not inherited genetically anymore than one's profession and is even less determined by birth than a name.

The Indo-Europeans were a culture which developed from a segmentary lineage (according to the French structural anthropologists) and this culture pattern is found among the Nuer of Africa who developed a very similar religion to that of the ancient Indo-Europeans. Their version of the sky-father (Taranus of the Gauls) is called Kwoth and his descendents the gods of heaven are their version of the Irish Tuatha de Danann, but they also have equivalents of the Fomoir and numerous other similarities. The genealogy of the gods and goddesses are a segmentary lineage, their culture is pastoral, and there are numerous other similarities. The metaphysics of the Druids of antiquity is more sophisticated than some "savage barbarianism" we get from hard primitivists and we need not romanticize them by elevating them to "Noble Savage" either.

Sure, they have much in common with shamans, but the term shaman has been so abused by popular usage that the term has become almost meaningless. Certainly they were not that much like classic shamans (as defined by Eliade, in his famous book) and only appear so on the most superficial level.

Do we want to popularize our Revivalist Druidism to some low proletariat level? Do we want to succumb to creating some mass-media hype version of Druidism for display of middle-class or proletariat deviance because we may feel alienated? Why not be rational and live according to what is honest and truthful? We do not need self-deception. We do not need to build walls by making our individual opinions become our dogmas. The strength of our commitment to our "revived" and Reformed Druidism is productive efforts to create and not stagnate into some disunified sects professing some fundamentalist, fragmented dogmas and retreating into non-communication, non-participation, into a darkness of "belly-aching", complaining, and alienation. We are not together as independent individuals battling for a monopoly of truth, but we are all part of the sacred cosmos. We cannot defy nature; it is impossible, for we destroy ourselves in the attempt. We must grow and allow evolution to take place by realizing that we are not mere individuals but a part of the whole cosmos and that we are interdependent upon each other and everything of all that is.

Every one of us, are a microcosm of the total order, we possess within ourselves the very physical elements of everything in the cosmos. The cosmos, is interdependent also, it and all depends upon us both as individuals and as a collective unity. The gods are within us. We need not look always for external manifestations of the divine and sacred. Every act and deed we perform either conforms to nature, is creative and productive or destructive and violent, both go together and both are part of the process of evolution. Our act of eating, learning, and working (to create) are sacrifices...they are acts of sacrifice and when things become used, when things are given or spent, they are sacrificed also. The food you eat has been sacrificed to you, and the water you drink has been sacrificed to you as an individual. The love you give to someone else is a sacrifice to that person. And as Queen Medb made clear (she being a euhemerized goddess of Connacht) as her expectation of a husband (a king married to her—the tutelary goddess), "without jealousy, without fear, without stinginess." Thus the embodiment of Royal Celtic and Druidic virtues in this triad includes generosity. The king sacrifices cattle to feed his people and himself and he is a sacrifice himself. He stands as the leader and patriarch married not only to his wife or wives but to his goddess who protects and serves the people (her children). The goddess is the land and people, the reign and the society and she is a part of the tribes' divine segmentary lineage, which itself is descended from the higher lineage of the Tuatha De Danann, the race of the gods of heaven and their lineage from the primordial family that rose from the oceans of chaos, from the fecundated darkness. Thus the appearance of mankind is itself from the same and everyone has a bit of all within.

Therefore, "I am..., I am..." spoke Amhairghin when he stepped out of the boat of the "Milesians" and consecrated the sacred land of Erin by proclaiming himself, by meditating on the sacrifice within. Donn, the Yama of the Irish pagans, is sacrificed and he dwells down into the otherworld where he built a home for mankind and his descendents. He was a sacrificial victim not so much placating the Tuatha De Danann, but as the ancestor (Dis Pater as Caesar would have called him) of mankind who prepared Teach Duinn for the others. There are many other themes in the early literature of the Irish and Welsh which correspond with other Indo-European themes right down to the detail: e.g. dogs which guard the entrances to the Otherworld/Underworld...cwn Annwn (Welsh), the cus Sidhe, Kerberos (Greek), Garm (old Norse), the Hounds of Yama (Vedic) and so forth.

We do not need to create an ad-hoc Druidism to fit our preconceived notions of religion and something else; we do not need to distort Celtic myths to fit a modern ideology created to fit our prejudices and our own individual experience. To do so, builds walls, breaks down communication, obstructs others' quest for truth, obscures learning and growth.

It is an obscurantist attitude to moan "there are things I am not meant to know" and to take to the fields as a neo-Luddite and curse the repressive socio-economic-political system or the establishment and get back in tune with nature is another thing. Sure and certainly we are not "the people of one god, one Truth, one Way" but we are not "a howling confabulation of extremes" either. And if we are, why should we be? It's something of a cop-out to merely point out that we are diverse in our attitude and opinions and not still grow like the branches on the tree, both in sharing a common knowledge, some common thread, some ground that we may share, that we may grow together? The dialectic of various opinions may grow to a higher level of unity when we are well informed and can speak in similar terms. We need not be some pluralistic society of people with no direction. We can have our philosophical pluralists, dualist, triplist, etc. We can be all of these, and we can transcend mere complaining and semantic arguing, we can transcend the proletarianization of our religious and philosophic ideals. In short, we can deal with things on a much higher level.

Scholarship is important to achieving these means, because it is not mere "book learnin'," [it] is an attitude which opens doors and enlightens and if one has trouble with reading and comprehending the materials, then one must have patience and courage. We should not feel that we must compete with each other, that is not the purpose of learning. Not to be clever and show-off, but to take away darkness and help other to learn also. For everyone may benefit when one more person takes the time to learn something new. We are all interdependent and so the more one individual knows, the better is the world. When one person refuses to learn, he or she keeps the totality down, or that is, he or she makes it more difficult for others. It slows down progress when many do not make the effort to allow progression. We all can change the things we see around us that we do not like. Take action for positive change and not merely complain about it! Study is more than formulating theories, scholarship is more than mere perusal of old manuscripts, it is testing those theories, it is going out and practicing what you preach.

The higher your standards are, the more difficult it can be to practice what you preach. But going out to preach what you practice is another thing, and it is quite easy to do if you make no effort toward growing. Still, you can be an instrument of deception and not practice what you preach because you are not the kind of person you're preaching at. We know exactly about those famous men who don't practice what they preach because they're not the kind of people they're preaching to! I needn't mention them by name because there are many of them in America and they are frequently or constantly in the public eye.

Reconstructionist Druids endeavor to reconstruct what was lost and use that as a foundation on which to build, it is an old time-tested foundation and well-grounded in the past. We do not seek to slip into some time-warp to become living anachronisms. There's the S.C.A. for that kind of fun! We, however, take the identity of Druidism seriously enough to make it work, to create something that actually owes something to the elder Druids besides a mere word or name. We are not ashamed to use labels, names or words; we do not suffer from onomatophobia or onomaphobia. We do not commit human sacrifices or go out and play ancient Gaul in the woods. We do enjoy ourselves. Jim C. is a musician in his spare time, Jim W. does Tai Chi, Chas. H. is in Drama and art, we have many friends and acquaintances from all ages and all walks of life. I, Tom Cross, myself happen to be an English teacher, a literary person and so naturally I like writing different things. This piece and other pieces for the Missal-Any is just one facet and subject of which I like to take a little time to write about. There are other bits and pieces I write, some fiction, some poetry, some non-fiction. This is why we differ from say a Wiccan coven or a Hermetic Lodge, or New Age networks for centering or trance channeling. We are not all of one mind, one way, one truth, but we share enough interests to talk, to meditate, and have some enjoyment of life.

I have friends who do not belong to the neo-pagan movement at all, who are Agnostic, Taoist, and Roman Catholic, and we respect each other's religions and some of them know more about the Celts and the Druids than many neo-pagans simply because they have read my stuff (including stuff I've read and written) as well as hearing it from me (when I show them the latest piece of literature I've read or bought). I am the mere spokesman here because I like to write while others do not or prefer to remain anonymous. One Jewish friend of mine likes to debunk falsehood and fallacies and for a while we were making it a game and running gag—it got me into the habit myself and I use it as part of my thinking habits. So while we look to the ancient Druids for inspiration, we are also very tolerant of other's opinions and we have respect for other people's rights. We do not believe ourselves pious ones, as braggarts and dogma-mongers—we are not evangelists or some Gospel of the Druids, but we have an interest in the hermeneutics of Celticism. What is wrong with that? What is wrong with reconstructing Druidism in this regard? If no one is interested in hearing anymore from me or us, let me know immediately and we shall not waste our time anymore.

On the Spring Equinox Diatribe

Why does Albion think that a religion should evolve and grow away from scholarship and towards some opinions unsupported by facts or contradictory of facts? The fact is that the Celtic myths were composed by a scholarly class, the intelligentsia made up of bards, filidhe and druids, not by mere eclectic pluralism. Why does Albion bring up some boasts about learning from some "hereditary" pagan group or about "Native-American Spirituality" and then "humble" himself with an appeal to plain folks (false modesty) about "I do not think of myself as a scholar.” The last statement is certainly partly true, what he truly is (as far as I am concerned) is a scholar manqué—a half-hearted scholar who hasn’t the interest to carefully read and utilize the materials he has requested.

If he were only using the data for his personal use and distorting it, I would not protest, but since he is putting his misrepresentations before many others—I must protest strongly. I am vehemently opposed to deliberate misrepresentation of the tradition for the purpose of changing it to suit an individual’s personal biases and prejudices and to deliberately pervert it. As much as he has said, he is not promoting evolution or anyone getting to know his or her higher self—but rather to close people’s minds to the possibilities offered by a reasonable and competent study of the ancient tradition. He is promoting darkness, not enlightenment.

While Albion uses the genetic fallacy saying he’s a Celt simply because he MAY be descended from Celts, and saying that he has studied them (that’s questionable to a degree) he appeals to authority (fallacy) by saying he’s privy to some other traditions unrelated. Scholars have better methods than mere fallacious reasoning to find the truth and not just self-congratulatory appeals to folk wisdom and hearsay but rather documentation. Albion speaks for himself only as an individual (this I can say is his only defense), but somehow he expects that everyone should agree with his opinions because he appeals to the crowd by saying “it is highly doubtful we could go back to” wishing to “see Life (sic) thrive and our planet survive.” Is he running for some office? Certainly he is right in saying that “being an ecologist is part (my underscore) of being a pagan.”

Albion suffers from onomatophobia when he is not fond of titles because he has a problem with words and categories. He doesn’t want to label anything cause that means he would have to express himself, that he would have to define things and categorize them; which is something he’d rather not do because that means getting to know something about them. Also I might add, the avoidance of labeling things by many people, is simply to avoid giving them any meaning so that they can mean whatever they want them to at will and whimsy.

We were friends and he originally wrote to me asking for information on the ancient Celts, but unfortunately he’s given me more reasons for mistrust because of his insincerity (pretending to understand the data when he didn’t even read it) then taking what little he remembered and distorting it before our fellow pagans. Albion had the data that would reconstruct the ancient Druids’ wisdom right under his nose, but he ignored it because it required some intellectual thinking and an imagination as well as some difficult studying (philology, a bit of structural anthropology, comparative mythology, etc.) If I had known that this stuff was too difficult for him, I would not have wasted my time trying to provide him with guidelines, but he led me to believe otherwise.

Albion’s Response

April 21, 1987

I came to the pagan faith because generally speaking, it is more tolerant than any other form of religion or spirituality I have found.

But gee, Tom Cross may have changed my mind.

“Promoting darkness” ay?

This tidbit comes to you from one who is supposedly “very tolerant of other’s opinions,” could’ve fooled me.

I stand by what I wrote last issue.

Paganism, as I see it, is made up of many different strands of thought, and if Tom Cross doesn’t like that or can’t deal with that – that is his problem, not mine.

It is a fact that the pagan faith survived in the British Isles, it was diluted or changed to a certain extent by folkways or ceremonial magic, or both, but it did survive. There really are hereditary pagans in the British Isles who practice a religion, that has survived for a very, very long time.

But let me ask the readership to judge the psychic quality of Tom Cross’ letters in this issue and the last issue of A Druid Missal-Any.

Pagans should be beyond this brutal, personalized, backstabbing that goes beyond defense to simply being hurtful and attacking someone because they are different from you, or hold a different opinion than yours.

The views expressed by Tom Cross in print are tame compared to at least one of the letters I received through the mail.

If this was the work of “born-again” Christians or someone from the Nazi Party or the Ku-Klux Klan, I could perhaps understand—but this is a person who calls himself a “pagan”, this implies (in my mind at least), some sort of tolerance for other’s views.

Once again, I stand corrected.

I have always like the Missal-Any because of its scholarship and approach, this sort of b.s. cheapens and degrades the quality of the Missal-Any, in my opinion.

I do care deeply for the Truth (in all of its forms), and I will not stand for someone saying that I don’t. There is not one way to the Gods, but many ways, even in the Celtic Tradition, and my suggestion is that Tom Cross meditate upon that.

If I could close with a quote from an earlier form of Revived Druidism: “Truth against the World”.

Summer Solstice Essay:

Danu and Diana

By Emmon Bodfish

Midsummer Solstice, one the four minor High Days of the Reformed Druid Calendar, is associated with the Celtic Goddess Danu, Mother of the Gods, the Tuatha de Danann. She is particularly associated with rivers, and rivers from the Don in Russia to the Don in Scotland are thought to be named for Her. She is probably the same figure as the Irish Goddess, Anu, and the Breton's Ana. Roman Diana and Greek Artemis may be other cognates of this Pan-Indo-European Deity. These theories are based on the study of word origins, and on the witness of Gallo-Roman writers of the period who noted the similarities in character, rituals, and Seasons of Worship of Danu and Diana. These primary historical sources, written when the Celtic religion was still practiced in Gaul, corroborate the evidence from linguistic studies. There is an opinion about that Danu was not an important Deity, or even that the Celts lacked a Mother-Goddess figure, but I can find no hard evidence in Philology, history, or Celtic Mythology for this point of view.

Like Roman Diana, Danu's totem is the boar, an animal also associated with a female agricultural deity in the Balkans. Danu, like Frigga of the Germans, presides over marriage and fertility, and the luckiness of June weddings may be a distant memory of her festivities. Mugwort is Her sacred flower, an herb also sacred to Roman Diana; the ripe ear of grain is Her token. (This fits T. Edwards' theory that the Christian Madonna was modeled after (to co-opt?) the various Mother-Grain Goddesses of pagan Europe.) On the Isle of Man it is customary to wear a sprig of mugwort to the Midsummer dance, and in England, placing mugwort under her pillow is said to bring a young woman dreams of her future husband.¹ In Scotland, there are all night bonfires, song fests, and dances for the young, unmarried people of the villages.

This is the morning on which the Sun used to rise over the heel stone at Stonehenge, thus beginning the new season in the Megalithic calendar. It no longer rises at that point owing to the procession of the Earth's axis, but celebrations are held there, anyway.

The Druids did NOT build Stonehenge. It antedates their arrival in Britain by centuries. It was William Stuckeley in 1717 who mislocated the Druids there. He did some of the best archeological field work of his day, but his theorizing later wildly outstripped his data. The mistake was an honest one, however, considering what was known in his time. He showed that the stones were not a memorial to King Arthur nor a Roman temple, the two then common theories. He was the first to establish the monument as definitely pre-Roman. The only knowledge of pre-Roman Britain he had came from Roman and Greek writers of the Classical Period. They said that Britain was inhabited by Celts whose priests were the Druids. So, if the stones were older than any Roman constructions, Stuckeley reasoned, they must have been put there by Druids. He knew of no other candidates. But in the last two centuries, archeology has provided us with many, even too many other possibilities. The currently favored candidates are the early Neolithic farmers of Natufian stock, a longheaded, slender, fine-boned people who inhabited the Salisbury area from 2900-2500 B.C. coinciding with the most accurate modern date for the first cycle of building at Stonehenge. A larger boned hardier people later took over the monument and set up the Blue Stones, but they too had disappeared before the arrival of the Celts around 480 B.C.

This is not to say that the Celts did not take cognizance of the huge stones. They worked monuments of other prehistoric peoples into their mythology and song. Numerous Bardic compositions refer to the Sidh Mounds of Ireland and the Carnes of Scotland as sacred places and the long abandoned abodes of the Gods. They may have done the same for Stonehenge, but the English traditions and Bardic works were almost all lost, while the Irish are among the best preserved of any oral lore.

"Behold the Sidhe before your eyes.

It is manifest to you that it is a king's mansion,
Which was built by the firm Dagda.

It is a wonder, a court, and admirable hill."

"The Sidhe of Donegal" a seminar by Prof. Duran.

Two or more different groups of peoples, sharing the same or similar astronomically oriented beliefs, contributed to the five cycles of construction and reconstruction at Stonehenge. Theirs was a fairly sophisticated culture for the time. They knew that the Solstices, eclipses of the Moon, and the courses of the stars were regular predictable events. Their stone moving techniques were on a par with the times. Though not aligned accurately enough for an "observatory" in the modern sense, the stones can serve as a calendar rectifier, an eclipse predictor, and, of course, as a ritual site for religious ceremonies. But what those religions were must remain a matter of conjecture. Clearly they had something to do with sunrise, Midsummer Solstice, moonrise, and lunar eclipses, but what they meant, and what the people did there, is probably not recoverable. As Clannad sings "Forgotten is the race that no one knows."²

¹A friend of mine tried the experiment of putting mugwort under her pillow, but reported she had no dreams at all. "I guess I'm just going to stay single." She is till fancy-free three years later. If anyone wants to try this, you can get mugwort in most herb shops. Send in your results and we'll publish them for Lughnasadh.

The Heathen on the Heath: Praising the Gods of May

In any Neopagan Druid service, we pause self-consciously to remind ourselves that we are standing in one limited spot, using limited names to offer the limitless Gods a passel of praise and sacrifice that They don't actually need.

In Beltane's disorderly abundance this reminder becomes especially poignant. Where is need of any kind in all of this? Fullness approaches, and our need is for union, for celebration: to be drawn into the riotous family of nature. Beltane is a love story, and I shall go a-Maying.

Shall I call you Earth Mother? Talithu? Nerthus? Ina? In all languages You have a name. I have trusted the seed to its rebirth in the rich death-and-life cycle of the loam; the plant has risen. Someday I shall be part of this, in body as well as in spirit. Is composting and mulching and planting and watering praise? Is gratitude praise?

Shall I call you Danu, Wellspring, Mother of Gods and of Mysteries? Mysteries are not that-which-man-was-not-to-know, but that which lures the mind beyond its depth, lest it grow too stolid to swim. Is it praise to seek our origins, to stare into the past and future, to revel in identity? Is it praise to be ourselves?

I begged my vision through night's chill, and morning's first ray was a kiss. Belanos, Lovelight, Seed-father; what is my praise but desire? The praise of green grass means the same, but love does not judge.

An antlered Cernunnos, may we amuse You! Ever the joke is on us, Lord of Beasts and of deep woods, dark fear and bright mockery. By green bough and animal-cry I know I shall live and lust and die in good company, but praise? You've heard me say things less polite.

My flower garden belongs to Rhiannon, for what She has taught me. In birdsong and sweet scents nature may praise the wise Horsewoman, but I can only learn. Let there be forgetfulness of that cruelty too often called justice: honor is a fresh blooming wild flower, and valor a note of music. Is a life praise? I cannot know while I am living it.

Like children, we praise greedily, reaching up for notice and acceptance as a baby demands a hug. Our Gods are Mothers, Fathers, Lovers, Teachers; our gratitude quivers with wants yet unspoken. Like children, we have little to offer but ourselves and our works, in the hopes that our arch-Parents will gather us to Them as sentimentally as we do our own children. (All the while trying Their patience by attempting to shove our siblings out of the way, and hog all the attention for ourselves!) Is sharing praise, or service, or respect for fellow-creatures?

Surely we do not worship because we think our guaranteed annual year depends on it. And if we worship for the sake of the Gods, what shall we say to the Gods we do not know? The people of Thor offered wary respect to the White Christ, until Christian priests rejected, on Christ's behalf, the brotherhood of Thor. Then might Thor's people denounce Christ as a Wimp; but never did they take the view that what they did not know did not exist. Defining 'unproven' as 'false', or 'myth' as 'fabrication', or 'unknown' as 'nonexistent' is a popular failing of the current scientific establishment; in seeking our own science, we must remember that the modern mind is trained to the square corners and shut doors of monotheism. Though pre-existing knowledge is there for us, we are denied the cheap tricks of Central Authority. Do we worship in ritual? And what is our ritual: the mutable traditions of a farmer in the garden? A window opening on the visions of our forebears? Or a door to shut between emotion and thought, magic and work, religion and real life? Lugh help us; it's not an easy path.

We seek the path of heroes, for the modesty of the monotheist is another cop-out we don't get. Saints are safe in Heaven, beyond the reach of our kind, but heroes are meant to be emulated--though they may shine brighter out of antiquity, all their awkward moments over and one with. We need only remember that some being or circumstance will eventually play Emer to our Cuchullain, and require us to place money where mouth is.

So be splendid in the splendor of May, fellow wedding-guests! If our praise is presumptuous and our dreaming extravagant, only look around: with gaudy flower fields, flooding light, and leaping beasts, we have a fine example.

Salacious Spring Meditation:

Make sure the rigor of your mind is not rigor mortis, but the other kind!

The Heathen on the Heath: The Gift of Horses

I invoke that portion of compost, which is the gift of horses.

Do you guys know how many times I've rewritten this #!%?! thing? I think we can settle down and admit that the Missal-Any has become a new format: Interactive Nonfiction. Is there some Hitchhiker's Guide to the minority-theological Galaxy? Or are we headed for the Snit at the End of the Universe? Stay tuned...

This is the season of battle; the Sun stands ringed by hero-light, facing the confrontation He cannot win. In the summer blaze of midsummer, YES!, we stand cocky and feisty at His side. The day is long and summer just begun—will it not last forever? By August, each warm hour is precious: our words and deeds will echo with the gentleness of farewell. The (Carleton) traditional services chant our glee at the conquest of day over night, but most of us have our moments of rooting for Pryderi. We are in our glory, our attitude of immortality unsmirched, yet we can still take comfort in saying "This, too, shall pass."

We (genetic and/or emotional) Celts are historically marked as argumentative cusses, as witness the forms of lampoon, rant, and challenge-in-verse. Boldness is our legacy, and defensiveness our last year's garbage.

What is the appropriate channeling of our quibblesome nature? I, for one, would not go back to my pacifist beginnings; I have little respect for the tameness of a toothless dog. My most honored comrades are dangerous folk, controlled by volition rather than weakness. When people are scarce enough to be a resource rather than a nuisance, the strong can stop apologizing. We don't sheathe our blades in the neighbor's house out of fear, but because we respect our neighbors.

Also, if we love, we are having too much fun to care overmuch what our beloveds can do to us...

As a religious minority, we are an automatic rural neighborhood. We have our local characters, but let the stranger say, "Do you know that nut-case?" We will quite likely say, "Oh, he/she's okay once you know him/her," and find that, against the perspective of the rest of the world, we mean it. I know, I know; you'll all howl that this kind of neighborhood loyalty is not something you reserve for Druids or extend to everyone who takes that name. That's true. My primary clan relationships are likely to differ from Tom's, or Albion's, or Mad Sweeney's, and a good number of the members of my clan or clans do not name Neopagan Druidism as their religious orientation. They are all, however, joined to me in avowed and reliable goodwill, and respectful of the orientations I profess. So okay, I am available to my own clansfolk before I would be available to Tom, or Albion, or any other Druids that I don't personally know. But I am available (willingly, and in good faith) to my Druish brethren and sistern before I am (willingly, and in good faith) available to the mainstream authorities. I assume that we squabble en tutoyant, and will still be there for each other if that is necessary. (And yes, you can call me on that. Box 215, Myers Flat, CA 95554).

This doesn't mean you have to agree with me, or approve of me. Your minds, especially in devotion to the Gods, are your own.

Fear of names? Sometimes. What do I most fear to name: my Gods, or myself? My dealing with some Gods are embarrassingly private. And I myself possess a name that will call me from sleep, or draw my energy to the user of it; I don't give that to just anybody.

But Tom and Albion have boldly "named" themselves in these pages, to a degree that I have not. Ergo, the Summer Statement: Here am I, a woman 35 years old, attempting to farm a hillside steading in southern Humboldt while making a living as a freelance reporter and general odd-jobber (currently, selling cherry cider and produce to tourists.) The untidy generosity of my physique bears witness to my undisciplined nature, but I'm still pretty functional.

I write—basically, anything that anyone will print, and a lot of things they won't. Most dear to me of all our lore are the poetic, emotionally-charge stories of Erin. Like Albion, I was once a Quaker. My religious practice contains little of formal observance, but I operate under a number of what I see as my own geasa and obligations. (Laugh if you want; sometimes I do, too.) I use magic only as a last-ditch adjunct to doing my damndest on the physical plane, and only for certain purposes. I honor ethics and deplore morality. My greatest weakness is a reflexive snapping and snarling at what I see as elitism or authoritarianism. I once beamed a wife-beater with my purse, but I am not reliably or consciously brave. I'm a solitary 3rd, married, with a 7-year-old son who lives with me full-time and a 9-year-old daughter who visits.

Tom, Albion, I offer this: who among us has the power to be a threat to the others? (Hopefully none of us is such a slob as to throw energy around as we argue, instead of grounding it out!) Both "promoting darkness" and "Ku Klux Klan" show a fine sense of drama, but you know effing well that if the storm troopers showed up looking for any of us tomorrow, the rest would like like right valiant rugs to cover his/her ass. So will you guys kiss & make up, or at least wait for the bell?!!

Calendar

Summer Solstice will occur at 3:11 Pacific Daylight Time on June 21, 1987. The festivities will begin at 1:00 P.M. which is Solar Noon

Lucid Dream Project

Headed by Dr. Stephen La Berge at the Sleep Research center at Stanford University School of Medicine, this vanguard project is targeting the development of an easy, inexpensive device that can be used by anyone wishing to induce lucid dreams (being aware you are dreaming while dreaming.) Dr. La Berge believes the lucid dream state can be used to facilitate creative problem-solving, enhance self-confidence, improve mental, emotional and perhaps physical health, and lead to higher-level consciousness. How to Join

What is Reformed Druidism?

Emmon Bodfish
616 Miner Road
Orinda, CA

Guidelines for Visitors and Newcomers

1. Reformed Druid Services schedule to mesh with the movement of the Sun and the Stars. They must start on time, such as at Solar Noon, when the Sun is highest in the sky, or at Sunset. Please be on time. If you are late, stand quietly outside the circle; please don't interrupt.
2. The Service is not a party; partying is afterwards. While R.D.N.A. is not grimly solemn, Druids are serious in their religious purpose. If you are not seriously interested in spiritual development or meditative skills, then Druidism, R.D.N.A. system, is not for you.
3. Once the Service begins, focus. Talking, joking, laughing etc. are rude. They break the concentration of others and prevent the Grove from achieving its goal. If you are drunk, stoned, or uncontrollably disruptive, you will be asked to leave.
4. While everyone is not a scholar, you are expected to learn some historical background about the Ancient Druids.
5. Ranks earned in other religions don't "count" in R.D.N.A. There is no fast way up or around the hierarchy. We are in no way connected with any other Neopagan religion, Wiccan, Craft or the secular, charitable organization style "Druids".
6. If what you really want are "Sex 'n Drugs 'n Rock 'n Roll," Druidism, again, is not for you. You might consult the San Francisco Sex Information Switchboard (415-665-7300) who deal with that sort of networking. Neither do we offer instant magic, curses, nor predictions about the Stock Market.

Enough Said

With thanks to Selena Fox's "Guidelines"

Now, if you're still with us, How to Join.

Read the basic Tenets and see if you agree with them. Read over the Outline of the Foundation of the Fundamentals.

To become a full member of the Reformed Druids, you must attend a Service or a Grove, during the summer half of the year, state that you want to join, state that you agree with the Basic Tenet, "Nature is Good," when you are asked this by the Archdruid, and share with the Grove a sip of the Waters-of-Life. Or you may be accepted by a Solitary Third Order (clergy) Druid who performs the standard Service and shares with you the Waters-of-Life.

If neither of these opportunities are available to you, you can become a Proto-grove member until you can meet an ordained Druid or attend an active Grove. Perform the proto-grove Service yourself. Tell Deity(s) that you agree with the basic Tenets. Let us know and we will announce your new Proto-grove in the Missal-Any. To wiseacres who only want to see their names in print, and so send us fallacious Proto-Grove applications, we leave them to Cernunos, Sucellos, and their consciences.

For a copy of the Proto-grove service, send us two or three stamps and an envelope, or $1.00 (We are on budgets, too.)

Now the Basic Tenets of Reformed Druidism are these:

The object of the search for religious truth, which is a universal and a never-ending search, may be found through the Earth Mother, which is Nature; but this is one way, yea, one way among many.

And great is the importance, which is of a spiritual importance, of Nature, which is the Earth Mother; for is one of the objects of Creation, and with it we do live, yea, even as we do struggle through life are we come face to face with it.

Nature is good!

And the second is like unto the first:

Nature is good!

The following is from:

The Druid
Chronicles (Evolved)

Outline of the Foundation of Fundamentals

Being:

a brief catalogue of the major quasi-metaphysical-theological conclusions which may be abstracted from and by the application of the Reformed Druid point of view to questions of ultimate relevance (in outline form).

THE THREE PILLARS

(or treasures, or paths, or baskets, or roots, or branches, or wondrous illuminations)

I. The Relentless Rebellion (threefold)

A. The categorical If

No intellectually honest mind can long remain so termed unless it is willing to submit all things to rigorous examination, even the most sacred provinces. Blind faith is no faith; it is blindness.

B. The Principle of Non-Confirmation

Applying rigorous scrutiny to the world's religions, we find, especially in western form, universal claims to exclusiveness; yet none submits any more proof of its claim than an appeal to faith. Logically, therefore, all are equal.

C. The Principle of Non-Conformation

In the face of the insoluble problem of selecting the "one true faith" most people conform to one of two patterns:

1. The True Believer embraces the faith of his fathers wholeheartedly and unquestioningly, fearing to face the logical possibility (probability?) that he is wrong.

2. The Non-Believer rejects all faiths out of hand, fearing that he might prove himself a fool by choosing the wrong one.

Reformed Druids reject the necessity of conforming to either of these patterns based on fear. True spiritual growth exists only in the Relentless Rebellion against petrified norms.

II. The Paths of Paradox (also threefold)

A. The Ceremonial Syndrome

Man is incurably finite. He cannot conceive of spiritual activity except in terms of ritualistic hocus-pocus. But ritual must be carefully selected or it will independently acquire magical properties of its own. Ritual properly constitutes a springboard for the spirit only. Oak worship is ideal for this purpose (see also III).

B. The Primacy of Ambiguity

True spiritual growth consisting of personal effort and rebellion, Reformed Druidism must remain devoid of orthodoxy. All writings must be ambiguous and non-final (present dissertation included).

C. The Principle of Non-Confirmation (rears its ugly head again)

You'll get no pat answers here. There being no logical basis for the acceptance or denial of any faith, Reformed Druidism confirms nothing (including Reformed Druidism). You're welcome to, but you're on your own.

III. The Last Refuge (whadaya know...threefold!)

A. The Noble Fivefold Formulation

1. The Nature of Life

Life is defined as the unity of the spiritual (Be'al) and the material (the Earth-Mother). Without the material the spiritual has no form; without the spiritual the material is dead.

2. And Man?

Man, as a living animal, ideally consists of both material and spiritual.

3. And Man?

Man is unique. This is because he has self-awareness. He passes from self-awareness through self-centeredness to self-importance, thence to self-isolation, resulting in self-misery.

4. Unity for All and All for Unity

Man's self-importance cuts him off from the life-giving benefits of unity with the spirit and Nature (the material). Druids sometimes call unity Awareness. It is the object of religion to restore unity; most concentrate on the direct attainment of spiritual unity, ignoring (or rejecting) the material.

5. Back to Nature

Druids (at least some of them) believe that a good approach is to first restore material unity. Having broken down part of the barrier around the self, the rest should then be easier. Hence, Druid Nature worship: the ideality of going to worship oaks.

B. The Basic Tenets

The Basic Tenets of Reformed Druidism, which form the basis (believe it or not) for the preceding discussion, are found in the Constitution of the Reformed Druids [at Carleton], and in another form in the Book of the Law in The Druid Chronicles (Reformed) [of the Foundation]. They are the quintessences of Druidism, such that a person need accept nothing else and still become a Reformed Druid. They are here presented in their most concentrated form:

1. Nature is good!

And the second is like unto the first:

2. Nature is good!

C. The Last Refuge

It is simple to grind out these systems. It is the expected thing to do. Perhaps it is useful. It is meaningless!

It is simple to sit on the Hill of the Three Oaks and look at the pretty blue sky. That, too, can be meaningless!

It is not so simple to stand alone under the pretty blue sky and watch all your preconceived systems come tumbling down. But when they come tumbling down, there is a refuge: in Nature. There one may find a clearing of the head, a freedom from stagnant forms, a beginning. (The end)

News of the Groves

Announcement:

Stacey and Rapheal have applied to take Second Orders, with the Orinda Group in the R.D.N.A. context. Their requests have been accepted by the two Third Order Druids and the ceremonies will take place in the next six to eight weeks.

Birch Grove

Joan Carruth and Joe Lambert will be getting handfasted at the Rites of Spring Festival in Massachusetts this May. Joan is the Archdruid of Birch Grove, in Vermont. Anyone interested in R.D.N.A. style Druidism in the New England area can contact them here, through the Missal-Any. (No, we don't give out people's addresses without their permission. A sad-but-necessary precaution.)

The Feast

Lughnasadh 1987

Volume 11 Number 5

Lughnasadh Essay: Lugh, Balor, and Belenos

By Emmon Bodfish

ughnasadh, festival of the funeral games of Lugh the Sun God, or, given by Lugh in honor of his father the Sun, depending on your tradition. It is the beginning of the Celtic harvest season, and is often called festival of the First Fruits. Lugh, from the same root word as light and luminous, is one the younger generations of gods in the Celtic pantheon. The other Solar Deities, Belenos and Balor, the good and the bad aspects of the sun, respectively, are not only pictured as older, mature male figures, but are traceable to the Early Indo-European stratas, in the Eastern European homelands. But Lugh, as the young Shining One, didn't appear until the Celts had settled Gaul and melded with the Celto-Ligurians and the Pre-Indo-European "Atlantic Wall" cultures which they encountered there, circa 600 B.C. Urnfields replaced passage graves, and typical Celtic farming practices were begun. When the Celto-Ligurians had arrived, a thousand years earlier, there had been no sharp cultural discontinuity, as they blended with the Pre-Indo-Europeans, who continued to build their dolmens and passage graves. Pre-Indo-European traditions were therefore still strong when Celtic Lugh arose and began to replace Belenos as the popular Solar Figure. His ascendant, youthful, headlong character may have been influenced by the Young Year God image common in the Pre-Indo-European cultures of the Mediterranean and Atlantic coasts. This archetype has been traced by G. Racheal Levy from the Balkans, to Minoan Greece, along the Mediterranean Coast to France and north to Normandy.

Lugh's best Indo-European cognate is Apollo of the Greeks. The Greek religion was strongly influenced in other ways by the beliefs and Deities of the Pre-Indo-European people they conquered and absorbed. Odin, Lugh's Northern cognate, has a much less Solar character. He is more a Shaman, knowledge-bringer, and Divine Wayfarer, going among mortals in disguise. He is not a martial figure; He is not youthful. Lugh is the patron of the harvest, which in Celtic countries began at Lughnasadh. Apollo was worshipped in the Peloponnesus as a god of vegetation, giving Him another link with the "young Year God" of the Western Neolithic. From a magical lawgiver, healer, transformer archetype, which He shares with Odin and Varuna, He evolved, partly through absorption of the Young Year God, into the youthful solar Deity of the later Celtic myths.

In R.D.N.A. traditions, anyone who has a garden, grows anything, etc. should save their first picked produce of the summer season, and bring it or part of it to Lughnasadh Service, to be offered up in the altar fire, with hopes of prosperity in years to come.

Calendar

Astronomical Lughnasadha will occur 8:17 P.M. Pacific Standard Time. Traditional Lughnasadha, Sun at 15 degrees Leo, will have occurred less than three hours previously, at 5:23.

A Contrary Opinion

Getting Back to Nature This Summer

The heat, the cold, the work, the constant struggle, the hunger, the dirt, the sleeping on the ground, the sickness, the disasters, the pain, and most of all the round-the-clock anxiety and fear, will make you so glad to get back to the relatively palatial environs of your third floor cold water walk-up, that you won't believe the luxury you've been living in all your life.

News of the Groves

Stacey and Rapheal took Second Orders at the Orinda Grove Site on July 26. The sacrifices burned brightly and both candidates were accepted. This is the first giving of Orders of any rank at which this Solitary Third Order Druid has officiated. Walking in the woods ahead of time, long thoughts came while selecting the plants for the sacrifice. Does death occur when one of our patron Deities chooses us for their sacrifice? The Ancient Sacrificers entrusted their messages to the soul of the white bull and dispatched him to the Other World. I choose a sprig of bay laurel, an oak leaf and a goldenrod flower.

Plants are always being sacrificed for us, for our lives. Every meal is a sacrifice. This idea of exchange was a strong part of the Paleo-Pagan's conception of the sacrifice. A life was given that the sacrificer's life might be spared, or that his people might continue to live and prosper. One of our members said that our sacrifices "aren't real sacrifices" because we offer us plants instead of animals. (She wants blood and gore?) We are the Reformed Druids of North America. The Reform strictly forbade human (and animal) sacrifice in 1963. Eating animal meat is not forbidden, though. But the problem is still there, even for us vegetarians, we always have to take life in order to sustain our own. This is what anthropologists like Rasmussen and G.R. Levy studying the opinions and theologies of modern Stone Age peoples have called the "universal ethical dilemma."¹

Only green plants are truly "a-hinsa" or harmless, and guiltless in this matter. All of the rest of us are parasites and have no choice but to live off of them. They are in this sense the highest moral beings on the plant and thus worthy objects of veneration and worship as every Druid knows.

Now after a two or three thousand year sidetrack into more superficial ethical problems:

“Who owns what?”

“Who gets to boss whom?”

etc.; we are coming back to struggle with this fundamental dilemma again. By “we” I mean the western Indo-Europeans. The Brahmins of India never lost sight of it, nor did their Buddhist descendents. Animal Rights organizations, Gaia Principal groups and ecological consciousness are becoming common fare. A Cultural-Materialist friend of ours wishes to inject here: “When people get enough to eat, then they start to think about what they’re eating.” “Stone Age level peoples think about it,” I reply, “They just can’t do anything about it.” We may be able to...

After vegetarianism, I suppose the ultimate liberation from this dilemma will come when we achieve artificial photosynthesis on a practical scale and can make our own food from sunlight. That, if it ever happens,² it would be a change as profound as the Agricultural Revolution, in altering our basic relationship to other living things. But this time we would be moving in the opposite direction, hopefully with more benign results. Futuristic speculations? Just are some more of the meanings of the sacrifice.

¹Rasmussen quotes an Eskimo shaman on the subject of sacred animal paintings:

“We make them new bodies to replace the bodies we have taken.” “The greatest peril of life is that human food consists entirely of souls: all the beings that we must kill and eat, all those that we have to strike down and destroy to make clothes for ourselves...must be pacified lest they revenge themselves on us for taking away their bodies.”

For similar statements from Australians, Malaysians, and Siberians, see G.R. Levy, J. Halifax, and A.A. Popov, respectively.

²I wouldn’t want to think of it happening too soon, as I’d hate to think of putting any more power in the hands of the present technocracy with its Nature-hating consciousness and its evil genius for turning anything to a destructive use. Alternatives to the present Big Brother and Star Wars mind-set are well set out by Shulamith Firestone in “Feminism and Ecology”, and by many others. For a copy of the “Druid Book Lists” send us a SASE.

Environmentalists yesterday ended a consumer boycott against Burger King after the fast-food chain said it would stop buying the beef of cattle ranchers who are destroying tropical rain forests in Central America.

“Two-thirds of Central America’s rain forests have been destroyed since World War II. The primary cause has been the conversion of rain forests to cattle pastures,” Rainforest Action Network director Randy Hayes said at a San Francisco press conference.

Burger King received hundreds of letters after the boycott was begun in the spring of 1986. The company formed a management task force to study the problem, said Ann Kokenge, a spokeswoman for the nation’s No. 2 fast food hamburger chain.

Hayes said, “We applaud their action. They made a responsible decision.”

Fall Equinox Essay: Sirona

By Emmon Bodfish

all Equinox, a minor High Day in the Druid calendar. The days are getting short again and the harvest is in full swing. This is the time of Cernunnos, and the other Deities of night, of the Season of Sleep, and the Otherworld. The Celts, as far as we know, did not have a specific lunar deity. (I often get asked for the name of a Moon Goddess.) In researching this I have come across the interesting information on the origins of the Goddess Sirona. Her name comes from the same Indo-European root as “star,” although She was later associated with the source of the river Seine, a spring where a shrine to Her was located.

As the Celts moved out of the Halstatt homeland in Austria and across Europe, they re-named rivers and springs for their Goddesses, perhaps merging them with local protective Earth Goddesses. A major shrine to Sirona, located at a spring in Hochscheid has been both traced in Roman reports and verified archeologically. This shrine was associated with healing, and Sirona is shown here on plaques and in votive statues along with a young male figure. This is probably Lugh, whom the Romans equated with Apollo after they took over the site in the second century AD. When Christians later took over the shrine, the dedicated it to a “Saint Sabine,” another euhemerism of a Pagan Goddess into a Christian Pious. In late Celtic times the sanctuary was a Nemeton built around a spring whose waters were directed into a pool. In the pool have been found small votive statues of the Goddess and of the Divine Couple, presumably Sirona and Lugh, and also coins and precious offerings. It is described by the excavators as an unusually rich shrine for one so far in the country.

Sirona is portrayed here, as elsewhere, in statues and wall reliefs, holding a serpent, and a bowl of eggs, probably serpent’s eggs. The motif of the Serpent’s Egg appears in Irish literature and in folklore about the Druid in the British Isles. Possession of these magical eggs was said to bestow divine wisdom, eloquence, and protection against spells and disease. This last quality may be a dim echo of the healing powers of Sirona and of Her ancient association with night and dreams. People seeking cures for chronic illnesses often made pilgrimages in order to sleep within the sanctuary of a healing Deity in hope of receiving a Divine Dream in which the cause and cure of their illness would be made known to them by the Goddess of the shrine. Dio Cassius wrote of a pilgrimage made by the Emperor Caracalla to the shrines of the Celts as well as to Greek and Roman temples in search of a cure.

Farther west in Gaul, Sirona takes on a more diurnal and agrarian image, and is portrayed holding an ear of grain and a bowl. The concepts of healing and of regeneration were always closely associated in Celtic culture, according to Prof. Miranda Green, archeologist and British expert on the Celts. The ear of wheat symbolized the power of growth and rebirth, truth to its name “spica” from the root for hope. Green calls Sirona “polyandrous,” but evidence simply shows Her working in conjunction with several different male Deities: Lugh, Bormo, Grannus, and several other as yet unidentified male figures. She is always associated with the serpent itself as an image of healing and wisdom in the Ancient World, and a symbol associated with the Milky Way in several early astronomies.

Night, rest, and healing are the domain of Sirona. The nights will be getting longer now, taking precedence over the day. But as one devotee of Sirona, in spirit if not in name, put it, “I hold the darkness to be good no less than the light.” Now begins the harvest of the benefits of the “good and covering dark.” Between now and Samhain, try to visit some place in the deep country where you can see the Milky Way and the dark sky the way the Druids of Sirona saw it before artificial lights and smog lowered our vision. Anywhere you are, though, a few of the bright stars and planets are always visible, even in the city. If you can’t sleep go out and look at the stars.

A meditative experiment for the radical and the brave: From now ‘til Samhain, avoid all night time electronic media. Know darkness and stars.

Last Minute News of the Groves

Some of the fish in our pond had become caught in the algae and had died. The spirulina was making good use of the fish-fertilizer. “Oh, dear! The algae is eating the fish.” That’s how it is out here at Orinda Grovesite everything happening backwards. According to some strains of Celtic mythology, this would mean we have all died and gone to the netherworld. This not a bad theory; it would explain so much.

How’s it going, Bob? Jennifer and I were in the neighborhood and thought we’d drop in and see how the search for inner peace and solitude is coming.

Post Oak Proto-Grove

Scholarly pursuits and research can be very mystical and to deny this is missing the point of my attempt to reconstruct the ancient Druids' tradition. When one takes the time to consume the writings of Indo-European scholars, archaeologists, comparative-mythologists, professors of religious history and socio-cultural anthropologists—you are disciplining yourself to a set of guidelines that will keep you on the path to truth. The scholarly data are the guideposts and signs along the road to another time and place. One forms a mental image or set of images; it starts out blurry and fuzzy, but the more you journey backward in time, the clearer it becomes. When you study linguistics and philology—you can begin to hear the voices of the ancient ones. You can read the ancient inscriptions or etymologies and that helps you to hear the voices from the past. When you study the culture of the ancient Celts or the Indo-Europeans, you begin to form cleaner and cleaner pictures and images of their lives. And then, when you begin to organize and integrate the data you've collected, your mental picture becomes a whole, built-up upon many pictures, sounds and even feelings.

It is like a shamanic journey, but you are not witnessing or experiencing an Otherworld, but a past world—this world as it was. When the puzzle pieces fit together—correlating and corroborating—the image must be true and real and you must reject those pieces which do not fit together, which are not verifiable by comparison and contrast. When it comes together—the image can become so sharply focused that you can feel it. When you are studying it and organizing it all—you are absorbed into it and you become like a shaman possessed by spirits. But the important thing, when you take the journey, is to leave behind all assumptions—to become a detached observer leaving behind judgmental thoughts—prejudices, biases and misconceptions. When you come back from the journey, you are in the here and now, and you may then form opinions about it (what you saw and felt), this is where you can apply the data, but the data is a reconstructed tradition and the more facts (verifiable through tests, correlation, corroboration, etc.) the closer your reconstruction is to the ultimate truth. Another way of testing the truth is by its internal logic and also by substantiating it with appeals to the BEST authorities who have used strictest standards of reconstruction.

There is a mysticism in scholarship, indeed! It is very useful scholarship to reconstruct the past—for many reasons that are obvious. It is not a matter of taste or opinion when you have actually seen or demonstrated a matter of fact—the reaction to the facts are something entirely different! If something is an established fact, then it is right for its own sake and for the sake of truth. Whether or not an ancient Druid said or did something is either a fact or not a fact, and can either be demonstrated or not! One only has the authority to facts about something, but truth is contingent to facts. You can choose to base your beliefs on a factual matter or not, but a belief which expresses to deny a fact is a false belief, no matter how you categorize it!

Example:

A false belief:

“Lugh is an Egyptian god believed in by industrial workers in China.

I believe in this.”

A true belief:

“I believe that the sunset occurred at dusk this evening.”

My vision of Druidism is to reconstruct the ancient religious beliefs and allow it to become part of a new tradition. Now in reconstructing the old traditions—I am engaging in an activity that is subject to being fact or non-fact. Either the Druid said this (did this) or he did not. Whether I can verify it through cultural, anthropological, linguistic, literary or historical evidence is the criteria for establishing its veracity. If it is verifiable, provable, or demonstrable through scholarship, then it is worthy of becoming integrated into the tradition. Once established into the reconstructed tradition, then it becomes a matter of fact—and only then can we say whether or not we agree with it or believe in it.

If we choose not to believe in it, then we have broken off from ancient tradition, but it is still part of our heritage as neo-Druids, for after all we have named ourselves after them and that implies that we have drawn from them somehow. If we make-up a false tradition, on the other hand, we encourage false beliefs and we become a ridiculous joke in the history of human folly. If we take ourselves too seriously, of course, we could very well become the sort of “Our way is the only right way” authoritarian fundamentalist type of thing. But if we are not serious enough, we cannot fulfill ourselves, we are a joke and we can degenerate into a superficial band of people who miss out on thoughtfulness.

More on Mitra-Varuna dual sovereignty. In the Celtic priesthood, the Druids were supreme authorities—they were xenophobic, conservative and they embodied traditions of their culture, they scorned eclecticism (unless it fit in with their tradition!)—only in southern Narbonensian Gaul did they allow much outside influences. The seers and prophets, vates and filidhe, etc. were concerned with the more mystical side—but still they were working within the bounds of tradition too—maybe more strictly since the Druid (purohita) types were watching over them. Also, the filidhe, vates, or faith were poets—they sang, chanted and composed verses—literary types more than we are or could ever be, but we need more of it! The Rix (pl. Riges)—kings were bound to carry out the policies set by Druids (purohita-types) because Druids were judges drawing upon TRADITIONS that they memorized. Odin and Tiw or Lugh and Nuadu were gods who perhaps personified the relationship between Druid and Rix, between Brahman and Rajan or Flamen and Rex, but the correspondence was probably closest in those Proto-Indo-European days when the Kurgan folk had yet to divide the segmented lineages and load up the wagons in search of greener pastures. When the Regos and Blaghmen were our ancestors' father and uncle, dividing their tasks between war and sacrifice, between leading men in a cattle-raid and leading poets in praise. The Regos grabbed his battle axe and said “follow me” while his brother the gheu-patruos or Blaghsmen said “I'll lead the people in a sacrifice to offer Dyeu-pater our best bull, so that our Regos and his men shall have victory in the raid!”

So the priest offered a bull to the god of war, a sky god, and the king led the raid—thus father-sky had a brother who made judgements on the people below and the thus the priest must find out this god's will. Manus killed Yemos—priest sacrificed the king—for the king must be willing to die for his people—as their father and protector. He gave his life so others could live, but our uncle the priest made sure his death was dignified and honorable and thus the father of mankind was a twin Yemos (Yama, Yima, Ymir, Remus, Donn or Tuisto) and the uncle of mankind was Manus (Manu, Romulus, Wironos, Mannwaz, Amhairghen or Manannán) he was the priest, the twin of Yemos. The corresponding gods were Odin and Tiwaz, Jupiter and Dius Fidius, Zeus and Hades, Lugh and Nuadu, Mitra-Varuna, Bodb and Manannán, or Amhairgehn and Donn. The pattern fits:

Sea Giants	Sky Gods	Man Kind
House of Llyr & Dagda “Eochaid Ollathair”	House of Danann	House of Milé
Bodb Dearg—king	Nuada—king	Donn—king
Manannán Mac Lir—priest	Lugh—priest	Amhairghen—priest

[Clearer chart for graph above.]

Sky	Dananns	Heaven
Atmosphere	Milesians	Middle-earth
Earth	Lir & Dagda	Underworld

Hope to hear from you again,

Tom

May 1st

Dear Emmon,

Got your letter of “May 1st.” Sorry to have been so didactic—perhaps I am out-growing neo-paganism—or perhaps I am rebelling against it—the theology of modern religion. If I have offended anyone by defending myself, then it must be a sure sign that I no longer fit in anymore. Still, I believe I have been unjustly criticized or whatever you want to call it.

It seems, also, now, that I have offended you. I truly regret this, if this is so. I never intended to upset anyone but merely to state my position so that I could get on with writing scholarship or scholarly research type of stuff. When I have to stop and defend scholarship, it took away from just writing it. I was beginning to feel that no one cared—no feedback – no positive feedback, either! There’s mysticism in scholarship which, I believe, we both share. Correct me if I’m wrong! You have shared really great stuff with me and I like James Duran’s exposition, because of listening to him, I was turned on to Structuralism, Cultural materialism, and comparing African New Religion, etc. I believe that this turned my direction toward getting at the bottom of the I-E religious stuff- yet at the same time that I wanted to reconstruct the religion, I also turned away from its “modern” application.

It’s like taking a shamanic journey into another time or another world. I believe there is mysticism in studying history—when you can imagine the past—dream about it and see it. I’m not going to send in anymore stuff to the Missal-Any because I believe that it is not apparently of any interest to the readers anymore—unless someone wants to write to me, I’m going to keep my mouth shut and only contribute if requested! I enclose the letter fragment I wrote a few days ago.

Heathen on the Heath:

The Secret of Autumn

Autumn is a promise, wind singing of the blessed rains to come. Autumn is my true love calling, soft as death. The door blows open; cats run in and out. The scent and horror of wildfire blows away, and we foolhardy ones replace it with the smoke of woodstoves against cold that we secretly cherish.

In these days I glare daggers at those who whine for more nice days. Have we cursed our land with the curse of drought, for the sake of our prim plastic notion of a nice day? Do we think of unblemished tomatoes, or mold-free buds, or whatever turns us over-proliferating hominids on, and not of the Mother? She knows her grief will soon be upon her; do we forbid her to weep and be comforted? I may throw a shoe at the Today Show one of these mornings—a strange offering to the gods!

I pick tomatoes now, between writing assignments. My boss is unlike me, but also a farmer. He tells me how he does it, but is also open-eared for what little I may know that he does not. That eternally confused expression belongs to both of us. We share a secret, called “Damned If I Know.” We run to beat the deadline of rain, and altogether it’s sort of festive.

Autumn howls laughter, weeps loving, just around the corner, and we beg for the turning of seasons, while cursing the passage of time. Neopagans differ from paleopagans, for we face threats that our forbears did not, and are lulled by our overcomplicated distancing devices. No neophyte bard or Druid could have been held in thrall by a vehicle unstartable, or a heating or cooling whoozits beyond normal comprehension. A wise one might instruct on in the mysteries, but no expert was needed to keep one functioning. Take time from the broken washing machine, Oh my People, and ponder the water we wash with. No one has yet died and left us in charge, and that water could somehow manage not to come. We differ as we must, but also in ways that we should not. And in some ways, all our pagan forebears knew the same thing.

What’s Gaelic for “Be attentive as you walk?”

News of the Groves

We have finished digging the post-holes and set the seven cabers in place that will hold the retaining wall so that we can level the Maypole meadow. We plan to use woven wood and mud mortar, “daub and wattle works,” for the body of the wall. The ancient city walls and dykes of Dublin were made this way. Dublin is from Dubh Linn: “for in the black pond.” Our post-holes and earth-works will still be detectable thousands of years hence. Though unless this culture takes some radical detours, they will probably be under shore-to-shore condominiums.

This year has not only been one of the driest, but has also seen one of the worst infestations of Oak Moths in Orinda in living memory. (And living memory is the way we go. In answer to one letter writer’s question. “No, the Druid Missal-Any is not computerized. Its records are kept in the living memory of its Third Order Druids.”) Not wanting to break with Organic Purity, we did not spray, but have trusted to the birds and worms’ other natural enemies. Some of the bird species have gotten in two nests this year, and all have had a “Banner Year.” Last service, at that in the R.D.N.A. ritual when offerings of requests to the different Deities are accepted, I asked to be instructed as to what should do for our Oak trees, especially for Darag, a Valley Oak in the consecrated part of the Grove who has suffered more damage from the worms than have the Live Oaks. Next day, in a Health food store of all places, my eye was drawn to a new, guaranteed Organic, product for dealing with these worms which have been bad all over the Bay Area. Next service, I will confer with my fellow Druids and we will decide whether and how to use it.

A Druid Missal-Any Samhain 1987 Volume 11 Number 7

Samhain Essay: Celtic Feast Days

By Emmon Bodfish

amhain, Celtic New Year, the day between the Worlds. The Druid year starts with Samhain in the fall of the year, just as the Druid reckoning of days begins each day at the fall of night. This high day marks the end of the harvest season. Any fruit not gathered in by Samhain Eve must be left in the fields to feed the birds and the wild animals, or the Sidhe, as one would have it. According to Françoise Le Roux, whose article, "Studies on the Celtic Feast Days" has been translated from the French by one of our subscribers, Jeanne Elizabeth, Samhain may be derived from Sam Fuin, meaning weakening or end of summer. Other competing derivations from Sam Rad or Samhra are by no means disproven, such as Samhrad, summer, or Samhrach, quiet, still.

Like New Year's celebrations everywhere, Samhain's festivities fall into two sequential phases: one that signifies a return to Chaos, to wit: the disposal of old goods, expelling of evil, reversal of usual habits of behavior, parties, suspension of taboos, and the return of the dead to this world of the living, all of which occur on Samhain night; and a second phase which signifies rebirth of the Cosmos and creation anew, to wit: the lighting of new fires, the beginning of a new season, inauguration of new ceremonies, re-affirmation of the existing order, and installation of new leaders. This phase is enacted Samhain morning, and is symbolized in the RDNA tradition in the Samhain Dawn service, Service The newly elected Archdruid, in Preceptor, and Server enact the first service of the new year; All Third order Druids change their ceremonial ribbons to new white ones, and winter begins.

News of the Groves

It's a short article, not for any lack of news, but what with the markets doing yo-yo's and back flips, we have had very little time to write down anything other than numbers. If it is true, as Jim Duran says, that the ancestors may send or withhold prosperity, then the ancestors are PISSED! We will see what we can do about this on Samhain when the gates between the worlds open, and the dead are said to walk and speak. In the meantime, we promise a longer, "catch-up" article if and when things settle down around Yule.

Letter to the Editor (received Oct. 29)

"The Celts had no Mother Goddesses." Startling theory! And where does Tom Cross get the evidence to contradict Green, deVries, Grenier and Szabo, etc., the accepted experts in the field? Listen to this. "Going by the fact that Danu is cognate with the name of the Danube river, it seems that She is (or was) originally a River Goddess," he says, jumping to his own conclusion. In other words he does what he accuses the rest of us of doing: He makes it up out of his head. Exactly what are Mr. Cross' credentials? Not many, I think. And while he is invoking academia and scholarship, why doesn't he go back to some school and learn to write a grammatical English sentence?

Enclosed is a brief summary of evidence pertaining to the Mother Goddesses of the Celts by Prof. Green.

Sincerely,

SAMHAIN MOOT—attention all. C. of D. (College of Druidism) members resident on mainland Britain we are planning a Major Druidical celebration of SAMHAIN in Roslyn Glen (10 miles from Edinburgh). Some of the three days Mon. 31st Oct., Tues. 1st & Wed. 2nd Nov. will be spent in instruction/preparation in Caer Eidynd, the rest will be spent camped-out in Roslyn Woods. If you would like to join the Edinburgh Group for this Holy Festival then please get in touch well in advance, so we can make arrangements about accommodation etc.

The Heathen on the Heath: Death

Samhain is change; Samhain is ever the same. Year after year we celebrate the Eternal Return, yet in many ways, every Samhain, we are made aware that you can never really go home.

Remember the dead, they whom—at least this time around—we will not see again. If ever we do meet again, it will be a different story, with everyone wearing different faces; the beloved ghosts who watch with us this night can only wait, and whimper, hoping that when Mannannen's cloak is finally drawn between us, it is wisdom and not wounds that each shall bring away from that parting. Some changes are irrevocable.

I talk to my death. I ask his advice, and he always gives it. It never differs from the last advice he gave me, but the sound of his voice awakens the mind to flooding moonlight, clearer than the cluttered light of day, and all the hairs on the back of my neck stand up, and petty things become very small indeed. For my death says, "Whatever it is that you will do, remember that I am coming for you; I know when that is, but you don't."

We live in a real world, and we know that because, one by one, we die. This Samhain, as we stand in the moon-drenched grass, can we let wishful thinking drain from us, and be there for our Gods as they are? The wishful mind is a lover so busy planning the wedding, or choreographing the seduction, or mentally buying a house, that the fiery satin of the beloved's touch goes unnoticed. Imagination given to the present, and to the opening of the senses, is psychedelic; there is no book of instructions for the opening of an eye, and no script for a kiss.

Name the names of your dead, and let yourself cry. Look at the living and see them. Don't miss anything, because the next Samhain, the next year, the next life, the next time you step on this same patch of ground, everything will be different.

Albion's Thoughts

(Received Sept 28)

I don't want this to be another face off with Tom Cross. There is a need for scholarship and research into the ways of our ancestors, there is a place for what Tom does, there is a need for what he does.

As I've said before, I'm not a Druid. Ritually, I practice some hereditary pagan ways (that came from the Midlands of England) mixed liberally with some modern paganism, (oriented towards the Celtic God/desses).

I also carry a "medicine bag," I ritually sweat in a sweat lodge whenever I can, and sometimes I smoke the ceremonial pipe as well, I don't "blend" all of these ways together (i.e. the Celtic and Native American ways), but practice them separately, but they are different paths to the same source, and in some ways, the Inner God/dess forms are very similar. And, both paths, most importantly, work.

I've gone into all of this to say that it's o.k. to take whatever path(s) that you need to take to achieve you own personal Union with the Gods, no matter what anyone else says, follow your own path, for this is "the high road" to Spiritual Freedom.

There is one last thing that I'd like to address here.

"The Gods" like us have grown. We aren't in 2nd century Ireland or Gaul, but reside in 1987 North America. Our approach to the Gods is going to change over time, and change with our evolution as a race and species. As we have changed and continued to grow, so too, have the Gods—although their space-time frame is not like ours, the Gods Also "grow" and change. The "Other-World" is different than 2,000 years ago just as our world is different. Don't believe me, but take your own Shamanic journey to find out.

It is also o.k. to "update" our spiritual approach to the Gods, no matter what anyone else might say.

And I'm not saying that the Celtic "Old Ways" are no longer "valid" for our modern age, but perhaps our Faith is a new, and I feel improved form of the old faith. As I turn 36 years old on Samhain, I want to begin a new year of my life and this is the last that I wish to writ on this particular subject. There is a place for us all on these pages and no one should give up on helping others to learn but we all hopefully, have learned some important lessons about our selves. This is true growth and is a great spiritual lesson and a gift.

Blessings to all,

Albion

Yule Essay: Mother Goddesses

By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, Winter Solstice, was a minor High Day in the old Druid calendar. The festival's association with a Mother and newborn Son is very old through-out the Eurasian cultural area. It predates Indo-European occupation of Europe, and probably included the Proto-Indo Europeans in their steppes homeland. A Goddess and a Young Year God were worshiped in Balkan Europe before 3500 B.C. and in Summeria and the Caucis even earlier. In Rome, (much later) it was the Festival of the Three Mothers, probably cognates of the extremely popular Triple Mothers cult of the Celts. Mass produced, molded pipe clay votive figures of the three are found throughout Britain and Gaul.*

Left. Pipe-clay mother-goddess and mould; Toulon-sur-Allier, France. Photograph: Miranda Green. Musée des Antiquités Nationales, St. Germain-en-Laye. Right. Pipe-clay mother-goddesses; London. Copyright: Museum of London.

As deVries's, Grenier's, Green's, Szabo's and Ross's work has shown, the mother-goddess cult, so popular in Gaul and Britain during the Pre-conquest period and extending into Romano-Celtic times, has its origin in Proto-Indo-European culture, and shares features with similar cults in some of the other Indo-European peoples. The parallel has been drawn many times with Tacitus' description of the Teutonic Earth-goddess Nerthus who rode in procession through cities. This imagery recalls and is corroborated by Strettweg processional wagon with its female figure and also, later Romano-Celtic Mother figures portrayed in chariots. Another parallel is suggested in Irish literary tradition in descriptions of Connaught's Queen Medb being driven in her chariot around her camp before battle. Medb is a problematic figure, somewhere between a goddess and a heroic archetype. But it must be remembered that the "Tain Bo Chualigne" was not written down in pagan times.

*Proving that mass-produced little religious goodies are not a modern tackiness.

News of the Groves

I am calling an end to the Cross vs. Guppy et. al. debate. It has become too acrimonious. We Druids are a tiny minority within a minority, the modern pagans, and need to support and understand each other, or at least extend tolerance to one another, being as we are surrounded by an intolerant world, much of which wishes we did not exist. Articles on the subjects are always welcome, but no more personal vilification.

The Celts did not have a single, monotheistic, all-powerful Mother Goddess. That was never what was being maintained. Neither did they have a single all-powerful Father God; they had multiplicity. For a Father, they had Dispater, from whom at least some of the Gauls claimed to descend. Then there was Tuates, a war and ancestor God of the tribes. Better delineated was Dagda, the father of many of the other Gods and Goddesses. And Sucellos, called the "All-Father," but his role beyond that designation is not clear. We know of Mider, a God of fertility and Albuis, the Sky God. What did they mean to the Ancient Celts? There is no all-ruling Zeus. Zeus in fact is thought to be cognate with Taranis, a Thunderbolt God who is not a particularly fatherly figure in Celtic mythology. Another God, Nuada, has been called "the Celtic Zeus." Multiplicity and specialization were the rule.

Where did it start? We don't have a Celtic creation myth. Undoubtedly they had one, but it has been lost in the intervening Roman and Christian darkness. Each of the "houses" clan groups, or "Branches," in Ireland traced their origins back to the tomb of a female ancestor, and attributed the same system of reckoning, descent to their Gods, calling them "People" of the Goddess Danu, the Tuath de Danann." It was a female progenitor who was honored at Tara and in Ulster. This is unusual. In most of the rest of the world tribes generally traced themselves back to a male ancestor, divine, semi-divine or semi-animal and divine.

There is no lack of Mother-goddesses among the Celts. Several dozen are known by name from inscriptions or mythologies, the exact count depends on whom you believe to be separate figures, and which you think are different names for the same Goddess in the Celtic mind. Green has studied hundreds of Mother-goddess statues, figurines, and votive inscriptions by way of hard evidence. To dismiss all female deities as "mere consorts of the Gods." is to impose nineteenth century attitudes and values on ancient Europe. The Triple-Mothers, for instance, had no consorts.

Hunting Thoughts

Sacrifice of two white bulls was traditional to this festival. Knowing that we lacked white bulls, the Deities have provided us in Orinda with a young Mule deer buck, who may have grazed at times on our hill. For this, and for the wild greens and the firewood to cook them, we offer up our thanks.

Mad Sweeney's morals: If you hunt, kill only to sustain your own lives, never for "pleasure." Take only what you can use. Send a SASE for instructions on how to tan a hide. Check the hunting laws in your state. And if you really want to get the experience, remember: Knives and guns are for ninnies.

Mad Sweeney's Hunting Knife

With only little encouragement I may write an article about how to make these stone tools.

The Heathen on the Heath: Making a Tradition

Time was when I tried to tie every column in with the theme of the seasons. But I've ridden at least one revolution of the year-wheel with this column, and it has finally occurred to me that Mad Sweeney handles the seasonal aspects of the Missal—Any quite well, without the aid of my scholly slopperness. So I think I'll stop the year and get off.

What, I haven't succeeded? Why, so I haven't. For I have here a subject of rant and rave quite appropriate for winter's dark insistence. You see, it occurs to me that winters—especially country winters—are a fine time to get down to the grunt work of our religion. We have sung and feasted and sacrificed, and yelled at one another and praised our ancestors. But what do we do next? What is a pagan, or more specifically a Reformed Druid, life, in grubby day-to-day detail?

I must first admit that hard, clearheaded scholarship is something that I perceive as a duty, badly neglected on my part. I am currently poking my nose into the study of history, in bits and snippets, including more of the world than the U.S., or Celtic Britain and Ireland. The future springs from the loam of the past; if one wants to add a few nutrients for its proper growth, it helps to know what was thrown on the compost heap to begin with, and also to be reasonably aware of the nature of composting.

But what do we want to do with that future? Could I say that most of us would like to bring with us some of the values that we find in the visions of our Celtic forebears—the stubborn individualism that has led English-speaking peoples (and those who still speak Gaelic) into political experimentation that has continued to this day? Do we want to continue the openhearted pride and hospitality of the Celt, and the bold curiosity that looks the very Gods squarely in the eye?

We can only start right now. And though we may debate the correctness of possibility of writing, or rather rewriting, our own religion, the need to rewrite our culture is hardly worth an argument. Culture gets rewritten, and one can either participate actively or be manipulated by those in power. We're living a script that was heavily re-written in the aftershock of two world wars: although the sanctity of the family per se is a very old concept, the sanctity of the nuclear family is no older than our own parents. Cut! We're gonna have to do that scene over again. The previous generation meant well. They probably hoped, by isolating the breeding unit, to achieve greater individual prestige, and in some cases, it worked.

No one could have explained to them, without first trying it, that isolating small groups of people with specialized roles under heavy economic pressure would provide all sorts of motivation for abuse. And the failure to deal with Grandma and Grandpa, though a grandiose glitch, is no bigger than some of the boners we'll pull, once we get the lead out and start doing things.

Who's that in the back row? You say "doing things" is a fine idea for flaky South Humboldt hippies, but what about you real folks with real jobs and real bosses and neighbors and such to deal with?

You win a few, you lose a few. Actually, country folks can be just as hardheaded in their expectations as city dwellers, and although rural neighbors are fewer, they have more influence on your day-to-day life. Which brings me to the next point; if we expect to have any influence on our surroundings, we must exercise it as neighbours do, a little at a time.

It would perhaps be more fun to establish, immediately, a clan-type family structure with a set of equal-opportunity social customs. This is always a favorite fantasy, probably because everybody wants to be The McGregor. But if you are the leader of your embryo clan, you have my heartfelt sympathy. Chances are that your contributions pass unremarked, except by loud complaints of stubbornness, meddling, egotism, and being late when you drive the neighbors' kids to school. The loudest grouching will come from your own immediate family, since time devoted to a larger group is time not lavished exclusively on them.

To be even responsible, much less acceptable or polite, we must start small. This means noticing small things.

To whom do we show respect, for what, and in what ways? What are our prejudices? (Careful—lying saps power.)

Is there any subject regarding which we would not want to pass our beliefs on to our children?

Are our religious ideals reflected in our etiquette? Do we give lip service to the Mother, but expect human mothers to stay home until their figures look normal and their kids don't cry unexpectedly? Do we fear and ridicule old age?

Do we revere Nature, but describe biological processes in the language of disgust? (Footnote: this correspondent is aware of the glory-in-grossness rhetoric of Crowley, or the Hell's Angels. She is also aware that the excuses for such rhetoric only fool men. Please don't refer to a pregnant acquaintance as "spawning," at least in my hearing...probably also in hers. We do know what you mean, and we don't like it.) Or do we use euphemisms to shove conversation away from a subject, rather than handling it in a calm and neutral tone? If a child asked you to describe sex, what words would you use? My "well, they fit together" may have been less than articulate, but it at least allowed my daughter to laugh, especially when I explained that when she was old enough, her instincts would cause her to enjoy it. "I always knew grownups were weird!" said she.

Do we deplore patriarchalism in the home, autocracy in business, and arbitrariness in law, but allow them to function unmolested? Do we “mind our own business” about socially acceptable cruelties, but pretend to the “normality” of the busy bodies in power?

Do we vote? Do we volunteer in the service of our beliefs?

Do we have a relationship with our surroundings? With plants? With animals? How well do we know our climate, our soil, our geography?

See? This is the grunt work. This is the kind of thing a religion faces you with, once you’ve lasted through the honeymoon phase. And half the time, once you’ve decided what the Gods really want you to do, your first impulse will be to try to talk Them out of it. Like, there’s a quintillion bazillion gophers in my garden, and You Guys don’t want me to use any poisons? Not even one little pellet? And about that geas. Folks—you really mean to tell me that You expect people to have geasa in the Eighties? Next, You’ll be asking us whether we believe in magic.

But if you readers are members of the NRDNA or related organizations at this point in their development, you’re the diehards, the ones who have made it this far. You’ve lived through the political snits and social catastrophes that drove away the dilettantes and novelty-seekers. Your pagan eyes have seen births and marriages and divorces and deaths. You have, somewhere within you, a worldview not taught to you by either mainstream religious or secular authorities.

Now, obviously, there’s no law that says you can’t just bug out on the project at this point. Taking your feral spiritual priorities out for a spin can make you conspicuous, especially in the current sociopolitical climate of enlightened despair. Giving up always looks terribly sophisticated.

But you can’t bug out on winter.

Oimeic Essay: Bride

By Emmon Bodfish

Maiden who hangs Her cloak on the rays of the morning sun. The sun is feminine in Gaelic, and in Scot's folk tradition.

imeic. Now is the time of Breedes, Bridget, Goddess of the hearth, Ruler of fire, Lucinda, Vesta, candle light parades, Lady Day, the Thaw. Bride was one of the most popular of the pan-Celtic Deities, and in Pagan times a perpetual fire burned on Her altar in Kildare. She was attended by a female priesthood. She is also the Dawn

34. To the Sun

Greeting to you, sun of the seasons, as you travel the skies on high, with your strong steps on the wing of the heights; you are the happy mother of the stars.

You sink down in the perilous ocean without harm and without hurt; you rise up on the quiet wave like a young queen in flower.

Scottish Gaelic; traditional folk prayer, from A Celtic Miscellany

From now until Equinox we worship Bride and give thanks for fire. When you light your fire or candle during these days, try, this old Scot's verse, which is, I think, in a direct oral tradition from old Paganism.

"Unto Bride, Ruler of Fire, Give us this little comfort now."

Mad Sweeney's News

I have news for you; the stag bells, winter snows, summer has gone.

Wind high and cold, the sun low, short its course, the sea running high.

Deep red the bracken, its shape is lost; the wild goose has raised its accustomed cry.

Cold has seized the birds' wings; season of ice, this is my news.

ARENA PRESS

A Lettershop Where People Respond

Dear Gentlefolk,

Recycled paper saves trees, saves energy, and reduces solid waste. It is also high-quality, available in a wide variety of colors and weights, and economically competitive with virgin papers.

Unfortunately, it is not easy to find. Major paper manufacturers don't promote it, most commercial print shops don't handle it, and most office supply stores have never even heard of it.

As environmentalists and Pagans, we at Arena Press found this situation frustrating. So we put our heads together, ran up a truly monumental phone bill, and are able to offer you the results of our work.

We now offer a full line of recycle papers for direct sale or for printing. We are a full service commercial print shop; with desktop publishing, computerized database services and a graphic arts/camera department that makes our work professional, economical, and now, environmentally sensitive.

We'd like a chance to work on your printing; whether you publish a Pagan periodical or sell New Age crystals or operate a Women's Collective, we'll give you the finest quality work for the best price and help promote the use of recycled paper as well. For once, neither high quality, economics, or our principles have to be sacrificed.

If you already produce printed materials, why not send us a copy of what you're currently doing? We'll be delighted to provide you with a bid on your next reprint. Otherwise, be sure and call us the next time you're working on a business card, catalog, paperback book, direct mail piece or other printing job; we'll thank you, your checkbook will thank you, and, most importantly, the trees will thank you.

Blessed Be,

Trout Creek Update:

The Trout Creek Watershed is a unique and special area; the only significant virgin multi-storied grove of old-growth Douglas Fir on the entire 12-mile stretch of the Eel River from its source on Hull Mountain to Van Arsdale Dam. As such, it is the last old-growth sanctuary where native plants and animals can remain undisturbed. Secondly, the area of the proposed logging would directly impact Trout Creek, impairing the water quality of the Creek, and ultimately the River itself. Furthermore, the area is easily accessible to the public, being directly above PG & E's own campground. In order to preserve a unique and endangered old-growth eco-system and to protect water quality, recreational and scenic values, which cannot be duplicated in half a millennium, we believe Trout Creek should be maintained as a sanctuary. The friends of Trout Creek are more than willing to work with PG & E in the care and maintenance of such a sanctuary.

—John Harnish
Spokesman for FTC

Trout Creek is a major tributary to the main fork of the Eel River. This river supplies both domestic and agricultural water for 300,000 people in Mendocino, Sonoma and Marin Counties. The Eel is a troubled river, overburdened with silt, largely from abusive logging practices. The river is struggling to support its own native steelhead and salmon populations. The silt in the river settles in Lake Pillsbury and Lake Mendocino, causing a diminished water storage capacity for its users in dry summer months.

On Dec. 23, 1986 PG & E filed a Timber Harvest Plan (THP) on 637 acres surrounding a two-mile section of Trout Creek. Through public support, both in donations and letter writing, Friends of Trout Creek and the Rural Institute have been able to temporarily halt the destruction of the last stand of old growth timber on the Upper Eel River. Only through legal action has it been possible to get PG & E to come to the negotiation table and talk about alternatives to their THP.

Over the last few months a negotiating team has met on a regular basis with PG & E's representatives. The tentative outcome of those negotiations was an amended THP that provided only a shallow visual screen along the county road and Trout Creek itself.

PG & E has refused to protect these small buffer zones from future timber harvest and claims that donation of the land is not feasible under current tax structures.

After reviewing the proposed agreement with the Rural Institute, Sierra Club officials and Earth First! activists, and in light of a recent Sonoma County court ruling to the effect that cumulative impacts must be addressed, FTC has agreed to continue with legal actions, and pursue further negotiations.

A Court date of January 29, 1988 has been set. Most of the groundwork has been laid, but additional funds must be raised to secure the necessary legal assistance.

Open Letter (sample) To Richard Clarke, President, PG & E

I am writing this letter in objection to your planned timber harvest of Trout Creek in Mendocino County. PG & E is in business to provide utilities to the public. Harvesting timber in a critical watershed that provides domestic water for a large population does not seem like an appropriate action for your company to take. I ask you to withdraw Timber Harvest Plan #1-86-659 MEN/LAK and dedicate this last stand of old growth timber to sanctuary and recreation.

Spring Equinox Essay: Eggs, Bird Goddesses, and Hares

By Emmon Bodfish

quinox, a Minor Druid High Day, the emphasis is on balance. Some customs of the season which are hold overs from pre-Christian times include the colored and fanciful eggs and the "Easter Bunny" who brings them, though this was not the original sequence nor association.

Nora Chadwick, a noted historian, describes the spring rite of the "offering of the cakes and eggs," recorded by classic authors in their descriptions of Druidic customs. Egg hunt, egg rolling games and rituals are still current in Ireland, Lithuania and Eastern Europe, and may have a Pre-Indo-European origin. Decorated eggs and painted clay models of eggs are a frequent theme of Aryan Balkan culture. They are part of the ensign of the Bird Goddess, whose worship seems to have been particular to spring and to the time of the spring rains, to judge from holdovers into Classic Greek times. Eggs are also part of the imagery of the Supreme Goddess of Old-European culture. In this connection they represent the Cosmic Egg, laid by the swan or Nile Goose, which was said to have begun the world. Small painted clay eggs were included inside statues of this Great Goddess, as in Marija Gimbutas drawings reproduced here.

A Cosmic Egg may also be associated with they mythical water bird of Creation. This myth is almost universal between Africa and the Artic; it was recorded in the scripts and hieroglyphs of the literate civilizations and sung in the oral traditions of hunting and fishing tribes.

In an ancient Egyptian myth, the Cosmic Egg was laid by the Nile Goose which was worshipped as the "Great Chatterer," the creator of the world and of language. According to the Orphic story, uncreated Nyx (Night) existed first and was pictured as a great black-winged bird hovering over the vast darkness. Though unmated, she produced an egg out of which flew gold-winged Eros, while the two halves of the shell Ouranos and Gaia (Heaven and Earth) were created. The beginning of the myth must lie in the Paleolithic ear.¹

The Egg, plus chatter, that is words, began the world.

The Easter Bunny wasn't at all. It was a hare. The hare, not the rabbit, was the sacred animal of the Celts and Germans. Julius Caesar, in his war commentaries on Gaul, describes the Gauls and keeping "hares and certain other animals to amuse themselves, and which they do not eat" (nor hunt.) But the motive was more likely propitiation and divination than "amusement." The hare was seen as a messenger animal capable of travel between this and the Other World, and was associated with both prophecy and madness. The March Hare brought in the spring and gave the seeds their fertility, or withheld it. To run afoul of him caused madness. By the Middle Ages, the madness element predominated, and his came to be regarded as a demonic species. Many pagan ensigns and symbols suffered similar defamation and prophecy has always been associated with madness in Indo-European traditions. And, unlike the egg theme, the theme of the March Hare is solidly Indo-European. Its sacred and tabooed nature extends to most of the Western European languages groups and cultures. If language is the oldest witness to history, as Lockwood asserts,² then the Hare cult must go back to at least 3,500 B.C. and the second wave of the Indo European expansion before Celtic and Germanic and Italic diverged from one another. In these language groups the true word for hare, hara/haso, was tabooed and euphemisms were commonly invented for it in everyday speech.

Our American Ground Hog Day may be a dim and distant reflex of the March Hare theme with its element of prophecy of the early or a late spring. In the days of plowing and sowing magic, it was by the hare's behavior that people foretold the spring: weather and the prospects for the seeds about to be sown. By the shadows of posts and menhirs, not ground hogs, and by the points of the sun's risings, the priestly castes at the Great Henges determined the day of the Equinox kept the calendar of sowing and reaping in time with the Heavens.

(It bears saying again: The Druids did not build Stone Henge. Nor as far as we know did they make use of it as a calendar. This was the work and genius of the pre-Celtic peoples of the British Isles.)

The Heathen on the Heath: Fertility

The hills truly do flow with the milk of the ewe, and the birth of lambs in the frost. Some of them die. Lambkind, however, continues in its sheer numbers, milling back and forth past the bones of the lost ones in the field.

For the animals, the promise of fertility is enough. Each mother beast has her own soft wondering here-baby sound, of desire fulfilled and her work cut out for her. Once I, too, made such sounds.

For the ewe, the task is over when she dies, or when death looms so close that the body will no longer answer any other call. For a woman, time passes a little differently. My tall son and daughter are a source of pleasure and pride, but other work calls to me now, more clearly than that one work of my body. I shrink from the promise of fertility with something akin to revulsion. Would I risk my life again, not in action but in helplessness, while others direct me and attend my most intimate needs? Would I hang my heart once again on a newborn's uncertain commitment to survival?—for the door between worlds swings both ways at birth, and an infant may exit as well as enter. And no parent desires to outlive his or her offspring. And would plain practicality relegate my ambitions to a back corner, while I spent five years or more in a routine of baby care that left no time for anything else but servitude?—for nothing gainful can be done with hours doled out in increments of twenty minutes or less.

Not if I can help it: But then, it didn't look that way to me when I was doing it. In calm, this appears as a function of the passage of time. Once a mother, I was a maiden no more. And someday, even the intransigent body will take its slow, awkward steps from mother to crone. So why (to more women than just me) should fertility, having outlived its personal usefulness, fester like a wound that will not heal?

Some of this can be ascribed directly to the arrogance and cruelty of the powerful. What major corporation would rent part of a woman, when it can more conveniently buy all of a man? The executive woman performs many hidden duties: not only to do her work, but to be the knife-thin, aseptically tailored embodiment of a life with no other purpose. This is called Equal Rights, for now we, too, can owe our souls to the company store. And so birthing becomes either an expensive luxury, or the task of the unambitious. And the earth does not groan, for there are too many humans already.

This is our problem. Over the generations, we have brought it on ourselves, and now we bear it alone. Alone as a race, and often alone as individuals: over such issues as crying babies, housework, and the division of money not equally earned, we squabble rancorously among ourselves.

Very much has already been said, some of it by me, about the need as either political or religious whatever-we-ares to respect the decision of a mother to be a mother. But what is a mother?

Motherhood is a role, a set of tasks. But Motherhood—the embodiment of the many-named Mother we worship—is a form of power. And like any form of power, it can be abused.

We moderns shrink from the corniness of the imitator Dei, not only because of its grandiose indignity, but also through fear of failure. Which one of us is ready to be the Lover, the Father, or to brave face-on the death and rebirth inherent in the growth and independence of a Child? And who among us can live in our birthing and caring as Earth lives, both passive and productive? If I were Earth, could I whine and manipulate and demand that others care for me? Could I use the sacredness of my condition as an excuse for tyrannical illogic, or blackmail loved ones with my supposed fragility?

Admittedly, if I were Earth, mainstream society still probably wouldn't like me very much. If I were Earth, I would sweat blood and wallow in pleasure, all in one day. I would stride through the entire firmament with Babies on Board and no bumper sticker. I would smell of milk burps and diaper enhancers and the passion of begetting, and care little what any child of mine thought of it. I would lie quiescent under the mud pies and scheming of my young, but do nothing to keep my tsunamis and tornados and earthquakes from dusting the impossibilities off them. And the lambs would drop in the silvered chill of the grass, but spring would come when it came, and no sooner. And by human standards, I'd laugh too much.

And if I were Earth, I still wouldn't know where the money was coming from, but I would continue to Create, and not sweat the details. Without humility, I would take the gifts of heat, of light, of His love, and make life of them, simply because that is what I do.

Obviously, the courage of Earth far surpasses my own. But in all phases of life, there are opportunities to try. When the Gods inspire, shall I say, "but the floor is still dirty!" or "the boss wouldn't like it!" and whimper proudly of what might have been? Beware the boredom of the Gods! Energy is given to us, to flow productively through us; its unfulfilled dispersal can be dangerous. Man, if you are not a father of children, what do you father? Ideas? Music? Shapes and colors, toys and shelters, parades of number and order, or conflicts and their resolution? Or do you open another beer and shrug, saying that the Father is not you? And woman, if you are done with birthing, or do not birth, what else comes out of you: teaching, or healing, or things made with the hands? Vision? Hospitality? Or purposeless busywork and endless complaint, excused by your own insignificance?

Brigit rules the season, and my woodstove. Sometimes She also decides to rule me. I can reach for guitar or typewriter, and let Her have her sport, or I can sit and fuss and hope She doesn't decide to burn the house down.

Beltane Essay: Bonfires

By Emmon Bodfish

eltaine, the most festive and best-known holiday in the Druid Calendar. The theme of rebirth and renewal, and the beginning of a season of light and growth. It is the day of the Sun God, Belenus, and some authorities think that the name "Beltaine" or Cetshamain derives from Bel Teine, Bel's fire. Others think this the worst sort of "folk etymology." (When I typed it* just now, the Goddess statue here on my desk fell over, so you can make what you want of that. She seems not to approve.)

In Scot's Gàidhlig there is a specific term, "tein' eigin," for fire by friction, fire created by rubbing one wood against another. The literal translation would be "raised fire," and the method of lighting the great bonfires of the High Days, always with fire by friction, was called "raising fire out of the wood." Fire seems to have been thought of as inherent in certain woods, such as the oak, and was a matter of calling the spirit forth. Spending some time with bow and drill, learning how to this is a valid part of a Pagan education. It is a good skill has and a great fire meditation. It takes patience and stamina first, and concentration and the quickness, timing and delicacy to breathe life into the glowing embers. (Write to us for the back issue covering the how-to techniques for this.)

On Beltaine the cattle were driven between two lines of fires to purify them before they were moved to the summer pastures in the hills. This may not have been entirely symbolic. Smoke and the scorching effect drop off exto-parasites and the ability of fire to sterilize surgical instruments used in treating wounds was known throughout much of the ancient world. Similar ceremonies continued to be used in times of plague or contagious diseases among cattle well into Christian times, and, in the Highlands, into the late 19th century. Dwelly, recorder of Highland customs and author of the large Standard Gaelic-English Dictionary "the Scottish Webster," printed this description of the practice in 1901:

Teinne

The tein'-éigin was considered an antidote against the plague and murrain and all infectious diseases among cattle. Dr. Martin says all the fires in the parish were extinguished and 81 married men, being deemed the proper number for effecting this purpose, took two planks of wood and nine of them were employed by turns, who by their repeated efforts, rubbed the planks against each other, till the heat thereof produced fire, and from this forced fire each family was supplied with a new fire. No sooner was the fire kindled than a pot filled with water was put thereon, which was afterwards sprinkled on people who had the plague, or on cattle that had the murrain, and this process was said to be followed invariably by success.

A term applied to fire produced by friction—in olden times a means employed to check evils arising from being bewitched. If a household suffered loss such as indicated being under evil influence, all areas in fires district between two running streams were extinguished on a set day Then a spinning-wheel was put in motion, and kept going furiously until the spindle became heated. Tinder or tow was applied to the hot spindle, fire was thus procured and distributed to all households affected by evil influences. Within the memory of persons still living, fire was thus procured to check witchcraft in a township in Uist where some sickness, supposed to be evil eye, carried off some cows and sheep. It is odd that neither cow nor sheep (tied after, possibly the epidemic had exhausted itself.—DC.

Dwelly was trying to be a good "modern man" which in 1901 meant denying his Pagan heritage and the efficiency of these remedies. Beltaine, then, is a time to purge the cares and ills of winter, as well as to celebrate the return of light and life. Try passing things infected with bad memories through the smoke of the Beltaine fire, giving away things you no longer use, lightening your load, and putting your burdens aside for a dance.

*Teine, which I had misspelled.

Hi Emmon,

Some Considerations in Reconstructing Ritual and Religious Practice

Dr. James J. Duran

This paper is more an encouragement than a proof, more an exhortation than a demonstration. It deals both with the nature of evidence and with the perspectives one brings in looking at evidence while trying to construct a working hypothesis on the nature of religious form and practice in societies of the past. It comes from one who, like many others, has tried to present information to the general public on an issue both cloudy and controversial—the nature of ritual and religious practice among the pre-Christian Celts.

For the purposes of this paper, terms such as “ritual,” “religious form,” or “religious practice” will be used in a very broad sense to mean “activities intended as interactions with supernatural forces,” with primary emphasis on general regularities of form and on the general meaning of such activities to participants in the culture.

To begin, those of us who seek information on religion among the Celtic peoples usually turn first to the archaeologists and the historians. From the archaeologists, we learn that surviving material evidence can give us only limited information on non-material culture, and that much of that information may be ambiguous. For example, excavated cult sites may yield material remains of buildings, with indications of their layout, construction and use; artifacts including figurines, paintings and ritual implements; sacrificial remains, both animal and human—yet direct information on religious practice may be meager.¹ In short, the dead tell no tales.

From the historians, we learn that written documentation on crucial aspects of non-material culture may be scant or non-existent. Where it exists, it may represent the observations of those outside the culture—as in the case of the contemporary descriptions of Celtic society written by classical writers—and thus be prone to misunderstanding or bias, or else it may come from within the culture—for example, a religious inscription—but remain obscure or ambiguous in its meaning. If we try to fill in the gaps, the historian warns us that we may quickly cross over the boundary from historical reconstruction to historical fiction. An example of the latter may be cited from the May 1977 issue of National Geographic Magazine, where naked, tattooed druidesses are depicted as taking part in the killing of a Celtic divine king whose term has evidently expired.

Fortunately the situation is not as bleak as we might fear. A whole range of disciplines ranging from anthropology, folklore, comparative religion, comparative mythology, to textual criticism and ethnomusicology have offered a good deal of evidence on the nature of the non-material culture of past societies. Our ability to use this unexpected wealth of information to increase our understanding of past religious practices, however, depends a great deal both on our general openness to such evidence, and on the assumptions which guide us as we examine such evidence.

In formal and informal discussions of Celtic religion, I have encountered three main types of attitudes. The first holds that we can know only what archaeology and history offer us. If it isn't written in stone or on parchment, it isn't there. This I might call the “scripture-based fundamentalist” perspective. The second viewpoint allows that we can get a general, hazy picture of religious practice, but cautions that we can never know the details, since human nature is subject to constant variation in time and space. This I might call the “non-denominational” perspective. Finally, the third viewpoint in fact maintains that not only general forms but also details of religious practice can remain constant over tremendous stretches of time and space, so that evidence of past religious practices can be garnered not only from archaeological and historical sources, but also from present-day societies. This last point of view I might call the “orthodox” perspective, with a strong belief in “apostolic succession.” Perhaps because of my religious upbringing, I lean strongly in the last direction. Seriously, though, this matter of assumptions is of crucial importance both in selecting the evidence and in interpreting the evidence.

The anthropologists Sahllins and Service² have stressed the importance of assumptions in discussions of the evolution of human society and culture. Only recently have proponents of cultural evolution been able to again continue the work of nineteenth-century evolutionists such as E.B. Tylor and Herbert Spencer. The hiatus in scholarly activity has been due not to scholarly discreditation of the work of the nineteenth-century cultural evolutionists but to apparent prejudice against the perspectives of such scholars and the substitution of competing perspectives—perhaps no better supported by evidence—which stressed the ubiquitousness and randomness of cultural change. Individual human societies and cultures were seen not as examples of stages of evolutionary development, but as unique products of adaptations to infinitely varied geographical situations and of the chance interventions of history. The evidence, however, has shown that the nineteenth-century cultural evolutionists were in the main correct, and that quite general laws may be discerned governing—and in fact strongly constraining—the development of human society and culture. The evidence also suggests that the forms assumed by material culture strongly shape the development of non-material culture. Furthermore, the evidence suggests that the forms assumed by material and non-material culture are often amazingly stable over time and space.

What does all this mean for reconstructions of religious practices? First, we may expect to find relatively “fossilized” societies and cultures—or individual religious practices or complexes of practices—which exist today and which may give us deep insights in interpreting Celtic religious prehistory. Second, the material culture as well as the non-material culture of such societies may guide us in reconstructing the non-material culture of the Celts in general, and of their religious practices in particular. Third, the general constraints which seem to operate on the realizations of religious form in human societies would strongly limit the number of hypotheses as to what was happening in religious practice—or even why. This matter of constraints is particularly interesting because it brings up not only societal constraints in religious practice, but also individual constraints in practicing religion.

Here the “psychic unity of mankind” school of anthropological thought comes immediately to mind. Many anthropologists in the course of field work and study have felt that there is such a thing as “human nature” operating consistently in the most diverse human societies—even if the existence of such a “human nature” cannot be easily demonstrated. The linguist Noam Chomsky's work³ has also demonstrated the existence of cognitive structures—revealed through language forms—that underlie the diversity of human language. The work of epistemologist Jean Piaget on the cognitive development of the child has led in a similar direction.⁴ Interestingly, both Chomsky and Piaget suggest the possibility of symbolic systems operating separately from language.⁵ According to Chomsky, on the social level, such representational systems may strongly affect the shape of human societal forms and institutions,⁶ and on the individual level, may constrain highly what it is humanly possible to conceive of as possible forms of human activity.⁷ In short, the deep conventionality of human behavior—long ago lamented by Machiavelli—may strongly affect individual as well as group religious practice. Hence the range of hypotheses that we need consider in reconstructing religious practice—and perhaps the beliefs connected with such practices—may be relatively narrow.

Turning now to Europe, we find a variety of disciplines arguing for the continuity and coherence of material and non-material culture over broad areas of Eurasia. Tread traps, for example, used for catching deer and other animals, turn up not only in prehistoric sites, but also in present-day societies of Central and Eastern Europe. Archaeologists in the past, innocent of ethnographic information, had identified such tread traps variously as “musical instruments, a machine for making peat bricks, a model of a boat, and a device for catching pike.”⁹ Likewise, animal husbandry practices in Central and Northern Asia, due to geographical and cultural constraints, can be found fossilized at perhaps any of six possible stages of exploitation.¹⁰ In regard to non-material culture, Emsheimer has suggested that we look also for close analogues of Homeric epic song among the present-day Bardic singers of Central Asia, and Milman Parry and Albert Lord¹² have investigated the Bardic singers of Yugoslavia in order to throw light on Homeric poetry.

In the light of Alan Lomax’s revolutionary work on the close correlation of societal form and musical form, the structure of Iron-Age heroic society would lead us to expect just such similarity of musical and poetic expression among peoples widely separated in time and space,¹³ though the correlations between musical form and societal form may not extend quite as far as some Central European ethnomusicologists propose.¹⁴ Some of the most spectacular correlations between religious practice and social structure have been made by Bruce Lincoln between Indo-Iranian culture and the Iron-Age cattle cultures of East Africa,¹⁵ echoing earlier correlations by scholars between the cultures of the Interlacustrine Bantu and Old Irish society.¹⁶ If one adopts the perspective of many anthropologists and sees cultures as tight, integrated complexes of cultural traits and not as aggregates of cultural facts produced by chance, once again such strong resemblances between total cultural systems are not surprising.

Europe, despite the rapid cultural evolution of the past few centuries, retains many archaic elements, especially in peripheral areas. Linguists have long noted the great conservatism of languages such as Icelandic and Lithuanian. Marija Gimbutas¹⁷ and Donald Ward¹⁸ have pointed to the Balts as remarkably archaic in culture as well as language, a fact of great importance in the investigation of early Indo-European religion. The folklorist Carl Von Sydow has pointed to the apparent survival over millennia of certain elements of folklore,¹⁹ and the comparative religionist Mircea Eliade has argued for connections in the area of myth which link areas in Eastern Europe to archaic culture areas of North America.²⁰ Eliade, in fact, has stressed not only the world-wide conservatism of Shamanic beliefs and practices, but the survival of archaic religious cultural traits and complexes among rural populations in Eastern Europe despite centuries of Christianization.²¹ The anthropologist Weston La Barre²² has argued for the continuity of elements of Paleolithic religion in Europe—especially the deer cult—down to Celtic times. In regard to the Celtic areas, Kenneth Jackson has stressed both the archaic nature of international folk-tale motifs found in Celtic literature,²³ and also the value of early Irish tradition in revealing the psychological world of the continental Celts of a much earlier period.²⁴ Myles Dillon²⁵ has demonstrated the cultural conservatism of Ireland and India, and the fundamental unity of Indo-European non-material culture, down to details of belief and practice, as have Georges Dumézil and many others.

A Celticismist might protest that we can never know precisely what took place in the sacred groves of Gaul or Britain, when in fact the well-documented sacrifices in the clearly demarcated sacred groves of agricultural communities in Central Russia down into the twentieth century²⁶ might shed a little light on the subject. The fact that Volga Finns were performing the sacrifices need not diminish their evidential value for Indo-Europeanists or Celticismists. The cultures of the Finno-Ugric peoples—like the cultures of pre-Christian Ireland and India—might well be examples of the “conservatism of the periphery.” Recall that the proto-Indo-European word for “king” is preserved most faithfully not in any present-day Indo-European language, but in modern Finnish.²⁷

Turning directly to the Gaelic areas of Ireland and Scotland, let us look at some practices, which may in fact give us a glimpse of sacrificial practices of the pre-Christian period. As is well known, sacrifice—animal or human—came under particularly strong interdiction from the Christian church, so that the details of sacrifice are unknown to us. Yet sacrifices appear to have been carried out when great need arose, especially in Gaelic Scotland. Some of the most striking examples of animal sacrifice occurred when attempts were made to avert cattle plague. Most Gaelic scholars would be familiar with the tein eigin(n), or “need-fire,” which was kindled with great ceremony at an outbreak of cattle plague. What scholars may not be aware of is that animal sacrifice was sometimes connected to the ceremony. According to Thomas Davidson, in one district, “when a cow showed signs of madness they tied the legs of the mad creature and threw her into a pit dug at the door of the fold. After covering the hole with earth, a large fire was kindled upon it, and the rest of the cattle were driven out and forced to pass through the fire one by one.”²⁸ Other mentions of animal sacrifice are too brief to allow us to decide whether the need-fire ceremony was a part of the proceedings or not. In some cases of animal sacrifice, an ox or a cow was buried alive. In other cases, an animal was burned to death: in one case, a pig; in another case, a diseased cow; in yet another case, the farmer’s “best beast.” Whether these latter cases are in fact examples of “degenerate need-fire rituals,” as the chronology of the reported incidents suggests to Davidson, is perhaps debatable. What is interesting is the constant reference to disease, fire, and burial alive. If we turn to the essay by Donald Ward, “The Threefold Death: An Indo-European Tri-Functional Sacrifice?”²⁹ we can easily see the connection between averting disease and the burial alive of a sacrificial animal as a form of the third-function sacrifice (in the sense used by Dumézil).³⁰ The burning alive of animals is problematic, but then the burning of victims—for second-function sacrificial purposes—seems to distinguish Celtic sacrificial practices from Germanic ones.³¹ The immediate explanation of the burning of the animal itself may be practices such as the burning of the caisean-uchd, the dewlap of a cow, where “the skin is lit and the burning fumes are inhaled as a safeguard against evil influences during the year.”³² In the sacrifices connected with the teine eigin(n), we may, then, have a glimpse of a principal form of sacrifice among the pre-Christian Gaels.

What of the performers of the sacrifice? In the case of the need-fire rituals, apparently all the householders who dwelt in the affected district—usually those who dwelt between two running streams—had to take part in the kindling of the fire. Alternatively, we hear of nine times nine first-begotten sons kindling the fire. As in the sacrifices of pre-Christian Gaul, those guilty of certain offenses against the community were excluded from participation. Interestingly enough, the offenses mentioned by Davidson—failure to pay rent or honest debts, theft, meanness, or “certain offenses against good morals”³³—may be regarded as third-function offenses.

Where are the druids, vates, and bards? So far we see only the male representatives of households insofar as anyone has a prescribed role. In Vedic terms, these would be householders performing a domestic sacrifice.³⁴ In view of the well-known compromise reached by the Christian clergy with representatives of the pre-Christian intelligentsia, the aos dána, one is not surprised by the absence—or at least lack of prominence—of the bardic fraternity (or sorority, giving due recognition to the women poets as well). Participation in such events was apparently a chasm too wide for a file to leap, even with the help of Mo Ling.

Where are the priestly performers of the sacrifice: in Vedic terms, the hotr and the adhvaryu who recite the formulas and perform the ritual acts, respectively; the Sáman singers, who sing the Vedic hymns; and the Brahman himself, who embodies the sacrifice, and who sits to one side, doing nothing but watching to see that no ritual mistakes are made?³⁵ It is in the innocuous secular context of an Irish poetic recitation that we must look in order to find a structure similar to that of a Vedic sacrificial ritual: a reciter or performer of the poem, a harper to provide musical accompaniment, and the poet himself, the composer of the poem and the occasion of the entire performance, sitting to one side, remaining silent and seeing only that no mistakes were made.³⁶

What of the liturgy itself? What of the equivalents of the Vedic hymns? If we look at the Irish Christian liturgical parallels to the Avestan hymns to Mithras, we find the apparent conservation of proto-Indo-European forms—over a tremendous range of time and space—both in Ireland and Iran, despite changes in religions in both countries.³⁷ If we accept this conservation of form as a distinct possibility, it may be that we need go no further than the prayers and charms preserved in Carmichael's Carmina Gadelica, examined in the light of religious texts from the other parts of the Indo-European world, to get a good idea of just what kinds of prayers might be recited at sacrifices.

Speaking of the Carmina Gadelica, it is possible that an item from Carmichael's collection might throw some light on the practice of imbas forasnai. Cormac in his glossary describes this rite as a way of gaining supernatural sight; "the diviner 'chants over his palms' and 'puts his palms on his cheeks' before going to sleep."³⁸ O'Rahilly sees this as a "fanciful etymology," based on a combination of the morphological elements imb and bos/bas, "palm." In fact there is a rite with an accompanying prayer called the *Ora Cearta*s described by Carmichael in his Carmina Gadelica which seems to involve "chanting over palms."³⁹ A litigant in a court case desiring a favorable outcome

...went at morning dawn to a place where three streams met. And as the rising sun gilded the mountain crests, the man placed his two palms edgewise together and filled them with water from the junction of the streams. Dipping his face into this improvised basin, he fervently repeated the prayer, after which he made his way to the court, feeling strong in the justice of his cause. On entering the court and on looking around the room, the applicant for justice mentally, sometimes in an undertone, said

Dhé, seun an teach
Bho stéigh gu fraigh;
M' fheart os cinn
gach neach,
Fheart gach neach fo m' thraigh.

God sain the house
From site to summit
My word above
every person
The word of every person
below my foot.⁴⁰

That the litigant saw himself as something other than a devout Christian supplicant for divine aid and Justice is suggested by the following lines from one of the versions of the prayer:

Falbhaidh mui
an amine Dhé,
An riochd féidh,
an riochd each,
An riochd nathrach,
an riochd righ,
Is treasa liom
fin na gach neach.

I will travel
in the name of God,
In likeness of deer,
in likeness of horse,
In likeness of serpent,
in likeness of king,
Stronger will it be with me
than with all persons.⁴¹

Could this reflect the prayer of a breitheamh on his way to a legal dispute—part of the spiritual weaponry carried by brehon lawyers all the way back to the powerful magistrates of Caesar's Gaul? Do we hear echoes of Amairgen among the sons of Míl Espáne⁴² and of Dumézil's cosmic Brahman, who in his person encompasses the universe?⁴³

Lest we leave the stream empty-handed, we may also note that "when Finn got the power of divination 'on the Boyne,' he at the same time acquired the power of healing anyone in sickness by giving him a drink of water from the palms of his hands."⁴⁴

It might be objected that we have talked about religious practices and said little about their meaning. That is true, but here I am following the advice of the anthropologist Radcliffe Brown, who long ago stressed the autonomy of rites and beliefs.⁴⁵ Ritual forms—like traits of material culture—can be described even when they are not well understood, though it would be rash to say that they could be properly described without any reference to meaning. In fact, the participants in any ritual might give the most varied accounts of why, ultimately, they are doing what they are doing, depending on their differing backgrounds.

The description of the structure of the belief systems which provide the psychological context for ritual acts is of another order entirely. The cultural materialist position of the anthropologist Marvin Harris⁴⁶ may prove very useful in describing why religious taboos are introduced to forbid the eating of pork or beef in given societies at given historical periods; it may prove less useful in explaining why a king must sleep with his feet in the lap of a virgin.

Fortunately, Georges Dumézil, Mircea Eliade, and many others have contributed massively to the understanding of religious belief and social ideology, with primary emphasis on the meaning of the forms described. Folklorists dealing with the märchen have also explored a psychological world close to that of myth as embedded in religion. I have simply advocated exploring the world between the higher atmosphere of psychological abstraction and the dross of material culture—that world inhabited by the sidhe in Gaelic tradition and the ancestors in Vedic tradition.

In summary, then, if we adopt a common-sense framework of general cultural evolution as a working hypothesis, and if we do not burden ourselves with unexamined assumptions, we may find that a lot of the evidence we need for the reconstruction of the past exists in abundance. Within this framework, emphasizing continuity in time and space, and the coherence of individual beliefs and practices within overall systems, it may be possible to sketch the main outlines of the structure of religious practice—and even of the general beliefs motivating it. We may further find, once the main outlines have been delineated, that filling in the details may be easier than we had imagined.

Some might object to this “armchair ethnology.” In that regard, let me close with a little story.

When I was studying at Duquesne University, my African roommate returned shaken from class one day. I asked him what was wrong. He replied that in his anthropology class, the teacher, in discussing Van Gennep’s Les Rites de Passage, had, revealed much of the central content of the circumcision ceremonies in my roommate’s home country—all highly secret information. He laughed then—the anthropological field workers, in their efforts to obtain information on the ceremonies, had time and again been deliberately misled by native informants. Van Gennep, however, abstracting from the second-hand accounts of circumcision ceremonies available to him, and constructing a hypothetical version of an idealized circumcision ceremony, had hit the mark.

Accordingly, to use a couple of Irish phrases, I have made this spreagadh chun gnimh, this “urging to action,” in the hope that you, like Van Gennep, will take a shot in the dark, and that your shots will not be an urchar an daill chun na daibhche—“the cast of a blind man at a vat.”

The Heathen on the Heath:

Life and Death

My son’s cat, Boadicia (a proper battle-queen, with knives on her chariot wheels) has just brought forth four mewling heirs to her warlike throne. They rest in a box that once held frying chickens, and think happy thoughts.

My son is the proud one: Bo is a little confused. Who will ye marry on Beltaine day? When the tomcat comes around, she wants to kill him. And I watch the little princes and princesses as anxiously as she does, remembering my own little wonders, which had to be rescued from my incompetent womb by men with blades, rubber gloves, and endless dials and gauges. The door into this world swings both ways...

Check on the kittens,” Daniel says. “I’m not sure Bo won’t take them out of the box and put ‘em back in Olin’s bed.” I do not yet interrupt a system that a mother cat doubtless understands better than I do, however young and inexperienced she may be. So when my eyes finish opening, I use my spy-hole—a gap between the boards in the wall of my son’s room, visible from the ladder to the loft.

My glasses are still in a kitchen drawer, but I can make out an indistinct Bo-and-kitties blob, and a smaller orange blob off to one side. Rattiness has already given way to the audacity of fur.

The fuzzy reddish blot does not move. I hear a small, grunting noise. Perhaps it has moved aside to answer a call of nature, and is awaiting the fullness of time. I am barely awake. I do not want to know more.

Coffee. The horse needs her hay. Dogs trip me; ducks laugh. I don’t think about the perils of fertility. The hell I don’t! I do not snare Bo’s touching faith in the universe: her first heat simply pre-dated my being able to afford to spay her. My male animals remain as they are, for the sake of the élan that their altered counterparts seem to lack. But I know what my female critters would be missing—urgency, pain, birth. And motherhood, the one solid joy among all of them, presents an overpopulated world with another potentially homeless child. No, not homeless! If no one else takes the little ones, I do. A stray once offered me a real deal on puppies does anybody wants one?

I ‘m putting it off. Something has either gone wrong in that box, or it hasn’t. I will either look, congratulate Bo again, and then relax and have breakfast, or I will spare Bo the pain of further association with the corpse of her child.

I will look, but not too closely. My glasses remain in the drawer.

The orange one is still there, still motionless. May it nurse at the undying teats of Earth, How big it is, handsome and furry. It sits in an attitude of guardianship, watching over Bo’s unconcerned sleep...with huge...exactly round pale...plastic...eyes.

The devilishly grinning toy Garfield that Olin set in attendance on them is doing his job.

Once again I have been a human, empowered and therefore a klutz. That which has escaped my control is doing just fine, thank you, without respect for my megalomaniac and overprotected neuroses. Once again I have peered tremblingly into the face of the Mother, expecting to see death, and found instead the tentative whimsy of love. Sometimes worship is humility. Sometimes worship is as rich and private as a stolen kiss. And sometimes worship consists simply in letting go of responsibilities that don’t belong to you. My son already knew that. I have just been shown.

Even when life is fragile, it is not brittle: we invented brittleness. With what do we replace our innocence? What playful and unnecessary gift do we have for the May-bridal and summer-birth? For they will be celebrated in spite of us, even up to the day when life is no more. There is a time to do battle against the destructiveness of power, and a time to simply let go of power and join in the party.

For reasons beyond our ken, She did invite us.

Happy Beltaine, Folks!
—Love,
Les”

Letter from the Editor

I take issue with your statements about your birth experience. Don't blame yourself! It's been shown the fear hospitals inspire and the drugs they administer can cause insufficient dilation and a host of other troubles. Sharon, a midwife, and a member, has done successful home deliveries for women who have been sectioned by the A.M.A. before on some such pretext. And SI certainly wouldn't call those boys "rescuers." It's anti-women and pro-A.M.A., a chauvinist bunch of liars if ever there was one. Don't be so hard on yourself; you did not have a real chance to show what you could do. And watch out about being talked into a hysterectomy by the same boys. It is the latest fad in American medicine, so much so that a European Medical Journal wrote a scathing article warning people about it. Lottie Straus, a renegade doctor I see occasionally, says that two thirds of these operations are unnecessary. They are nicknamed a "potboiler" for young ob-gyns in need of the money. The rationale being "It doesn't matter."

Discover a World of Variety at Traditional Arts Programs

By Holly Tannen

The inhabitants of the Bay Area reflect the rich cultural diversity of the world. Each Saturday in Wattis Hall a free Traditional Arts program offers museum visitors a chance to share the music, dance, handicrafts, or food of one of the world's many diverse and colorful ethnic groups. Traditional Arts programs are funded by a grant from the Paul L. and Phyllis Wattis Foundation. All programs begin at 1:00 pm.

May 7—To welcome in the month of May, Holly Tannen sings traditional Maying songs associated with English and Irish seasonal customs and festivals, accompanying herself on the Appalachian mountain dulcimer. The program ends with ballads of the "traveling people," or tinkers, of Scotland. Holly will teach the choruses—so come prepared to Sing!

May 14—No Program

May 21—Altamira is a talented trio from South America who perform the indigenous music and songs of the coastal and Andean regions of Colombia and Venezuela. Maria Marquez, Claudia Gomez, and Michael Spiro play a variety of percussion instruments including bells, drums, claves, maracas, rattles, and triangle as well as guitar.

May 28—Willy Claflin entertains us with a mixed-media program, entitled 'Mother Moose Tales'—a slightly off-beat version of updated Grimm's 'fairs' stories, nursery rhymes, and moose creation myths. Willy is joined by a few of his puppet friends, including Maynard Moose, Sir Douglass Doormoose, and Dr. Albert Alligator.

News of the Groves

As you've seen by the clear type and lack of skipped letters, we have a new electric typewriter, kindly loaned to us by Stacey Weinberger. Many thanks and much credit and good fortune in the future and in the Other World. If you're enjoying the lack of eyestrain, this is who to thank—send good energy.

One of our members in the "Ozark State" writes:

We are currently being harassed by people claiming to be from the Southern Baptists, as my roommate has a stone circle on her back property. They have come to the door frequently inquiring as to our beliefs, ("Inquiring minds want to know!") and wondering whether or not we believe in Hell, (hell, no!) the Devil, (Oh, Yes, you mean that senile Irishman named Reagan?) and such, including the jewel: "What would you say to God if you were standing in front of his throne?" (What an assumption!) What's left to say? "Who's your metal smith?"

Yes, Virginia, there is an Inquisition!!

I found out that some people claiming to be from the Arkansas Baptist group have struck a deal with the Little Rock Public Library, the University of Arkansas, and other colleges here to take down, discard and destroy all books pertaining to witchcraft, Wicca and Neopaganism, including many, many anthropology books such as The Problem of the Picts, and A History of Witchcraft in Scotland. These two were saved from extinction by a friend.

Another group, also calling themselves members of the Southern Baptist Convention, is threatening to have the libraries' funding cut if they don't cooperate quietly.

Fascism lives on in Arkansas.

Day of the Living Dead Plants

Plants, flowers and trees* that never need watering! Secret? They're preserved with non-toxic chemicals, absorbed by the plants' cells. And they look, feel and smell like the real thing.

How about no-feed-'em pets? And I don't want to be around when they get around to people.

If you really want to do something real and necessary, the offer of puppies in this article was not just for comic relief, although the puppies themselves are clowns par excellence. Vamp, Tammy Faye, and Spooky Boots are about four months old, housebroken, livestock-trained, and very loving, but would do better in one-dog houses. Anyone who wants one call 707-943-3411 any day except Wed. or Fri. and set up delivery. Breed: Panther Gap Piggy Bouncer, having a gait like a kid on a pogo stick and all vocalizations of both dog and pig.

And in two or three months, we're having a special on kittens.

Oh, and all of you do your dandiest to let folks know that the so-called "Hungry and Homeless Initiative," for all its excellent liberal credentials, would have the effect of virtually outlawing country life for any but the very wealthy. City building codes are almost impossible to meet out beyond the power lines, and that is what the standardized state code would be. Not to mention the fact that 'Californians Working Together,' if you read the non-celebrity and corporate names on the list, sounds an awful lot like Repo Realty, Inc. The notion originates in Los Angeles, and if you have any publicity contacts, or even loud mouthed friends, down there, that's the place to push hard. In the meanwhile, let's all write to the papers, in the hopes that one of our letters will get printed. If we want to 'vote' for the homeless, we can give a few dollars to our local shelters, and wait for them to send their legislation back through with the bugs worked out of it, instead of letting some L.A. realtors outlaw the family farm while they're at it.

Enough gossip for now. Oh, and the # is my work #. If it takes me a while to get there, it's probably because of wet hands.

Love,
Les

Summer Solstice Essay: Danu and Stonehenge

By Emmon Bodfish

idsummer Solstice, one of the four minor High Days of the Reformed Druid Calendar, is associated with the Celtic Goddess Danu, Mother of the Gods, the Tuath de Danann. She is particularly associated with rivers, and rivers from the Don in Russia to the Don in Scotland are named for Her. She is probably the same figure as the Irish Goddess, Anu, and the Bretons' Ana. Roman Diana and Greek Artemis may be other cognates of this Pan-Indo-European deity. These theories are based on the study of word origins, and on the witness of Gallo-Roman writers of the period who noted the similarities in character, rituals, and Seasons of Worship between Danu and Diana. These primary historical sources, written when the Celtic religion was still practiced in Gaul, corroborate the evidence from linguistic studies.

Like Roman Diana, Danu's totem is the boar, an animal also associated with a female agricultural deity in the Balkans. Danu, like Frigga of the Germans, presides over marriage and fertility. The luckiness of June weddings may be a distant memory of Her festivities. This may have been the month for Old Celtic weddings, too. Not by chance is Oimelc, the festival of the midwife, celebrated nine months later.

The mugwort is Danu's herb and symbol. This herb was also associated with Roman Diana. But Danu, and not Diana, is also associated with the sheaf of ripe grain, connecting Her with the other Mother and Grain Goddess of pagan Europe. On the Isle of Man it is customary to wear a sprig of mugwort to the Midsummer dance, and in England young women place a bundle of the herb under their pillows on Midsummer's Night to bring dreams of their future husbands.¹

Midsummer morning is the morning on which the first rays of the Sun used to rise over the heel stone at Stonehenge, thus beginning the new season in the Megalithic calendar. It no longer rises at that point owing to the precession of the Earth's axis, but celebrations are held there, anyway.

The Druids did NOT build Stonehenge. It antedates their arrival in Britain by centuries. It was William Stukeley in 1717 who mislocated the Druids there. He did some of the best archeological field work of his day, but his theorizing later wildly outstripped his data. The mistake was an honest one, however, considering what was known in his time. He showed that the stones were not a memorial to King Arthur nor a Roman temple, the two then common theories. He was the first to establish the monument as definitely pre-Roman. The only knowledge of pre-Roman Britain he had came from Roman and Greek writers of the Classical Period. They said that Britain was inhabited by Celts whose priests were the Druids. So, if the stones were older than any Roman constructions, Stukeley reasoned, they must have been put there by Druids. He knew of no other candidates. But in the last two centuries, archeology has provided us with many, even too many other possibilities. The currently favored candidates are the early Neolithic farmers of Natufian stock, long-headed; slender, fine-boned people who inhabited the Salisbury area from 2900-2500 BC coinciding with the most accurate modern date for the first cycle of building at Stonehenge. A larger boned harder people later took over the monument and set up the Blue Stones, but they too had disappeared before the arrival of the Celts around 480, B.C.

This is not to say that the Celts did not take cognizance of the huge stones. They worked monuments of other prehistoric peoples into their mythology and song. Numerous Bardic compositions refer to the Sidhe Mounds of Ireland and the Carnes of Scotland as sacred places and the long abandoned abodes of the Gods. They may have done the same for Stonehenge, but the English traditions and Bardic works were almost all lost, while the Irish are among the best preserved of any oral lore.

"Behold the Sidh before your eyes. It is manifest to you that it is a king's mansion, Which was built by the firm Dagda. It is a wonder, a court, an admirable hill."

"The Sidh of Donegal"

a seminar by Prof. Duran

Two or more different groups of peoples, sharing the same or similar astronomically oriented beliefs, contributed to the five cycles of construction and reconstruction at Stonehenge. Theirs was a fairly sophisticated culture for the time. They knew that the Solstices, eclipses of the Moon, and the courses of the stars were regular predictable events. Their stone moving techniques were on a par with the times. Though not aligned accurately enough for an "observatory" in the modern sense, the stones can serve as a calendar rectifier, an eclipse predictor, and, of course, as a ritual site for religious ceremonies. But what those religions were must remain a matter of conjecture. Clearly they had something to do with sunrise, Midsummer Solstice, moonrise, and lunar eclipses, but what they meant, and what the people did there, is probably not recoverable. As Clannad sing "Forgotten is the race that no one knows."²

¹A friend of mine tried the experiment of putting mugwort under her pillow, but reported she had no dreams at all. "I guess I'm just going to stay single." She is still fancy-free three years later. If anyone wants to try this, you can get mugwort in most herb shops. Send in your results and we'll publish them for Lughnasadh.

Letter to the Editor

Here is a letter from Prof. James Duran, whose paper, "Some Considerations in Reconstructing Ritual and Religious Practice," we discussed last time.

2 May 1988

Hi Emmon—

The shortest of notes—I'm glad you liked the paper—I have no plans to publish yet—at least not in the area of comparative religion for a while. I have a backlog of linguistic stuff to get out.

On applied comparative religion, I hope no one starts burying animals as offerings to a god of fertility—cruelty to animals is entirely unnecessary. Among the East African tribes even a cucumber can be offered for sacrifice as "cattle", substituting for the real thing. (Lincoln, p. 31) Models of clay, cheese, etc. could do the trick, also. Note how modern Hindus have handled the question of animal sacrifice.

My best to everyone!

Beannacht na Déithe oraibhe!

Reviews of Books on Megaliths

Although the Druids did NOT build Stone Henge, there is now a book out about the people who did. It's titled The Stone Henge People, by Rodney Castleden, published by Rutledge and Kegan Paul, London. It is archeology, but chatty in style with drawings of how the barrows and some of the other structures may have looked when they were being used, 4700 - 2000 BC.

If you can't find it locally, write Shambala Books, 2482 Telegraph Avenue, Berkeley, Calif. 94704

Another book along the same lines but more technical is John Wood's Sun, Moon and Standing Stones, printed by Oxford University Press. This is professional archeology, and has some good photographs of the stone circles, but a rather dry point of view. Good data if you want to argue with someone.

The Stone Circles of the British Isles is the big glossy coffee table version of a megalith book. It's by Aubrey Burl and published by Yale University Press 1976, and replete with photographs and charts. Expensive, but good if you can pick it up used.

Megaliths and Masterminds is less costly, no photos, except on the dust jacket, but has a much more readable style than the University Press books. Author Peter Lancaster Brown takes an astronomical point of view, and expands his thesis to connect with the Egyptians, the Persians, and the Mayan Quetzalcoatl myth. It was published in 1979 by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

On the Irish side, Clare O'Kelly's paperback Illustrated Guide to New Grange, gives good photos and information, inexpensively. It includes many of the other Boyne monuments, and gives descriptions and measurements, but no theory. John English and Co. Ltd., Wexford, England, 1978.

From the more Neo-Pagan Perspective...

Nigel Pennick's The Ancient Science Of Geomancy, has a lot of good photos, and a world-wide perspective. It's good reading but remember that it is Mr. Pennick's theory. Thames and Hudson, 1979

Moving even farther out is Janet and Cohn Bord's book Ancient Mysteries of Britain. This couple have written a number of psychic books and guide or travel articles. The photos and the completeness of the coverage should interest even those not interested in Earth magic or the religions of the ancients. Many of the smaller stone monuments are included here that are not usually dealt with and so are little known and visited. Use it for a non-touristy itinerary of ancient sites if you are going to the British Isles.

The Ancient Stones Speak is a paperback, well illustrated with photos, and definitely written from the psychic perspective. It catalogues David D. Zink's travels to stone monuments around the world, his theories, his reactions, the local myths, astronomical alignments, and quotes from archeological studies. Extreme in its opinions, you'll like or hate it. E.P. Dutton, New York, 1979

Farther out, theory-wise, and in a psychic style is Francis Hitching's book, Earth Magic. She comes out of the Ley Line school of thought, and the book is mainly her and other Psychics' personal experiences with the ancient stones. She has a quick, readable style. It's in paperback by Pocket Books, New York, 1976.

Gerald Hawkin's master work, Stone Henge Decoded, is both technical and controversial. It is an old stand-by in the field, and was the first break-through book in the new reassessment of the stone monuments of Britain and Europe. It's out in paperback, in many libraries, and you should at least skim through it if you are seriously interest in Megaliths. London, 1966.

In much the same vein is A. Thom's book Megalithic Sites. He is a professional astronomer, and the inventor of the term "the megalithic yard." He has written numbers of articles in professional journals, and several other books about his theories about the builders of the stone circles. I'd put him midway between the scientists and the psychics, and very readable. Oxford Press, 1967

Ward Rutherford, author of The Druids, Magicians of the West, has published a new book Shaman, which, though not entirely about Druids, has some good material on Eurasian shamanism and its connections with Druidism, the Celts, and their Proto-Indo-European roots. I would take with a cautious grain of salt Mr. Rutherford's interpretations of the old myths—Celtic, Greek, and others—as they are very speculative and subjective. These ancient themes and religious myths are like Rorschach blots: archetypes in which you see what is pertinent to your mind and needs. Here, I think, we learn more about Ward Rutherford's character and the concerns currently obsessing our own times than about the ancient authors of the myths. The material on Euro-Siberian shamans and their practices is good, as are the parallels he traces in shamanic practices from other parts of the world.

Shamanic roots of Celtic Druidism plus insights into Ward's unconscious. $12.95 Pyramid Books, 214 Derby St. (Box 48) Salem, MA 01970.

Practical Paganism

Caring for Your Own Dead Lisa Carlson, Upper Access Publishers, Hinesburg Vermont. This is a book you should look into if you want a Druid or Pagan funeral, or just want to avoid the bad atmosphere and poor taste of funeral parlors' pseudo-Christian kitsch.

When Lisa Carlson's husband died, she was not only grief stricken but broke. So following the autopsy, she purchased a $60 pine box, obtained a local transit permit, and carried his body to a Vermont crematory in a pickup truck.. The experience eventually led her to write a book to help people in similar circumstances. She writes: "By assuming some control, a family can personalize the death experience and make it meaningful." "If my husband's body had gotten into the hands of professionals, it would have been much harder to let him go." Your involvement will be severely limited if you go to the funeral industry, despite what they may say in selling you their package. We speak from personal experience. Although Carlson says her book has not met with hostility from the funeral directors (still too few people are actually doing personal funerals to bother them) she did have to deal with an incipient hassle from the state medical examiners office. Be ready with the correct placating procedures.

Lughnasadh Essay: Summer Games

By Emmon Bodfish

Originally a celebration of the funeral games held by Lugh, Celtic god of light for his father the Sun, Lughnasadh marks the Sun's position half way between Solstice and Equinox. By now, usually August sixth or seventh, the day's length is noticeably shortened. The sun, re-born on December 22, is in decline, and the season of the harvest, Foghamhar, is coming. This High Day marked the beginning of the harvest in pre-industrial times, and in Druidic times was known as the Festival of the First Fruits. Cutting of the new grain could begin, and "hungry July" was over. In the Celtic countries, this middle-of-the-summer festival is still marked by The Races in Ireland, the Revels in Wales, and the highland Games in Scotland. In a livestock-raising culture like that of the Iron Age Celts, this was the most likely time of market faires and regional gatherings. The calves of the spring were old enough to sell or trade. Likewise the sheep would have been sheared and the lambs were old enough to be bartered. This was a festival of the Tuath, the largest class in the Celtic society, comprised of the farmers, craftsmen and merchants. The other two classes were the Warriors and the Clergy, which last included Bards, Ovates, Filidhs and Druids, their students and retainers.

In the Neo-Pagan R.D.N.A. tradition, anyone who has a garden or grows anything, should save the first picked produce of the summer season and bring it, or a portion of it to the Lughnasadh celebration to be offered along with the Grove Sacrifice and hopes and prayers of prosperity to come.

The Coligny Celtic Calendar

All thanks to the Editor of CARN for this opportunity to attract the attention of its keltic minded readers to OUR wonderful and much overlooked Coligny Calendar. This unique bronze tablet provides us with our forefathers' astonishing astronomical knowledge but still more with their extremely original and highly synthetic philosophical system.

This unique bronze exemplar was unearthed at the turn of this century near Coligny, Jura, Free-County of Burgundy. It was broken into many fragments. Whatever was retrieved is kept in the Museum of Lyons. It was immediately noticed that its language was undoubtedly keltic—but consisted mostly of abbreviations which so far have resisted clear understanding. Its roman lettering shows it to have been engraved (in defiance of druidic teaching) at the beginning of the common era, when indeed Druidic teaching on the Continent must have been already much shaken.

The first and magnificent breakthrough in attempts to unveil its secrets was achieved by the late Eoin Mac Néill and published at the end of the thirties (in English) in the Irish review Eriu. He discovered the recurrent rules governing it, permutations and coherent intricacies, which "knit" the whole calendrical

Period into one piece, and was thus able to give a safe reconstruction of the whole. Yet the meanings of these coherent mechanisms have also so far resisted clear understanding. Further progress was achieved by the present writer and prematurely published (in French) in the German Zeitschrift für keltische Philologie in the year 1942. It established the correspondence with the modern common Calendar, fixing in modern terms the beginnings of Periods, years, months (and days), and showed their perfect agreement with the gist of the druidic philosophy as described by the well-informed Caesar in his "Gaulish War"—"The druids teach that night has precedence over day".

The Calendar's general constitution can be thus briefly stated:

- a) 30 days congregate to make a "complete" month (and 29 to make an "incomplete" one).
- b) 60 months (plus two built-up "complementary" ones) congregate to make the calendrical Period.
- c) the Period divides into five years.
- d) the year divides into twelve months. Hereafter from memory their names and rough correspondences:

SAMON—(30 days) October;

DVMANN—(20 days) November;

RVRO—(30 days) December;

ANAGANT—(29 days) January;

OGRON—(30 days) February;

CVTIOS—(30 days) March;

GIAMON—(29 days) April;

SEMIVISONN—(30 days) May;

EQVOS—(28-30 days) June;

ELEMBIV—(29 days) July;

AEDRIN—(30 days) August;

CANTLO—(29 days) September.

When the sixty-month Period was finished, another one was obviously introduced. Actually, this writer got it printed and roneotyped every year from VIII to XVII (1950-51) without finding it to depart one day from its Sun-and-Moon astronomical system. Due to lack of space there is no question of giving here even a brief comprehensive account of the Coligny Calendar. I shall only dwell on the six following points which I assume to be within the interests of the general CARN reader and I shall rest most pleased if I have awakened their wish to inform themselves better about it: The Coligny Calendar is highly scientific, eminently practical, linguistically keltic, philosophically druidic, knitting time into one synthetic unit, and requiring a very elaborate astronomical central observatory.

I. Highly Scientific:

Anyone who is an old jailbird has noticed on the whitewashed cell walls the frequency among graffiti of the groups of vertical small bars (generally in fours or in sixes) cut across by a long horizontal one. This was the spontaneous way for prisoners to keep account of the passage of time in their complete absence of information. I call it an unscientific system. Such is the seven-day week which bravely ploughs its way through all times, months, years and calendrical systems with no reference to Astronomy. Yet although it is very simple (=giam) the seven-night week is, of course, very ancient among us, most stable, and native to us Kelts (and also to the Teutons) contrary to the current opinion.

The modern common calendar is only semi-scientific as it knows only solar time. The years are kept adjusted to the Astronomy of the sun. But though it mentions months, these are merely relics bravely ploughing their way without any reference to the Astronomy of the moon.

The keltic calendar is highly scientific: It keeps a joint account of both the solar and lunar astronomical times.

II. Eminently Practical:

The months begin with the last quarter of the moon. The new moon occurs on the seventh or eighth. The first quarter on the fifteenth (uniformly marked ATENOUX) and the full moon on the 22 or 23rd of every month. Therefore a quick glance at the shape of the moon allows one to say: "To-day is the 13th of the current month". As for this month, one would know it by noting at any time around noon where one's shadow extends on any bit of flat ground and measuring it with one's feet as children do: The number of feet would reveal to him what is the current month. His noon shadow is longest in December and shortest in June, to grow again to its December length. Actually, the decreasing April shadow would be about the same length as the growing August one; and so on. But a quick glance at the surrounding vegetation would differentiate April from August, March from September, etc., so that with a good degree of accuracy anyone with no other information could say: "To-day is the 13th of the month Giamon of the current year." I would challenge anyone using the common calendar with no watch, no sundial, no radio, no reading and no writing to achieve the same and to be able to announce: "To-day is April 23 in the current year."

III. Linguistically Keltic:

There are only slight differences between the Coligny dialect of Keltic and the contemporary insular Keltic. For example, the "second" is rendered "ALLOS", as on the La Graufesenque graffiti in Southern France, whereas all modern Keltic languages go back to a form of "ALIOS".

Its use of the letter Q for a K-sound has resulted in a lot of eminent learned stupidities about Gaelic, Sequana, prekeltic, etc., rivaling the Big Bang, the Expanding Universe, and the brilliant Einsteinian duds. In fact, I realized before 1945 that this Q had no more meaning than in the French names "République, Amérique, etc." beside the adjectives "républicain, Américain, etc." and was due to the already uncertain pronunciation of the classical Latin C. Latin had no K. Thus we find the month CVTIOS generally written, but occasionally QVTIOS. And the word Ki meaning "here, this here" appears once as CI [CI ALLOS B. = Here the second (half-Period?)] and once as QVI [IN QVI MON. = in this here (lunar month?)]. Space compels me to stop here, KI!

IV. Philosophically Druidic:

All time intervals: Period, years, months (and days by extension) are divided into two halves. To the first half (or at least its beginning) belongs obscurity and cold. To the second half belongs light and eventually warmth, according to Caesar's and Pliny's druidic dictum "The druids teach that the night (and winter = giam) has precedence over daylight (and summer = sam)."

The first half-period consists of 30 months, a "month of months," and is headed by one of the two complementary months. It begins with a SAMON month introducing winter. The second half-period, similarly a month of months and similarly headed by the second complementary month, begins with a GIAMON month introducing a summer.

The five years, clearly indicated by the fivefold repetition of the twelve monthly names, are bipartitioned by alternating SAMON (roughly October) and GIAMON (roughly April) with the winters coming first.

All months are similarly bipartitioned by the word ATENOVX (taken to mean "re-shaping", of the half-moon shape which began the month). Their first half, from the last quarter to the first quarter, consists of the obscure moonless nights of the new moon. Their second half consists of the full moon and all the long-moonlit nights.

The same rule of giam-sam allows us to conclude that the day length began towards sunset, with the night as first half, and the daylight as second half.

This precedence of giam over sam allows us also to understand why the Kelts (and also the Teutons) counted time and age by nights and winters, contrary to all Mediterranean usage. Cf. also such linguistic relics as the English word "fortnight" for two weeks, and the French "huitaine" and "quinzaine" (of days) for a seven-night week and two weeks.

V. Intricately Knitted into a Synthetic Unit:

Those coherent mechanisms of permutations and borrowing of days between months and years are too long to be developed here. Let the reader refer to their discoverer Eoin Mac Néill. Only one remark: The month SAMON which begins the winter half of the year borrows its name from the preceding Summer (SAM-) and similarly the month GIAMON borrows its name from the preceding winter (GIAM-).

VI. Requiring a Very Elaborate Astronomical Central Observatory:

All calendrical systems of astronomical nature need astronomical observation to prevent them from going astray. This is due to one main cause, plus a subsidiary one:

a) the real mean yearlength, monthlength, daylength are not in rational relations with one another. It is therefore impossible to express them as fractions or multiples of one another. Every calendrical astronomical system will thus necessarily introduce slight discrepancies which, in the long run, will put it out of gear.

b) Yearlength and other lengths are not exactly static. It is known that our present monthlength and daylength are very slowly increasing, whereas present yearlength is probably very slowly decreasing.

For these two reasons, every astronomical calendrical system required continuous astronomical observation to put it right from time to time. We are all familiar with the common solar calendar adding of a day to the year every four years; then there is the retrenchment of a day every century or so, and there is an endless (and changing) series of other corrections every millennium and so on.

Yet the common calendar takes account of the Sun only. When the calendar takes account of the Moon as well, as does the druidic calendar, the need for accurate and centralized astronomical observation gets compounded. Since it was in the charge of our druids, they must have used one central observatory necessarily of a monumental nature and not inconsiderable fame. That it was Stonehenge in Wiltshire has been established in great detail by the present writer and published (in Breton) in the review Ar Bed Keltiek (after 1966)

(An English version ready since 1966 still awaits a publisher.) This last assertion has two important sequels:

- a) Stonehenge has been in astronomical operation until the days of the Roman conquest of Southern Britain.
- b) the druidic Calendar—known from the unique bronze tablet engraved around year zero—had been in use for at least one to two millennia, since the central rings and horseshoes of stones in Stonehenge were built for its astronomical control.

Conclusion:

In view of its scientific nature, coherence, practicality, regular intricacies, exactitude, extreme originality and all superior characteristics, not too mention its age, I have no hesitation whatsoever in proclaiming this Calendar to be one of the main marvels of the human World—a marvel which ought to make us modern Kelts feel as proud as peacocks. Alas! Neven Henaff.

P.S. A Newly-Spotted Elaboration in the Coligny Calendar (June 1977, Coolock)

Apart from desinence -(i)OS, months 3, 6, 9, 12 have one syllable. Preceding months 2, 5, 11 (but not 8 SEMI-VISOON) have two syllables. Still preceding months 4, 10, (but not SAMON and GIAMON) have three syllables. This is too much to be just blind chance, SAMON and GIAMON having outstanding functions can well be admitted to get outstanding treatment. Only SEMIVISONN is not accountable. I take it to be a nickname (= Mid-Spring) which has displaced the original two-syllable name (possibly just VISONN = Spring). Compare similar treatment with modern “November”: Welsh “Tackwydd,” nicknamed the black month, Mys Du. Breton knows only the nickname Miz Du. Similarly with “December”. This shows the druids to have been particularly concerned with arithmetic.

Here is the well-known Celticist, Stuart Piggot's recent synopsis of the current archeological opinion about Ancient Celtic civilization. We include it here as part of our listing of Piggot's latest offering Scotland Before History, Edinburgh University Press, 1923. It is a good nutshell description of material culture of the Old Celts, a place to start reading, something for which we are often asked here at the Missal-Any. Keep in mind that it is one man's opinion.—Editor

The Structure of Society

By Stuart Piggott

somewhere near the Antonine Wall, we do not yet know.

Let us now try to put together the various pieces of evidence, and see what description we can give of the land and people of prehistoric Scotland at the moment of entering the phase of written history when the Roman military forces arrived in AD 80. What manner of men and what conditions did Agricola encounter? To answer this question we can use not only the evidence of archaeology, but that of the classical writers, of the Irish oral tradition committed to writing in early mediaeval times, of the survival of Celtic institutions down to the same period, and inferences from comparative philology.

Though, over the space of three thousand years, an appreciable amount of natural woodland would have been cleared by agriculture or grazing, great tracts of the landscape must still have been heavily wooded, in areas where now there stretches bog or moorland, as well as in what is today arable and settled land. The chariot warfare, which we know the Celts to have practiced in Scotland as elsewhere, implies the existence of areas of at least relatively open parkland to allow for such chariot maneuvers to have taken place, even if some of the forest clearance was caused by grazing rather than by cultivation.

When considering the population we must remember that, although at least a ruling class of Celtic-speaking peoples was established in many regions of Scotland by the first century AD, this did not mean the extermination of the previous inhabitants, whose ancestry went back to the days of Cairnpapple and Skara Brae, and to the fishers and boatmen of Oronsay or the Forth shore. Linguistically, for instance, the Gallo-Brittonic dialects could have existed side by side with other tongues now wholly unknown and perhaps numerous and varied—the Australian aborigines, some 200,000 strong when first discovered, were speaking more than 500 languages and dialects. Out of the 38 native names recorded in Scotland in the second century AD by the geographer Ptolemy, only 42 per cent are certainly or probably Celtic. As usual, it is the names of natural features which survive the longest—only 35 percent of these are Celtic, as against the 53 percent among the names of tribes and settlement centres. It must of course be borne in mind in this context that we are only concerned with that branch of the Celtic language of which the main descendant is Welsh, for there is no evidence that the other branch, represented by Scottish Gaelic, existed here until its introduction by the Scotti from Ulster in the fifth century AD.

Of the organization and structure of society in the non-Celtic areas we have no knowledge, but within the areas under Celtic rule—and that may well have been most of habitable Scotland in the first century AD—we can see something of the likely social pattern. There existed some fifteen or so major tribes—Smertae, Damnonii, Votadini and the rest—each governed by a ruler with the status of a tribal chieftain or a basileus of Hesiod's Dark Age Greece. Such tribal leaders in southern Britain were on occasions of special relationships described by the Romans as rex, and they seem to have held office by reason of their membership of the ruling house. They could indeed be men or women, as Cartimandua of the Brigantes and Boudica of the Iceni give witness.

Within the tribe a socially stratified society linked the classes one to another by obligation and land tenure. Settlement seems to have been based largely on the individual steading, but these may have been grouped into what in recent times became called the 'township' or baile, the same grouping of households with collectively tilled common fields and communally owned pasture and grazing. The free men of the settlement (on historical analogies) could have owned shares in the common land, and it seems likely, again on comparative historical evidence, that the skilled craftsmen, whether bards or blacksmiths, would also have their rights there. But between the chieftain and the commoners there came a class of nobles or barons or thanes, a warrior aristocracy, the equites of Caesar, who in Ireland at least, and most likely elsewhere in the British Isles, specifically counted their wealth in cattle and whose individual allotment of arable or grazing was a separate portion not included in the common lands of the settlement. These were the men who fought from the chariot, rather than on foot like the lower classes of freemen; these, too, with the chieftain were probably the main owners of slaves who had not the rights of the freemen of the society. Chieftain and nobles formed a general assembly denoted in the Indo-European languages by various names indicating 'the whole' (in Irish, the word for 'tribe'); and although the ruler came from a royal family, it seems that his succession had at least to be formally ratified by the assembly.

We know that the priestly caste, the druids, were of great importance in the Celtic world, but their precise status in the social hierarchy, as far as land tenure is concerned, is obscure. It seems likely that bards and magicians, as a privileged class would be entitled to separate allocations of land, and in later times in Ireland this was certainly the case.

The pattern of the Celtic tribes was therefore that of agreed areas under individual rule (though doubtless the boundaries were often in dispute). Below the chieftain came the nobility, the 'Cow Lords' and charioteers, with their individual allocations of land; below them again the free men of the settlement with their common land. All classes were bound by obligations and allegiance, and the General Assembly of the king and his nobles determined political and military action. Inter-tribal warfare, and petty skirmishes between factious nobles and their followers, seem to have been constant. Some at least of the Celtic warriors fought naked, doubtless in consonance with some religious sanction, and many tribes and regions had the custom of painting or tattooing their bodies. Head-hunting played an important part in such activities, the heads of the victims being carried home in triumph on the chariot and preserved in the house or impaled over the gate of the hill-fort; cattle raiding was an honourable and accepted occupation for a gentleman.

It is against such a background then that we must set Calgacus, the Swordsman as his name tells us, the first man in Scotland whose name we know. He and his nobles, like their Gaulish cousins described so vividly by Diodorus Siculus, no doubt shaved their faces but 'let their moustaches grow so long that their mouths are covered up and so when they eat, these get entangled in the food, while their drink is taken in, as it were, through a strainer.' They too would wear the Celtic dress that so astonished the classical world—'amazing clothes, shirts with flowing patterns and dyed all kinds of colours and trousers called brakai,' perhaps, too, as Diodorus noted, in speech they may have been 'sparing of words and enigmatical,' though 'boastful, threatening and braggarts by nature.' Ceremonial feasting would take place in the big circular thatched house, with the guests graded according to status as they sat round the central hearth with the bubbling cauldron of boiled pork; behind each warrior would stand his armour-bearer, and to the bravest warrior went the choicest joint, the Champion's Portion. Beer or mead would be brought to the guests by a servant moving sun-wise, just as the port decanter circulates today.

It is a barbarous society that we reconstruct, not far from that of Dark Age Greece reflected in Homer, nearer perhaps to that of Beowulf, preserving the texture and idiom of the earlier Indo-European institutions in the same sense that the Celtic languages retain the features that relate them to earlier dialects. For the Romans who had absorbed the Oriental and Mediterranean civilities, an incomprehensible order of things: on the frontiers of their Empire they were separated from their opponents not only by a physical, but by a moral and psychological barrier across which understanding could not reach. The Celtic peoples could not achieve the concept of unity even among themselves, let alone conceive of a world containing both Celts and Romans. 'Seldom is it,' wrote Tacitus of the Britons, 'that two or three states meet together to ward off common danger. Thus, while they fight singly, all are conquered.' And as a modern historian discussing this very problem has said, 'the conduct of the barbarians was rendered worse by the incalculable changes of their moods; they were not guided by logical and reasoned thinking but rather by sudden emotion.' On the other hand, the ancient antithesis of civilized and barbarian, the Tribes Without the Law, was as ineradicably fixed in the Roman mind as in that of Rudyard Kipling. Neither philosophically nor juridically did Roman thought admit the possibility of 'good barbarians,' unless they were firmly under the contractual obligations of a client kingdom or incorporated within the Empire. It was a spiritual and moral as well as a political impasse, and in Scotland, on the outer rim even of Celtic culture, perhaps more impossible of solution than elsewhere in western Europe.

The Roman occupation of Scotland was, like that of the rest of the Highland Zone of Britain, a military garrison established among people of alien traditions, at a lower stage of technological capacity, and with at best a rudimentary and often savage code of law and government. In the face of such an occupying force, determined to preserve peace in the regions it controlled and to put an end to the eternal quarrels and raids between rival families, clans and tribes, that were the breath of life to the Celtic warrior, three main courses of action were open to the barbarians. In the first place, it was possible for a native tribe to accept Roman rule, even to welcome it; such an arrangement could be advantageous to both sides and could either be an informal state of non-aggression, or could be ratified by appropriate legal machinery. In the south of Scotland it looks as though the tribes of the Damnonii and the Votadini took such a course at an early stage of the occupation.

A second (and perhaps the most usual) relationship between native and Roman was that of keeping the peace to the minimal degree consonant with reprisals, at least in the immediate neighbourhood of the garrisons or the ambit of their scouting parties. The more remote from the Roman military zone, the more lawless could the tribe be—what happened north of the Great Glen was nobody's business. But the third, and perhaps more personal solution of the problem of co-existence of incompatible cultures, was for the ruler and his retainers to move out of reach of the military forces, and if possible to put sea or mountain between himself and them.

It is instructive, however, to look first at the situation in the heavily garrisoned area between Hadrian's and the Antonine Walls, especially that part of it in which, as we saw earlier, the builders of hill-forts had established themselves. This was the region in part within the tribal areas of the Votadini and the Damnonii who, as we have said, seem to have come to terms with the occupying forces, and in part within that of the Selgovae, whose submission was probably compelled. The evidence from the hill-forts of the Border counties is eloquent enough as to what was achieved by forcible or persuasive Roman action. Time and time again we can trace the growth, within the defended areas, of congeries of circular stone-walled huts or small houses which, on excavation, prove belong to the period of the Roman occupation, though some are indeed also earlier, and which not only fill the fort by sprawl over once-defensive walls and ramparts by then out of commission and half ruined. The pax romana was no empty phrase, whether achieved by force or by the consent of at least the tribal leaders, and the clan warfare and cattle-raids of which the forts are the archaeological expression could not be tolerated in Romanised territory. Once rallying places of the war-bands, the forts could still have remained the high places of tribal prestige and tradition, but as civil settlements. The nucleation of settlement they presuppose may have been accompanied by, and be in part the outcome of, improved agricultural techniques introduced by the Romans in an attempt to increase local corn production: certainly Romano-Celtic tools of southern English types appear at this time in the Scottish Lowlands.

The Roman Occupation

Hill forts and Roman forts in south Scotland

It was a Celtic custom to have periodic tribal or religious assemblies at fixed places, not necessarily at any permanent settlement, where ceremonies could take place, laws be promulgated, and a fair or market held. Such meetings may have been recognized, within the Roman provinces, as lawful and permissible. We have seen too how there were sanctuaries such as Medionemeton somewhere near the Antonine Wall, while the votive offerings made in lakes must not be forgotten.

A place named in a Roman source as that of Maponus lay within the tribe of the Novantae, whose territory seems to have stretched from the River Nith into Galloway: Maponus was a Celtic god of youth, music and markets, and Lochmaben may preserve his name. It was against the Novantae and the Selgovae that Agricola directed his attack at an early stage of his campaign in AD 82. During the next two years he was engaged in the combined operations in eastern Scotland which culminated in the engagement at Mons Graupius. These campaigns, or the impending threat of such events, would have forced upon the Celtic tribes the alternative courses of action we have mentioned—submission, real or superficial, or withdrawal to regions out of reach of the Roman army.

In such a context it is interesting to consider the Western Isles within the first couple of centuries AD. In the third millennium BC, they had supported a population of stone-using agriculturalists whose enduring memorial is their chambered collective tombs. After this episode there is virtually no evidence of anything but the most scanty and sparse settlement, often of none at all, until there appear the abundant remains of the stone-built houses, byres and farmsteads of iron-using farmers, and the circular defensive tower-houses known as brochs. Once established, such structures were built and lived in for several centuries, into the post-Roman Dark Ages

The material equipment of the settlers would be perfectly in accord with their having origins on the mainland. The circular stone houses are no more than local versions of the timber built farmsteads, which we have already noticed, adapted to conditions of scanty wood and an inclement climate; bone weaving tools and other objects imply sheep farmers making woollen cloth according to traditional techniques widespread in immediately pre-Roman Britain and well represented from West Yorkshire to Galloway.

The structure called a wheel-house, from its plan with radial stone piers representing the wooden posts of the prototype, is clearly the Hebridean equivalent of the farmhouse unit or single steading which we have seen to have been typical of the immediately pre-Roman agrarian economy over most of the British mainland. The animal bones from such houses, and tools such as the weaving-combs mentioned above, show that the builders were farmers grazing sheep for wool—their stock, and any seed corn they may have possessed, must have been taken to the islands during the immigration. The same economy lies behind the brochs, but these remarkable structures show a peculiarly Scottish development whereby the circular stone-walled house was turned into a defensive tower (see Index of Sites). Much is still obscure about the precise manner in which these tower-houses, some at least built to a height of 6 m or more, were roofed or floored internally, and there is likely to have been considerable individual variation; but one thing is clear. We are dealing with a development exactly analogous to the evolution of the mediaeval peel or tower house in North Britain, and presumably the result of similar circumstances—insecurity, clan or tribal warfare, cattle thieving and family feuds. It is possible that the broch builders felt the need to defend themselves against an enemy more dreaded than their own kinsfolk, the power of the Roman military forces, which, as Agricola's circumnavigation of Scotland showed, could strike by sea as well as by land. Was this act indeed a demonstration directed in terrorem to show that even those in the Islands were not necessarily out of reach?

In the event, there is no evidence that punitive measures were ever taken against these settlements. In fact, it looks as though some peaceable trading took place between the Roman world and the Hebridean crofters, and that the woollen industry of the north, as elsewhere in the Roman Province, was encouraged as a deliberate piece of economic policy. The Celtic north and west was moving towards the place it was to occupy in the earliest Middle Ages, when the movements of peoples in the immemorial manner of prehistory were to begin again, for the Roman grip on northern Europe had become relaxed and ineffective. With the arrival of the Scotti from Ulster in the fifth century AD and the later Anglian settlement in the south-east, historical Scotland with its amalgam of prehistoric traditions of language and culture, mingled with those of Irish and Germanic origins, began to take shape.

A Call for Articles

A Druid Missal-Any would like to invite interested persons to submit articles pertaining to Druid history, language, culture and lore, Paleo- and Neo-druidism, and related topics for publication. The article should be typewritten, double-spaced, and no longer than eight double-spaced (no elite) pages. The editors of the Missal-Any reserve the right to edit articles. Author credit will be announced in A Druid Missal-Any.

Light bulbs by Lumi-ram Corporation, of Finland, sold as "color enhancement" bulbs, greatly enhance the ease and effect of crystal gazing. This is quite helpful when trying to learn this skill. They are sold in catalogues and some decorator lighting stores.

Drought-Stricken Car Washing

Save old bath water and wash the car in it. This is made easier with some 3/8" aquarium tubing for a siphon. Do NOT use old noodle or pasta water; it has a wheat gluten in it that you will never get off of your paint. Use old five Gallon bottles or ten gallon plastic bulk food containers for water storage. Some health food stores or restaurants give them away. Only the first and final rinses need be with the hose.

Fall Equinox Essay: Harvest and Cernunnos

By Emmon Bodfish

all Equinox, a minor High Day in the Reform Druid calendar. The season of Foghar begins. The harvest advances in earnest. All produce of the fields and wild woods must be gathered in before Samhain Eve. Any fruit left in the fields after that night must be left, abandoned to the birds and the wild creatures, "to feed the flocks of Cernunnos." At Fall Equinox the work of harvesting is in full swing and we can appreciate a minor holiday from our work.

There is very little to gather here at the Orinda Grove Site. After the drought and the oak moth plague of this year and last, the oaks have not ripened any acorns to speak of, and the Blue Flag bulbs and wild onions are scarce. We'll leave what there are to the animals. The deer are hungry and the squirrels have grown bold. They come into the yard or sniff around the garage. However we have a bumper crop of fire wood with all the dead saplings and fallen oak limbs. Never cut a living tree for fuel. There is plenty of the dead stuff around.

From now until Winter Solstice is the time of Cernunnos, Master of the Animals, the woodland God, the antlered shaman. He is the teacher and "brother" of mystics, and of the solitary woods hermits of the Celtic pagan tradition. Professor James Duran believes He is a cognate to Hindu Shiva. He is the magician or shaman figure, cultivating his "yoke to God" in solitude. One theory of the torque symbolism in Celtic religion is that it represents a bond to the wearer's patron deity. There is archeological evidence, shrines in caves in Spain and France with continuous offerings left over the centuries, that His identity may go back to the antlered and costumed shamans of the Paleolithic. He is a patron of hunters, and is probably cognate with the Anglo-Saxon figure of Hern the Hunter.

The emphasis of this season is balance: old and new, gains and losses. Now we can take stock of the past, of the year's activities and harvest our gains or cut our losses. Harvest is a time of endings. We are busy storing, preserving and celebrating crops and insights. Balance it with rest, and talking over future plans, beside a hearth fire if possible.

Calendar

Autumn Equinox will occur at 19 hours 23 minutes Greenwich Time on September 22, 1988, which is 12:23 P.M. Pacific Daylight Time. Celebration here will be Thursday evening, circa 6:30 P.M.

The Heathen on the Heath: First Fruits

First fruits. They don't seem to come as easy as they used to. The ground, the gophers, the winds, and my own intrusive human garbage, all fight harder each year. Or is it just the time?

Lugh has lost his battle, and the ravens cross the sky in croaking crowds. The year has lost its innocence, There is a tear in our celebration. When the wedding is a memory, and the birth of the babe, and now the farm is fat with full barns and lowing cattle, the cycle must inevitably turn to its end. Do you look back on great deeds, instead of ahead to them? Has love progressed from dreams, to passion, to sticky fulfillment, and does it now draw near the anticipation of grief? Is the horse growing old in the sun? Does silver frost the muzzles of cat and hound?

This is not England. Here, the grass tells the story, browning in the violence of the Sun's passion for his ladylove. Summer has to end. Shall we burn-out and die in one long pig-out on the wealth of the warm and growing time? Already, it has been too much for the grasses. The blowing dust begs for rest, and the Lover whispers, "Weep not. Well could I have loved thee to death."

She will weep anyway. It must be hard to live forever, when love cannot.

The modern myth clings to the old days, even though history itself must follow suit. The mornings of August sear imagination with a sunburst of Hiroshima, and the dust forms mushroom clouds in the mind. Is this the August of our race? I'd sooner live, an attitude our religion does not forbid or decry. Nor does it guarantee I'll have my way...And the Last Rose of Summer is my protest song. No bunkers for me, nor did I flee the cities to outlive the victims of the mighty. Bury my heart at Ground Zero.

Centralized religion softens the analogy with faith and resignation. One woman swore the Rapture would come this fall, and when someone suggested she was dating it from the wrong event, and had still more than forty years to go, she was horribly disappointed; she had mundane bills coming due, no longer payable while watching the fires from the sheltering arms of Jesus. If the world is doomed to end, I still claim my right to go pissing and squealing. If I shall be reborn, and reborn yet again, each body still retains its animal heritage, to flee or fight death until it has honestly lost. Neither Celtic nor Teutonic peoples, whose traces figure most strongly in my own woodpile, were ever much for throwing a fight.

Seeds go in now for the winter garden, an option our Celtic forbears didn't have. Fertilizer goes in too. I compete and fuss over my soil's health, chanting the twin litanies of light waning too much, and water waxing too slowly. A high level of ritual impurity, that, when November's green tomatoes ought to be left in the fields for the Wee Folk.

Hell, I'll leave 'em a dish of my pickalilli, instead. My clumsiness alone could support a faerie convention. Or perhaps they plant their own garden, late squash in the compost heap and spilt tomato seeds among the potatoes and lettuces. And having finally decided not to die, my garden will cause me to curse the name of zucchini, as it has in years past. Even the fairies don't want that; next year their discards will spring anew, in places where I never would have planted them.

I'll feed the little bastards generously, on zucchini burgers and zucchini bread and zucchini soufflé and quiche. Who needs ritual purity when you have runaway squashes?

The Lady mourns her passing Lord, but lady animals run him off, Papa Tomcat is not welcome, and my duchesses have appropriated the shed: Maternity Ward, Drakes Keep Out! Alas, alas John Barleycorn, He was a rascal anyway. So pass the keg again. Weeping and foolery are kin, tears for the rain and guffaws for thunder. This is important business! As you go about your day, earning and arguing and building the things of humanity, make sure you're laughing and crying enough to bring on the autumn storms and keep the Wheel rolling. There's precious few of us who know our duty, so raise the Waters while you've still got 'em, and toast us in devout rowdiness.

(Sniff!) I love you guys!

Spirit of Biel: Racing Car

"Spirit of Biel," a race car named after the Celtic Sun God was entered in the first all-solar powered endurance race ever, which was held this year in Australia. This ecological vehicle might have finished third had it not collided with a conventional car just outside of Alice Wells. The 1,950 miles of roadway between Darwin and Adelaide could not be closed to conventional traffic for the four days of the race. The fuel's free, and it can hold a speed of 45 mph on a sunny day. Before the race, Mac Cready, president of Aerovironment, dismissed the idea of commercial production on the grounds of cost, but afterwards he commented "I think we all realize that we may have started something that we did not originally envisage."

A: Welsh.

The Heathen on the Heath:

The End of Summer

In the time of balance, I think of hairpulls, and of the doubts as old as religion that we may either decry or embrace. Myself, I have learned to be fond of them; otherwise I suffer a lot.

Rationalism is a cold place. It also makes the sensations of one's isolated consciousness a little uncomfortable. Why should I be peering out these two wet windows, instead of someone else? And whatever I may think of it, does it matter very much?

I'm not really the believing kind. Yet I walk in a world of many gods and goddesses, all part of the divine universe, and all workers of great magicks. I speak, "Lord," "Lady," and solemnly declare that a living world hears me.

I also walk among others of my nonfaith who call upon methods of divination, by cards and stars and crystals. And I have various odd means of justifying my refusal to reject such things outright: archetypal imagery, channels of intuition. Phooey. I cast cards on a table and read the pictures in them as a way of grasping at straws in confusion. I count the images in star patterns and permutate and combine them in the sky of this or that moment in time, because the star-pictures are a handle on the mystery of personality, not because they name aught that I can truly know.

And I collect the lessons of each, ancient and well-laden with the thoughts and dreams of my forebears. Help me, Old Ones! What did you know that I don't?

When does this—or the channeling of my energy through arbitrary places in my body, or the repetition of mantra or Wiccan doggerel—pass over the line between seeking and superstition?

When I walk among the people, I remember a card sent by Mad Sweeney: "Nature is not dirty, but it provides the raw materials from which we manufacture dirt." And I tell myself that people are not foolish or shallow, but they have the materials in them from which foolery and crassness are made. So I am still responsible for the times when I get used or jerked around, but for individual errors in present judgment, rather than for outreach to strangers at all.

People need not be mine to be benevolent, nor need they have been of my time to be wise. Can we translate the speech of poets? And can our materialistically-trained minds then put to use what we hear? Or is it lost to us forever, our efforts warped to fallacy by the indoctrination of an utterly alien culture?

And can we give our Mother any protection but our own extinction? By loving Her, have we become the enemies of our own kind? Many of the so-called scientific community think so.

Yet in rejecting all that they know, we continue in ignorance to wound that which we love.

We need more than balance: Synthesis. Turn in your compost, and think of that.

An Experiment in Iron Age Living

By Albion

In the year 1977, a producer for BBC (British Broadcasting Corporation) television named John Percival conceived an experiment to see what the Iron Age was like, in modern times. Percival, an archaeology buff, wanted to see, and show BBC viewers how the ancient Celts might have lived. He conceived his plan for trying the Iron Age after visiting a reconstructed Iron Age village in Lejre, Denmark.

Percival ran discreet newspaper advertisements around Britain. From the one thousand replies, Percival chose six couples and three children to spend a year living like their Celtic ancestors might have, in a careful reconstruction of an Iron Age settlement. Twice a week Percival and his BBC television crew would visit and film what was going on for a twelve part BBC television series. After Percival rented approximately 35 acres of woods and approximately 15 acres of fields from an obliging private land owner, one cold March day in 1977, these modern "ancient Celts" moved to their new village.

This modern tribe consisted of three school teachers, a hairdresser, a nurse, a doctor, a social worker, a builder, a mathematician, a National Farmers Union official, two students, and three children aged seven, five, and three.

Little had been done for these new settlers by the BBC aside from clearing a site in the woods, bulldozing a boundary wall of earth, and piping water into a "well" (as the water table was approximately 197 feet down). They were also given a few metal tools, as well as tents to live in till they got their communal roundhouse constructed, which took 14 weeks to build. Using ancient tools, the group chopped 72 wooden rafters and built a conical thatched roof with the walls made out of wattle (interwoven branches) and daub (mud and animal hair). Their house was approximately 30 feet high and 49 feet wide.

Inside their roundhouse, wattle screens and straw blinds divided their Iron Age house into 13 "rooms." These modern ancient Celts slept between animal skins on low wooden beds. Their Celtic house weathered one of Britain's worse winters (of those years) in fine style and never became too cold. Although because the group never allowed the central hearth fire to go out, it consumed a ton of fire wood every five days. Yet even in snowy weather, these modern Celts stayed warm in their ancient house.

Percival also had this modern tribe of Iron Agers trained in Celtic culture and crafts. In addition, they were trained in survival skills and gathering wild foods. They had two dogs for company. For food, they had three cows, four pigs, nine goats, twenty-five sheep, and forty chickens. In addition, some bees were provided for the production of honey. The pigs were a part wild boar species and the chickens were also an old English variety. Their supply of domestic animal meat was also supplemented by rabbit, squirrel, and an occasional deer or rat. However, our hardy volunteers said that rat had so little meat that it "was scarcely worth the trouble" of cooking. In their fields, these modern Celts grew wheat, barley, oats, peas, and tickbeans.

In some ways the 20th century kept intruding on these modern Iron Agers. The British Educational Authorities ruled that the children had to have access to school books. Also, the volunteer Iron Agers were allowed to use Tampax and contraceptives, and four times during emergencies, a doctor was sent in to attend to their needs. British laws also demanded that a butcher be sent in to stun and slaughter their pigs, and that modern fire codes be satisfied in the form of four exits in their Celtic roundhouse in case of fire. However, aside from these few allowances, these modern Celts tried to live as did their ancestors. In fact, their "catchwords" for doing things became "proper Iron Age."

As these volunteer Celts settled in, their focal point of community became the central hearth fire. Usually on long winter evenings, they would tell their life stories; pick out a tune on a six stringed lyre or the pipe and drums; sing; or play Nine Men's Morris, an ancient board game. They also made elderberry wine, beer, and mead. (They made 23 gallons of mead, which they described as being "very strong").

Bathing was also done around the central hearth fire. Water was heated by dropping pieces of heated iron into a large tub of water. After awhile, a good deal of casual nudity became commonplace, as might be expected. Soap became a problem, as experiments at making soap from animal fat failed. These modern Celts started using clay to shampoo with, as clay removed the grease from their hair.

These Iron Agers' experiments with animal husbandry were also only partially successful. Their part wild pig species would not breed but "made excellent bacon." Their efforts with chickens were also not totally successful, as their hens only laid eggs in the spring. On the other hand, their 9 goats produced 16 kids, their sheep had 13 lambs, and their cows had 4 calves.

These modern Celts also tried to pray to the Celtic Gods and Goddesses but at least one of them found it hard to leave this century and return to yesteryear. However, the group as a whole became more superstitious in their year's time spent in "the Iron Age."

They did celebrate Lughnasadh as a harvest ceremony decked out in body paint made from ash and herbs with a rowdy dance and with one member (a man) representing "the Spirit of Goodness" burying an ear of corn in the earth.

Their harvest was so successful that the efforts to reap it all became a real chore, as members had to stop cutting their crops every two or three minutes to sharpen the soft iron blades of their cutting implements. Yet, within four weeks, they had gathered in their harvest, enough to feed themselves and their animals through the winter.

These modern Celts also made their own clothes from the wool of their sheep. However, they estimated that at least 60 sheep would have been needed to fully clothe a community of their size in Iron Age time instead of the 25 that they had. The wool was coarse and slightly greasy but was warm and resisted the rain.

The one real problem encountered by these trial Iron Agers was with foot wear. Attempts at moccasin making all failed until one member finally designed a "clog" that would hold up in the rainy weather by using two strips of wood, between which was attached a strip of calf leather with leather uppers added. These lasted well and elevated feet out of mud puddles.

Much was done in the group by trial and error and metal making was no exception. They learned quickly to shape and weld iron. Making pottery proved harder, because not only did they have to build their own kiln, but they had to learn to use the right amount of "grog" or ground up stone to make the clay bind correctly. Their first experiments with pots crumbled to dust.

Bartering with BBC producer Percival was also essential to their survival. Goat kids, a calf, pots, and baskets were swapped for salt, eggs, cheese, and honey. Yet despite the need to purchase or swap, they ended the year as creditors to Percival and his crew.

All in all, the year was a highly successful venture for the volunteers with all of them learning many things that they had never known before. But most of all, they spoke of the tribal or community feeling that they had shared and come to love. All expressed sorrow at leaving their friends after the year's experiment was over.

There was much debate within British archaeological circles as to how authentic the experiment was, but Percival's group of volunteers was trying to live out some guesses about Iron Age people and their daily existence. For British television viewers the series was successful, too. As one commentator on the series said, "what they were really enacting was our own myth: a dream of simple communal living."

For readers who are interested in another similar experiment. In Iron Age living in Britain, you can look into "the Butser Ancient Farm Project." See the book The Iron Age in Britain edited by J. Collins, pages 32-40.

Samhain Essay: Assemblies

By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, a major High Day in the Druid calendar, is the day between the years. The Druid year starts with Samhain in the autumn just as the Celtic day begins at sundown. The Classic writers of antiquity held that it was a Druid teaching that cold and darkness and difficulty precede warmth and light and benefit.

In old Druid times, Samhain was the occasion of great gatherings in Ireland and Gaul, and probably in Scotland and Britain as well, though there no records of them survived.

The Druids, Bards, and Ovates (Ollafhs) and the political leaders from all parts of Ireland assembled at Tara. In Gaul similar gatherings were held, which sent and received emissaries to and from Scotland and Alba (England). Representatives of the Tuatha, the husbandmen, from the four provinces of Ireland assembled at Tara Hall well before Samhain. There, after ritual purifications, such as running or leaping the bonfires, and the offering of sacrifices, the chieftains and Druids retired indoors, into the Great Hall. They remained "under roof" all Samhain. Day, the belief being that on this day the forces of Propriety and Order were gathered indoors, and the forces of Chaos were afoot outside. Inside participants took up their traditional stations around the High King: Those of Ulster, representing the warrior caste, to his left; those of Munster, representing Bards, Prophets, and artists to his right; those of Connaught, representing the Druidic (clerical) caste at his back; and facing him, Leinster, representing the Tuatha, "the people," crafts and husbandmen. In this order the Great Counsel of the year was held.*

Elections are held in R.D.N.A. Groves, and a night vigil is held mark the new year. In the morning, the Third Order Druids exchange their red ceremonial ribbons for white, and offer a second sacrifice to the Dawn.

*For the High King, it was "face the people day." No wonder the holiday became associated with dread. From Professor James Duran's seminar, "The Druids," Berkeley, 1985.

"Some of them seem to have forgotten that their forefathers—the Picts, Danes and Romans—all entered the country illegally!"

From "Punch," December 7, 1977

The Danes and the Romans, yes. The Picts, perhaps not, if we take the Picts to be the long-headed, fine boned people of north eastern Scotland,* they may be the descendants of the original stone age hunters, among the first Sapiens into the British Isles, which were not isles, but were still attached to continental Europe at the time.

Samhain Liturgical Changes

As a Third Order Druid active in the Reformed Druid Movement, I would like to add the following lines into the Samhain Chant, they being in line with what is stated in the "Epistle to the Myopians" in the Book of the Apocrypha, in the Druid Chronicles. They would be read after the second sacrifice, before the Archdruid's request to the Earth-mother "O Earth-mother, guide our paths..."

The new version of the chant would appear as follows. (neatly typeset when I can get that done. E.B.)

This will be, is being, sent to all Third Order Druids who can be located, and so it will become part of the Apocrypha.

Chant

- D: Ea, Lord, Ea, Mother, Thou with uncounted names and faces, Thou of the many faceted Nature in and above all, to Thee we sing our chants of praise.
- E: Go Thou not from us.
- D: Dalon Ap Landu, Lord of this and all Groves, mover by night and by day, descend not beneath the earth, turn not Thy pleasing face from us.
- E: Go Thou not from us.
- D: The leaves wither, the trees and fields are barren, on what can we depend? Where is Thy order, where Thy strength?
- E: Depart not from our midst, sleep not, O most high.
- D: The Sun, the bright fire of day, withdraws His chariot; His face is veiled with clouds, and the breath of the North Wind walks the land.
- E: Return to us His warmth.

Second Sacrifice

- D: Our praise has mounted up to Thee on the wings of eagles; our voices have been carried up to Thee on the shoulders of the winds. Hear now, we pray Thee, our Mother, as we offer up this sacrifice of life. Accept it, we pray Thee, and cleanse our hearts, granting us Thy peace and life.
- D: Hast thou accepted our sacrifice, O our Mother? I call upon the Spirit of the North to give answer... of the South...of the East....of the West.

Second Reply

The sacrifice is not accepted.

D: The four winds are silent; the Earth-Mother sleeps.

The Archdruid/ess and all other members of the Third Order present now remove their red ribbons and replace them with their white ribbons. The following is the Mourning and Declaration of Faith.

D: Lo, we are as wraiths, our fire is turned to ashes and darkness walks the land.

E: Preserve us, o spirit of day. Keep us in Thy mind, O spirit of power.

D: Lo, the Season of Sleep has come, and darkness prevails. Let us then lie down, in the good and covering dark, and rest, and contemplate, and renew ourselves with this gift of sleep.

P: Rest and heal us, O our Mother.

D: O Earth-mother, guide our paths. If Thou wilt leave us, save us through the time of Silence, keep bright within our hearts 'til Spring.

E: So let it be, O our Mother, for we are faithful, and would keep thy ways.

The R.D.N.A. Samhain Chants as They Now Stand

Chant

D: Ea, Lord, Ea, Mother, Thou with uncounted names and faces, Thou of the many-faceted Nature in and above all, to Thee we sing our chants of praise.

E: Go Thou not from us.

D: Dalon Ap Landu, Lord of this and all Groves, mover by night and by day, descend not beneath the earth, turn not Thy pleasing face from us.

E: Go Thou not from us.

D: The leaves wither, the trees and fields are barren, on what can we depend? Where is Thy order, where Thy strength?

E: Depart not from our midst, sleep not, O most high.

D: The Sun, the bright fire of day, withdraws His chariot; His face is veiled with clouds, and the breath of the North Wind walks the land.

E: Return to us His warmth.

Second Sacrifice

D: Our praise has mounted up to Thee on the wings of eagles, our voices have been carried up to Thee on the shoulders of the winds. Hear now, we pray Thee, our Mother, as we offer up this sacrifice of life. Accept it, we pray Thee, and cleanse our hearts, granting us thy peace and life.

D: Hast thou accepted our sacrifice, O our Mother? I call upon the spirit of the North to give answer...of the South...of the East....of the West.

Second Reply

The sacrifice is not accepted.

D: The four winds are silent; the Earth-Mother sleeps.

E: Preserve us, O spirit of day. Keep us in Thy mind, O spirit of power.

D: O Earth-mother, guide our paths. If Thou wilt leave us, save us through the time of Silence, keep bright within our hearts 'til Spring.

Chorus: So let it be, O our Mother, for we are faithful, and would keep thy ways.

Why Another Article on Scrying?

By Emmon Bodfish

Despite the existence of numerous books on crystal gazing, and my pointing of inquirers toward them, this does not seem to be working as a feint. They keep asking. They say they want something "quick," "short", the "ready-Mart" of scrying. "What works." Here goes.

First, I have had better results with a straight sided solid piece of natural crystal than with a polished ball. This was especially true in the beginning. And secondly, as with so many psychic skills, practice does it.

Set up a room where you will not be disturbed. You must be able to be absolutely unselfconscious. A gentle light, coming from one small source, a candle or a low watt bulb, is best. Sit lightly, comfortably, with your back fairly straight, in a position in which you can forget your body. Breathe easily and deeply; "ground down." Put aside your worries and plans; tell them you will hold court for them later. Later, of course, you must do so and give these thoughts a short audience. This way they will learn to leave you alone while you are practicing your magic.

Eyes open and relaxed, take in the scene around you. Compose your emotions about the neutral point, alert and calm. Listen to the sound of your breathing and slowly stop the sentences running through your head. Become mentally silent, alert, and unbiased; anticipate. Feel the pause at the top of the in-breath. The practice of mental silence, being able to stop the verbal stream of thoughts running through your mind, is essential to the success of any meditative or psychic endeavor. It is the first rung of the ladder. This has been independently discovered by numerous religious and magical traditions and by individuals who have found their own way. It is one of the essentials for progressing in either meditative or thaumaturgical work.

Here are two methods of scrying I have used to get good results. One involves putting the light in front of you. In the other, the light is behind your right shoulder.

In the first, hold the piece of crystal in your right hand between yourself and the light source at the distance at which it is easy for you to focus your eyes on a fleck or a spot in the center of the crystal. At first it will be easier to scry while holding the stone in your hand rather than by gazing at it while it rests on a stand in front of you.

Pick a bright spot, a different looking spot, a flaw or a sparkle in the crystal and watch it. Don't anticipate or try to push for an image. Or, in another way of putting it, "Just watch it like it was television." Turn the rock slowly. Find an interesting angle.

What will come first are eidetic images. These are like the "faces" you see in clouds or the little scenes you can see in the embers. Your eye is seeing pure shapes, unnamed images, and your brain is saying, “oh, that looks like...” Don’t scoff at this or try to stop it. It is one gateway to visions and one of the closest. And, some people would add, one of the safest. Relax your eyes the way you did when you were day dreaming as a kid and just watch. If you can prevent yourself from dismissing it with the “Oh, that’s only...” response, the eidetic image will become a scene. Small, very distant figures of people moving about at some unknown task, or geometric mask-like faces that appear, change and disappear are common first sightings. Keep your mind calm and silent and watch. The scene may draw nearer and begin to mean something; a mask may become a face or a person. Two negative skills are needed here; not scoffing and not pushing for something better. Watch, remember, get the feel of it. Sometimes the scene will fade back into being flaws in the crystal; sometimes it will just disappear and you will realize how tired your eyes and mind are. You have come to the end of your concentration energy. With meditation practice, you can increase the length of time that you can hold these contemplative states of mind. Look away. Now you can analyze what meaning you what you saw may have for you. As with all psychic skills it gets easier and more refined with practice. Again, remember the metaphor of learning to play a musical instrument.

When you succeed, try to remember to remember how you were focusing your eyes, and the “feel” of your state of mind. These are helpful guideposts in learning to get back to that state.

Scrying with the light behind you, coming over your right shoulder, is similar as to method, the same eye focus, the same relaxed attention, but here reflections are more important and the scenes are more likely to be in multiple colors. Sunlight can be used, but it is difficult. It is important to have the light coming over your shoulder from the right. This is the positive direction in Celtic lore and does make a difference in mood and mental state. This I know from empirical observation and testing as well. (Yes, we test things here at the Missal-Any. Question everything. It’s an old R.D.N.A. tradition not to write or teach about a psychic phenomenon unless you have personal experience of it.) The “light from the right” rule is also corroborated in many other traditions as well. Does it stimulate the left hemisphere? I don’t know. Energy, messages, and even thought sentences that seem to originate from the left are often untrustworthy and unconstructive and sometimes even harmful. This is not a prejudice; it comes of long observation. But this does not mean that anything from the right hand side is “TRUTH.” I’d like to invoke here a former Archdruid’s safety tip for psychic experimenters: “Be as cautious about accepting or trusting any entity or “message” which you may encounter in the course of your psychic workings as you would about trusting a person whom you had just met at a party.” Common sense, repeated practice, and long acquaintance are good guides. Check your gut feeling. But this moves into the related problem of ethics, judgment, and veracity testing on the non-material planes, another and vaster subject than simple scrying, which was the subject that I was asked to boil down and put in this nutshell.*

Stock Market Crash

In the old legends
 fairie gold turned back to withered leaves the next day. It shone and lured only in Elfland.
 And by enchantment.
 Money is like that.
 On the stock market the climbing numbers increase and multiply and now nothing but paper,
 fit only to write a poem on the back.
 Elfland. Wall Street.
 Wherever we believe and then
 no longer believe.
 All over the country the experts are saying it’s a matter of faith:
 clap your hands
 and Tinkerbell will get well, and the economy will get well,
 and well, we’ll see.
 Money has always been strange.
 It’s only real when you don’t have it.
 Even the sparechanger with a handful of coins is never sure.
 They might refuse to serve him.
 They have before.
 The Dow Jones
 is just another jones to feed.
 Everyone needs money to eat
 but no one can eat paper.
 Where did all this paper come from?
 Withered leaves,
 fit only for burning.

Yule Essay: Alignments and New Years

By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, a Minor High Day in the Druid calendar, marks the Winter Solstice. This was a more important day it appears from the archeological evidence in the preceding Megalith Culture. Not only is the rising point of the sun marked in the stones of Stonehenge, but many of the Megalithic tombs are so constructed that only on Midwinter's Day does the sun shine into the interior, usually through a round window cut in the portal stone, or along the funnel-shaped corridor of stone pillars leading up to it. The link between death, the Sun, Midwinter and an afterlife or a re-birth is a very old one, predating the Druids and even the arrival of the Indo-Europeans in Europe. In the cultures of Eastern Europe and the Mediterranean, about whom we have more information than has survived about either the Megalith culture or the Druids, the celebration of the Solstice is linked with the birth of the new, young Year-God, Corn-God or Vegetation-God. (Yes, the Christians co-opted this motif. According to the tax roles the historical Jesus was probably born around May.)

As we know that the Druid year began on Samhain, we know that they did not consider this the birth of the new season, as did many other Neolithic cultures. But the traditions of Bardic revels and of feasting on the wild boar, the vigil of the Yule log, and the decorating of Yule trees very probably do come from the Druid past. So also may be the tradition of going from house to house, singing a ritual song particular to the holiday, i.e. caroling. But in Druid times this would have been something like the "Hogmany Carols" and the related rituals of circling or dancing around the house, beating on drums and bull hides. This tradition was preserved in the remote Highlands until the nineteenth century. The ritual use of the bull hide, also used with other Druid rites, links it to Druidic, especially the Druidic Filidh tradition, and not to the preceding Megalithic or pre-Indo-European ones.

Here is one such carol. Try marching around your house and singing it this Solstice, with or without bull hide.

(Sun-wise, of course!)

Cairoll Callaig

Nis tha mis air tighinn dh' ur duthaich
A dh' urachadh dhuibh na Callaig;
Cha leig ml leas a dhol ga innse,
Bha i ann ri linn ar seanar.

Dirim ris an ardorus,
Teurnam ris an starsach,
Mo dhuan a ghabhail doigheil,
Modhail, moineil, maineil.

Caisean Callaig 'na mo phoca,
Is mor an ceo thig as an ealachd.

* * * *

Gheibh fear an taighe 'na dhorn e,
Cuiridh e shron anns an teallach;
Theid e deiseil air na paisdean,
Seachd ar air bean an taighe.

Bean an taighe is i i fhiach e,
Lamh a riarach orinn na Callaig,
Sochair bheag a bhlath an t-samhraidh,
Tha mi 'n geall air leis an arain.

Hogmanay Carol

I am now come to your country,
To renew to you the Hogmanay,
I need not tell you of it,
It was in the time of our forefathers.

I ascend by the door lintel,
I descend by the doorstep,
I will sing my song becomingly,
Mannerly, slowly, mindfully.

The Hogmanay skin is in my pocket,
Great will be the smoke from it presently.

* * * *

The house-man will get it in his hand,
He will place its nose in the fire;
He will go sunwards round the babes,
And for seven verities round the housewife.

The housewife it is she who deserves it,
The hand to dispense to us the Hogmanay,
A small gift of the bloom of summer,
Much I wish it with the bread.

Calluinn A Bhuilg [63]

Calluinnen Ho! This rune is still repeated in the Isles. Rarely, however, do two persons recite it alike. This renders it difficult to decide the right form of the words.

The walls of the old homes in the West are very thick—from five to eight feet. There are no gables, the walls being of uniform height throughout. The roof of the house being raised from the inner edge of the wall a broad terrace is left on the outside. Two or three stones project from the wall at the door, forming steps. On these the inmates ascend for purposes of thatching and securing the roof in time of storm.

Calluinn a bhuilg,
Calluinn a bhuilg,
 Buail am boicinn
 Buail am bicinn.
Calluinn a bhuilg,
Calluinn a bhuilg,
 Buail an craicinn,
 Buail an craicinn.
Calluinn a bhuilg,
Calluinn a bhuilg,
 Sios e! suas e!
 Buail an craicinn.
Calluinn a bhuilg,
Calluinn a bhuilg,
 Sios e! suas e!
 Buail an craicinn.
Calluinn a bhuilg,
Calluinn a bhuilg.

Hogmanay of the Sack

The ‘gilleann Callaig’ carolers or Hogmanay lads perambulate the town land at night. One man is enveloped in the hard hide of a bull with the horns and hoofs still attached. When the men come to a house they ascend the wall and run around sunwise, the man in the hide shaking the horns and hoofs, and the other in striking the hard hide with sticks. The appearance of the man in the hide is gruesome, while the din made is terrific. Having descended and recited their runes at the door, the Hogmanay men are admitted and treated to the best in the house.
